Amids these preparations for warre, there arrived embassadours from king Ptolomeus, giving intelligence, that the Athenians had craved aid of their king and maister, against Philip. And although they were confederate as well with him as the Romanes, yet the king would send into Greece neither a flecte of ships, nor an armie of men, defensive, or offensive to any, but by authoritie and consent of the people of Rome. In case therefore the Romanes were resolved, and sufficient withall of themselves to defend their allies, he would be willing to sit still & take his repose at home. Otherwise, if the Romanes were rather disposed to rest and take their ease, he would himselfe be well content to send such forces to the aid of the Athenians, as should defend them easily against all the power of Philip. The Senate returned great thanks unto the king, with this answer, That the people of Rome were purposed to protect their owne allies: but if during this warre they stood in need, upon any occurrence that might happen, they would give knowledge thereof to the king: as being assured and making full accompt, that all the puissance and wealth of his kingdome was a sure prop and trustie pillar of their State and Common-wealth. This done, by order from the Senate the embassadours had given them for a reward * five thousand Asses apeece. Now whiles the Consuls were busie in taking musters, and providing all things meete for the warre; the citie very devout and geven much to religion, in the beginnings especially of all new warres, after they had performed their supplications aforesaid, and done I their devotions at every altar and thrine: because nothing might be for-let and left out, that at any time heretofore had bene done; ordeined that the Consull unto whom the province of Macedonia fell, should vow solemnly to exhibit to the honor of Jupiter, the great games and plaies, and a rich present beside. But Licinius the high-priest, stayed this publick vow for the time that it went not forward, alleading that it was not lawfull to make a vow of an uncerteine summe of money not determined: and if such money might not serve for the use of warre, it ought presently to be set by and laid up safe, and not be mingled and shuffled with other monies: and unlesse that were duly done, the vow could not be paid and performed according to the order of holy rites. Albeit the thing itselfe and the person of the man that moved this scruple, touched and troubled them much, yet they would needs that the Consull should propound the matter K to the colledge of the Priests and Bishops, to know their resolution, whether a vow might not directly be made of an uncerteine peece of money. The Bishops set downe their opinion and judgement, that it might be well enough, yea and better than otherwise. Whereupon the Consull pronounced the vow, according to the very same forme of words (as the high priest endited and spake before him) which aforesaid they were wont to use, in making the quinquennall vowes from five yeeres to five: save onely thus much, that he vowed and promised to represent the playes, and to present oblations unto Jupiter, amounting to such a summe of money, as the Senate should set downe when the vow was to be performed. So many times before had the great games bene vowed, and a determinate summe of money ever assigned: but these were the first L that were not limited within any certaine flint and compasse.

Now when all mens minds were wholly bent upon the Macedonian warre, behold on a sodaine, when they feared nothing lesse than such a thing, there arose a rumor of French troubles and tumults: for the Insulians, the Cenomans and Boij, having solicited and raised up by way of insurrection the Sallij, the Illuitions, and other states of Liguria, under the conduct of Amilcar the Carthaginian, who in those parts stayed behind with the remnant of Asdruball his armie, were seized of Placentia: and after they had sacked the citie, and for very despiteous anger burnt a great part of it, leaving hardly two thousand persons of all sorts, which amid the fire and ruines thereof chaunced to save themselves, crossed the river Po, and advanced forward to the spoile and pillage of Cremona. But the inhabitants of that colonie, having heard of the miserie M and calamitie befallen upon their neighbour-citie, had some respite and time to shut their gates, and to bestow their guards upon the walls: so as, they should at leastwise be first besieged or ever they were forced; and might be able to dispatch messengers unto the people of Rome. L. Furius Purpureo was governor of that province for the time; who having by order from the Senate discharged all the rest of the armie but only five thousand of allies and those Latines, abode with that

A that power in the next countrey to that province, about Ariminum. He then addressed his letters unto the Senate, signifying in how bad termes the province stood, namely, that of those two colonies, which all the time of the Punick warre had escaped those great stormes and tempests of troubles, the one was won by the enemies & put to the sackage, the other now besieged, and at hand to be lost: neither would his forces be sufficient and able to help the distressed Cremonians, unlesse he should wilfully cast away five thousand allies, and expose them as a prey unto fortie thousand of the enemies (for so many they were strong) to have their throates cut, and to be hewen in peeces; and by so great a losse and overthrow of his, to give more hart and courage to the enemies, who are now in their ruffe, and puffed up with pride for the ruine of one Romane colonie already. Upon the reading of these letters, there went forth a decree from the LL. of the B Senat, that C. Aurelius the Consull should send out precepts for the armie to be readie at Ariminum that very day, on which he appointed them to the Rendez-vous in Hetruria: and that either himselfe in his own person, if it might stand with the good of the State, would go with a power to suppress these French commotions, or els write to L. Furius the Pretor, that when the Rom. Legions presented themselves unto him out of Hetruria, he should send in their steed his owne five thousand allies for the guard of Hetruria in the meane time, and make a journey himselfe in person to levie the siege before Cremona, and to set the colonie free that now was beleaguered. They thought good besides to dispatch embassadours into Affrick, who first should go to Carthage, and afterwards to Masaniissa in Numidia. To Carthage, for to intimate unto them, That Amilcar a citizen of theirs, left behind in Fraunce, (and whether he were of the armie of Asdruball before, or afterwards of Mago, they knew not for certein) waged warre there, against the C covenants in the league contained: that he had assembled certain forces of French and Ligurians, to enter into armes against the people of Rome: and therefore, if they had any love to intertein peace, they should call him home, and deliver him to the people of Rome. Over and besides they had in commission to give them to understand, that delivery was not yet made of all the renegade rebels, but many of them, by report, were retired to Carthage, and there went up and downe, and conversed openly; which persons were after diligent search made, to be attached and apprehended, that they might according to the tenure of the accord, be sent home againe and delivered into the hands of the Romanes. And thus much concerning their message to the Carthaginians. Now they had in charge besides to congratulate with Masaniissa, and to D declare what joy they tooke in his behalfe, namely, for that he had not only recovered the inheritance of his fathers kingdome, but also enlarged his dominion, by conquest of the most flourishing part of the realme of Syphax. Moreover, commaunded they were to signifie unto him, that they had undertaken to warre upon king Philip, because he had friended and aided the Carthaginians; and by offering and doing wrong to the friends of the people of Rome, even at what time as all Italie was full of troubles and warres, enforced and put them to it; for to send their armies and their armadaes into Greece, and so by dismembring and deviding their forces into sundry places, was the principall cause that they were so late ere they passed over into Affrick: requesting him for the maintenance of this warre, to send over certain aids of Numidian horsemen. These orators had great gifts and honorable presents given them for to eary unto the E king, to wit, divers peeces of plate both of gold and silver, a purple robe of State, with a rich caslock or cote wrought in palme tree worke, with a royall scepter of yvorie; also a robe embroidered before with purple, with an yvory chaire of estate. Last of all, they were willed to make promise unto the king, that if he could thinke upon anything needfull and expedient either to establish his kingdome, or to advance his royall estate, the people of Rome would endeavour respectively for his good demerits to compasse the same to the uttermost of their power.

There arrived also about that time, embassadours from Vermis the sonne of Syphax, and presented themselves unto the Senate, excusing the error & pretending the youth of the prince, clearing him of all fault, and laying the whole blame upon the fraud and faiterie of the Carthaginians, promising for their king and master in this wise, That like as Masaniissa of a professed enemy was become a sworn friend to the Romanes, even so would Vermis doe his best and straine F himselfe, that in all offices of friendship toward the people of Rome, neither Masaniissa nor any other should surpass him; and making petition in his name, that the Senat would vouchsafe to give him the titles of King, of Allie, and Friend unto the Romans. These orators had this for their answer, That not onely Syphax, his father before him, of a confederate and friend, friend, suddenly without any cause at all proved an enemy to the people of Rome; but also G himselfe had practised already in his young yeeres, and laid the first ground of his warfare in annoying and troubling the Romanes by warre; and therefore he was to seeke pardon and crave peace at their hands, before he might be invested by them with the tearmes of King, of Ally, and Friend: for the honour of that stile, the people of Rome were wont to vouchsafe to none, but those kings onely who had deserved singularly well of them. Many there should be certaine Romane Legats in Affricke, unto whome the Senate would give order, to minister and tender unto Vermina certaine conditions of peace, according to a large and absolute commission that they had from the people of Rome, To doe what they thought good. And in case the king misliked ought in those capitulations, and were desirous to have any article added, put out, or altered, he must have recourse againe to the Senate, and demaund the same. So there were Legats H or commissioners sent into Affricke with such a commission abovesaid, namely C. Terentius Varro, Sp. Lucretius, and Cn. Octavius, and ech of them had allowed a galleace directed with five rowes of oares.

After this were the letters read of Q. Minutius Pretour in the province of the Brutij, importing thus much, That the consecrated money of Proserpina at Locri, was by night stolen out of her treasure; but to say who should doe the deed, they had no presumptions to give light and lead them directly. The Senate tooke the matter in very ill part, and grieved exceedingly, That sacrilegious men fell still to church-robbing, and would not give over: and that the late & fresh example of Plinius (so notorious as well for the heinous fact as the fearefull punishment) was not able to terrifie them and give them warning. So C. Aurelius the Consull was enjoined to write I unto the Pretour into the Brutians country, to this effect: That it was the Senats pleasure, that due enquire and examination should be had of the treasure thus robbed, after the same precedent and course that M. Pomponius the Pretour tooke three yeeres before. And looke what money could be found, it should be laid up duly in the place; and what was not forth-coming, it should be supplied and made good againe. Also (if he thought meet) that there should be certaine purgatorie sacrifices, according as the bishops before ordained in the like case, for the expiation and satisfaction of the violating and defiling of the temple. Moreover, there chanced about the same time divers prodigious tokens from many places to be reported. In the Lucanes country the rumor and voice went, that the welkin was on fire; and at Privernum, while the skie was bright and faire, the sunne appeared red all day long. At Lanuvium in the temple of Iuno Sospita, there was heard in the night season a mightie great noise. Nay and more than this, in sundry places (as men say) were many monstrous and straunge births seene. In the Sabines country one child was borne, and no man knew what to make of it, male or female: and another likewise was found of sixteen yeeres of age, a very Hermaphrodite of doubtfull sex between both. At Frusino there was a lambe yeaned with a swines head: and at Sinuessa a sow farrowed a pig with the head of a man. In the Lucanes country there was foled upon the common ground a colt with five feet. All these monsters were ugly to see and abominable, and holden for great defects and errors of nature working strangely out of kind. But above all others, those birthes both male and female, (or rather neuter) were most abhorred and detested, and order was given presently, that they should be cast into the sea; even as of late daies when C. Claudius and M. Livius were Consuls the like deformed monster was thither had away and drowned. Nevertheless the Decemvirs were commaunded to turne over and peruse the bookes of Sibylla, to know what such prodigious monsters might portend: who by their learning and out of those bookes, gave direction to make the same sacrifices which last of all for the like uncouth sights were made. Moreover, they gave commaundement, that certaine hymnes and songs should be chaunted throughout the citie by three severall quires, of nine virgins in every one; and an oblation to be offered by them with all devotion to queene Iuno. C. Aurelius the Consull caused all this to be perfourmed according to the order and direction of the Decemvirs. And as in our fathers daies Livius composed the dittie of the hymne, so at that time P. Licinius Tegula framed and set downe a forme of song which they should sing. Thus when all things were expiate, and satisfaction made accordingly for the appeasing of the wrath of the gods, (for even at Locri also the sacrilege was found out by Q. Minutius, and the mony missing was raised out of the goods of the offenders and guiltie persons, and bestowed there againe in the treasure) as the Consuls were minded to take their journey into their provinces, there repaired many privat citizens unto

A unto the Senat, unto whom the third paiment was due that yeere for the loane of mony which in the time of M. Valerius and M. Claudius Consuls they had lent out and disbursed, because that the Consuls had made them answere, That the stocke of the citie chamber was hardly able to defray the charges of a new warre, which required maintenance of a mightie navie and of puissant armies, and therefore flatly denyed them and said, That they had not wherewith to satisfie and make present paiment. The Senate could not endure that they should have this occasion to make complaint; considering, that if the commonwealth would still employ the money upon the Macedonian warre also, which was granted in loane for the Punicke warre, this would be the end of it, that (one warre following thus in the necke of another) their owne money which was lent upon a curtesie and benevolence out of their privat purses, should be little better than confiscate for some forfeiture, and fall to the exchequer and common chest of the citie. These private persons demanding nothing but reason and right, and the citie withall not able to discharge her debt, the LL. set downe a middle and indifferent course betweene honestie and profit; and that was this: That foras much as many of these men said, that the citie had much land upon sale, and they were to buy and make purchase, therefore the common grounds lying and being within fiftie miles of Rome every way, should be granted unto them in fee farme, and the Consuls to set downe an estimate of their value and worth, and charge them with a chiefe rent or tribute of 3 farthings an acre by the yeere, to testifie only that they were the cities lands; to the end that if any man hereafter (when the citie should be aforehand and in case to repay the former debt) were desirous to have money rather than land, he should restore the lands and possessions againe into the cities hands and receive his money. These private citizens (who were the foresaid creditours) accepted gladly of this offer and condition. And hereupon this land was called by the name of Trientius and Tributus, because it was set out & granted in lieu of a third part of the lone money. Then P. Sulpitius after he had pronounced his vowes abovesaid in the Capitoll, and departed out of the citie in his coat of armes, with the Lictors & huihers afore him, arrived at Brundisium; and so with the old voluntary soldiers drawne out of the army that was returned from Affricke, (whom he had enrolled into legions) and ships chosen out of the fleet of Corneilius the Consull; he loosed from Brundisium, and the next day after landed in Macedonia: where there attended him the embassadours of the Athenians; who humbly besought him to deliver them from the siege that invested their citie. So C. D. Clau. Cento was incontinently sent to Athens, furnished with 20 long ships of war, & a strength of men for the king himself in person besieged not Athens, but even then made hot assault upon the town Abydos, as having already given prooffe of his forces in sea fight, both with the Rhodians and king Attalus, and in neither battell had good successe. But besides the ordinarie stoutnesse and pride engraffed in him by nature, hee was aloft now and looked high, by reason of the alliance made betweene him and Antiochus king of Syria, with whom he had parted the richesse and realme of Egypt, unto which they both aspired, upon the newes they heard of the death of king Ptolomeus. Now the Athenians had drawne upon themselves the warre against king Philip, upon a small occasion and of no importance; who of all their auncient estate and glorie, retained nothing els but great heart and haucie spirit. It fortuned that two young men of Acarnania, who had taken no orders and were not consecrate, entred among the other multitude into the temple of Ceres, in the time of the feastivall daies, and celebration of sacrifices to that goddesse belonging: and being altogether ignorant in the custome of that solemnitie and religion, and asking some foolish absurd questions, nothing fit for that time or place, were soone bewaied by their speech and language: who being convented before the Prelats of the said temple, notwithstanding it was evidently proved and knowne, that upon an error onely and oversight, and not for any ill intent they were come into the church, yet were they put to death as fellows, and guiltie of some hainous fact in the highest degree. The people of Acarnania complained unto king Philip, and enformed him of this villanous part and hostile act by them committed; and obtained a graunt from him, that they might be permitted with the aid of the Macedonians, to make warre upon the Athenians. This armie at first invaded the territories of Athens, and with fire and sword made wast and havocke of all, and so with a rich bootie of all sorts returned into Acarnania. These were the first quarels on both sides, that stirred coales and kindled fire betweene them. Afterwards was defiance given, and open warre proclaimed, by the generall decrees of both States. For when king Attalus and the Rhodians pursued after Philip, as he retired into Macedonia, nie, and were come as farre as Ægina, then the said king passed over to Pyreæum, for to renewe and G confirm the league with the Athenians. Against his comming the whole citie went forth with their wives and children to meet him on the way: the Clergie with their rich vestiments & goodly ornaments were readie to receive him as hee entred the citie: the very gods themselves in a manner abandoned their shrines to give him entertainment. Immediately was the people summoned to a generall assembly, that the king might deliver his mind before them all: but afterwards upon more sage advise, it was thought to stand better with the honour and majestie of a prince, that he should set downe in writing what he thought good, rather than in open place, either to blush himselfe in recounting his favours and good turnes done unto the citie, or in hearing the acclamations of the multitude in token of joy, to be abashed & ashamed of their grosse and unmeasurable flatterie. But in his letters which hee sent unto the assemblee, and were there H openly read and published, first he made a rehearfall of the benefices that this confederate citie had received at his hands. Secondly he discoursed of the worthie exploits which he had performed against Philip. And finally he knit up all with an exhortation, that whiles they had himselfe, the Rhodians, and especially the Romanes to friend them, they should put themselves in armes and begin warre; as who, if they now forslow the enterprise, and let slip the present opportunitie, should hereafter seeke in vaine to find it, which once they had so retchlesly lost. Then had the Rhodian Embassadours audience given them, who lately had done the Athenians a great pleasure, in recovering and sending home unto Athens foure long foists, which newly had been borded and taken by the Macedonians. Hereupon with generall accord they decreed to denounce and wage warre upon king Philip. But first they did king Attalus incredible honour beyond all I measure, and then likewise to the Rhodians. Then and never before there was some speech moved of adjoining unto the ten auncient tribes, one other tribe, which of the kings name should be called Attalus. Vnto the citie of the Rhodians they gave in token of vertue, a crown of beaten gold. And like as beforetime the men of Rhodes had granted free Burgeoisie of their citie to the Athenians, so they of Athens now endued the Rhodians with their liberties and franchises. This done, king Attalus returned to his fleet in the roade of Ægina. The Rhodians then weighed anker, & from Ægina sailed to Cea*. From whence along the islands, they passed to the Rhodes: & in their voyage confedered themselves with them all, excepting Andros, Paros*, & Cythus*, which were guarded by garrisons of the Macedonians. In Ægina king Attalus made his abode K acertain time, & entred into no action, by occasion of messengers whom he had sent into Æto- lia, and embassadours that were expected from thence. But as he could not prevaile with the Æto- lians, & perswade them to take arms, contenting themselves with the peace that in some sort they had concluded with Philip: so himselfe, and the Rhodians (who, no doubt, if they had pressed and followed hard upon Philip, might have gained and enjoied this glorious tide, That they alone of themselves had delivered Greece from servitude) by suffering him once againe to crosse the seas as farre as Hellespontus*, and to possesse himselfe of the commodious and important townes of Greece, thereby to reenforce his power and gather more strength, gave food and nourishment to the warre, and in the end let the Romanes goe away with the honour, both of managing and L also of finishing the same. Philip carried with him yet a more princely mind and kingly courage: who, although he was not able to match and make his part good so much as with Attalus and the Rhodians his enemies, yet was hee nothing at all daunted with the thundering threats of the Ro-mane warre; but sent Philotes, a captaine of his, with a power of two thousand foot and two hundred horse, to invade and spoile the territorie of the Atheniens, committed his Armada to the charge of Hersclides, to set saile for Maronea*, and himselfe in person marched by land thither with another regiment of two thousand footmen lightly appointed, and two hundred men of armes. Maronea he forced at the first assault. But as for Ænus, after he had with much labor and travaille laid siege thereto a long time, in the end he was maister thereof, through the treason of Ganymedes, deputed L. Governor there for king Ptolomeus. After this he surprised & woon other castles, as Cypela, Doriscon, and Serrheum. From thence hee advanced forward to Chersones- us, where he gained Eleus and Alopeconnesus, which willingly surrendered: Callipolis also & Ma- M dytos, with some other peeces of base account and reckoning. But the Abydenes shut their gates against the king, and would not suffer so much as his embassadours to set foot within their cities. There lay Philip a long time before the town and beleaguered it: and surely had not Atta- lus and the Rhodians forelacked the time, it might have beene saved and the siege raised. Atta-

Attalus sent thither three hundred souldiours and no more to lie in garrison, and the Rhodians one galley onely with foure bankes of oares out of the navie when it rode at Tenedos. And afterwards when as Attalus himselfe was thither come, at what time as the townesmen could hardly hold out any longer against the siege, he made them a shew onely neare at hand of some helpe: other reliefe would he afford none to his allies either by land or sea. The Abydens at first planted their engines and artillerie along the walles, and with shot from thence not onely distressed their enemies, and kept them from approach and entrance, but also annoyed them as they lay in harbour with their ships: but afterwards, seeing part of their walles ruinate and laid open; and perceiving besides that the enemies had undermined and were come under the ground as farre as the inner countermure, which the inhabitants in great hast had raised within; forthwith they sent embassadours to the king to treat and article about some conditions for delivering up the citie. The townesmen capitulated and demanded, that the Rhodian galley aforesaid, with all her mariners, and the garrison also of king Attalus, might be sent away in safetie, and themselves permitted to depart the towne every one with a single suite onely of apparell. But Philip made answer againe, that he had no peace for them at all, unlesse they would quire the place, and simply commit themselves unto his mercy. This embassage related unto them, set them in such an heat and choler, that partly for spight and indignation, and partly upon despaire, they fell into the semblable rage that the Saguntines did in times past. All the dames and wives of the citie they commaunded to be shut up within the temple of Diana: their young boies and maidens that were free borne, the sucking babes, together with their nourses, they caused to be bestowed within the common place of publicke exercise: their gold and silver they tooke order to be brought into the market place: their rich attire, their costly apparell and furniture, to bee cast into the two gallies, the one of Rhodes, and the other of Cyzicum, which rid in the haven: and last of all, that their priests should be brought forth with their beasts for sacrifice, and altars erected in the midst of the place. There, first were certaine men chosen of purpose: who so soone as they perceived the battailon of their countymen defeated and slaine, fighting before the breaches of the wall, immediately should run upon their wives and children, & kill them without mercie, cast away into the sea their gold and silver, and all the furniture aforesaid that was in the gallies, and set the edifices and houses afire, as well publicke as private, in as many places as possibly they could. For the performing and execution of these premisses, they were bound by an oth ministred unto them; the forme whereof, with a cursed malediction thereto an-nexed, they pronounced word for word from the Priests mouth. Then, as many as were of lawfull age to beare armes, sware likewise, That not one of them would depart out of the battaile alive, but with victorie. Thus remembering the oth they had taken, and how they called the gods to witness, they fought so resolutely, that whereas the night would have parted the combate, the king terrified with their furious rage, first gave over the conflict. The cheefe and principal men of the citie, whose charge was to play the more cruell and horrible part in this tragical act, seeing there remained but few alive after this skirmish, and those grievously wounded and tired out of heart for wearinesse; the next morning early by day-break, sent their priests with their insules and veiles of peace, to render the citie unto Philip. Before the towne was fully yeilded, M. Amy- lius the youngest of those three Roman embassadours which were sent to Alexandria, hearing of the streight siege of the Abydenes, came by the consent of the other two unto Philip. Where he laid open his greivances, & made complaint, That he had warred upon Attalus & the Rhodians, and namely even then besieged & assailed Abydus most forcibly. And when the king answered that Attalus and the Rhodians without just cause on his part offered, began first to molest and trouble him. What! (quoth Amylius againe) were you molested and troubled first by the Abydenes too? Philip who was not wont to be told the truth so plainly, thinking this rejoindre of his, more bold and malapert, than to be offered to a king, Your youthfull age, quoth he, and faire face, and above all, the Romane name maketh you hardie and audacious. But I would advise you all, first to remember your covenants, and to intertaine peace with me. For in case ye once begin with me, and put me to it: I do you to understand, that I also am fully resolved to make you feeble the smart, and know, that the realme and nation of the Macedonians, is no lesse renowmed for feates of armes than the Romanes. Philip having dismissed the embassador, and seized upon all the gold and silver that lay on an heap together, lost all the bootie of men of qualitie, that might have yeilded him a round ransom. For the multitude of common people fell into such a fit of rage and madnesse, that all of a sodaine they imagined those who let their lives in the conflict were betrayed: and so casting one in anothers teeth their perjurie, and charging the priests especially that they were foresworne, in delivering them alive unto the enemy whom they had devoted & appointed to death: they ran at once from all parts to the pitiful massacre of their own wives & children: and when they had so done, they made no more ado, but by fire, by sword, by drowning, hanging, and one way or other, they wrought a quick dispatch and cleane riddance of themselves all. The king amazed and astonied to see them thus horne-wood, slayed the bloudie hand of his owne souldiours, saying that he would allow the Abydenes three daies to dye in. During which terme of time, the conquered Abydenes exercised more fearefull crueltie upon their owne persons, than ever the conquerours would have put in practise in the heigh of their heate and cholerick furie. In so much as there was not one of them came alive into the enemies hands; but such as either fast tyed with bonds, or otherwise by some forcible meanes, were stayed from being their own hangmen, and the butchers of their proper bodies. Philip after he had placed a garison at Abydus, returned into his owne realme. Now when this miserable calamitie of the Abydenes had fished Philip to enterprise warre against the Romanes, like as Anniball afore him tooke hart by the wofull destruction of Saguntum to do the semblable: behold, he was encountered with poits that brought newes, how the Consull was in Epirus already, and had withdrawn his land-forces to Apollonia, and bestowed his servitours at sea in Corcyra, there to winter.

In this while, the embassadours who were sent into Africa, had their dispatch and this answer from the Carthaginians. First as touching Amilcar the Generall of the armie and forces in Fraunce, they could do no more but banish his person, and confiscate his goods. Then concerning the fugitive traitours and rebels which were run from the Romanes, they had sent home againe unto them as many as they could search out and come by: and to that purpose they would addresse embassadours themselves unto the Romanes, to satisfie the Senate in that behalfe. And presently they sent to Rome two hundred thousand Modij of wheate, and other two hundred thousand into Macedonie to the armie there. From thence the Romane Embassadours went forward to the kings in Numidia. To king Masaniissa they delivered the presents which the Romanes sent, and declared unto him their commission: at whose hands they received a thousand Numidian horse, whereas he offered them two thousand: himselfe tooke order for their embarking, & so dispatched them into Macedonie, with provision of two hundred thousand measures of wheate, and as many of barley. A third embassage they had to Vermine, who met the embassadours as farre as the utmost marches of his realme, and to their disposition and discretion referred the drawing and penning of all conditions of peace as they would themselves: saying withall, that he held any peace whatsoever, that he should have with the people of Rome, for good and just. So there were presented unto him certaine articles and conditions of peace, and for the ratifying thereof, he was enjoyned to send his embassadours to Rome.

Much about the very same time L. Cornelius Lentulus the Viz-pretor returned out of Spaine: who having declared in the Senate his valiant and fortunate exploits, that for many yeeres together he had achieved in Spaine; and in consideration thereof, demanded that it might be lawfull for him to enter the citie in triumph: the Senate judged that his noble acts deserved no lesse than he sued for: but they had no such precedent from their auncestours, that he should be allowed to triumph, who had warred, neither as Dictatour, nor Consull, nor Pretour: and as for Lentulus, in qualitie of Viz-pretour only, and not of Consull or Pretour, he tooke upon him the charge of the province of Spaine. Howbeit, in the end they came downe to this point, that he should ride into the citie on horseback as Ovant. But T. Sempronius Longus a Tribune of the Com. interposed his negative, alleading that they had as little example to shew for that; and no practise or custome at all of their aunient predecessours. But in fine, the Tribune gave place to the generall accord of the LL. and was content to be over-ruled. So after the order set down by the Senat, L. Lentulus entered Rome in that solemnitie & pomp before named. He presented in shew, of the pillage that he had gotten, * 44000 pound weight of silver, * 2450 pound weight of gold. To his souldiours he distributed out of the spoile * 120 Asles apeece.

Now was the armie of the Consull translated already from Arretium to Ariminum, and five thousand Latin allies were passed out of France into Etruria: Therefore L. Furius departed from Ariminum, made hast by taking great journeis to come against the Gauls, who then laid siege

A to Cremona, and encamped within a mile and an halfe from the enemy. Meanes and opportunitie he had to do a notable exploit, and win a good hand of the enemies, if immediately upon his first coming he might have assailed their campe: for they vagued to and fro in fearing wile up and downe the countrey a foraging, and had left no sufficient guard for the defence of their camp. But he feared greatly that his souldiours were wearie and tired: because the companies marched apace thither in exceeding great hast. Howbeit the Gauls being called back by the hooping & hollaing of their fellowes, let go their bootie which they had in manner as good as in their hands, and returned to the camp, and the morrow after ranged themselves in battaile ray. The Romanes were not behind for their parts, albeit they had hardly time enough to set themselves in order, the enemies ran so sodainly, and made such hast to fight. The right wing (for the armie of the allies was divided into wings) was placed in the vanguard: the two Roman legions in the rereward; M. Furius led the right wing, M. Cecilius had the conduct of the legions; and L. Valerius Flaccus (all three Lieutenants) commanded the Cavallerie. The Pretour kept with him two Lieutenants, Cn. Leliorius, and P. Titinius, by whose meanes he might looke about from every part, and be readie to oppose himself against all sodaine attempts whatsoever of the enemies. At the first, the Gauls hoped that with their numbers they should be able to tread downe and trample under their feet, that right wing of allies which was in the forefront: and to that effect they reduced their multitudes into one place, & charged upon it with all their might & maine together. But seeing that enterprise sped not well, they endeavoured to environ the corners & sides, & to compass the enemies round about: which they thought they might soone do, being so many as they were in comparison of so few: which when the Pretor perceived, to the end that he also might spread out his battalions at large, he displayed the two legions in the rereward, so as he compassed on both hands that wing which fought in the vaward: and therewith vowed two chappels to Jupiter, if that day he might be so fortunate as to vanquish his enemies. To L. Valerius he gave direction, that of one side he should with the Cavallerie of the two legions, & on the other side with the horie belonging to the allies charge upon the wings of the enemies, & not suffer them in any case to enclose the battaile about. Herewithal himself also, epying the middle battalion of the Gauls to be but thin, by reason they were stretched out from thence to the corners & points of each hand, commanded his souldiers to keepe close together, to advance forward and break through their ranks. So were the wings of the Gauls by the horie men discomfited, and they in the mids repulsed backe and chafed by the footmen: and when the enemies thus at once on every hand were beaten downe and killed, they shewed their backs, and fled as fast as they could to the campe. The horse pursued them in the rout and chase; and anon the legionarie footmen made after also, and gave an assault upon their campe. There escaped from thence not all out fixe thousand: slain there were and taken prisoners above 35000, with sevenie banners and ensignes, and more than two hundred French wagons, charged and laden with much pillage. In this conflict, Amilcar the Generall of the Carthaginians lost his life, and three noble men of the French, leaders of marke and name. The Placentine captives to the number of two thousand men of free condition, were delivered againe to them of their owne colonie. This was a goodly victorie; and upon the letters which came with tidings thereof to Rome, received there with great joy; and ordained it was, that a solemnne procession should be held for the space of three daies. Of Romanes and allies one with another, there died in this battaile two thousand: most of them were of that right wing, upon which the enemies in the beginning of the conflict most of all discharged their furie.

Albeit the Pretour had brought the warre to a good passe and in manner finished it, yet the Consull also C. Aurelius, having accomplished his necessarie affaires at Rome, made no stay but took his journey into Fraunce, and received the victorious armie of the Pretor. The other Consull who came into his province but a little before the end of Autumne, wintered about Apollonia. The Roman gallies which from the Armada that lay in dock at Corcyra, were sent as is aforesaid, to Athens with C. Claudius, were no sooner arrived at Pyreæum, but they mightily comforted the allies, whose harts were welnigh done: for neither wer there any more inrodes now by land as there were wont to be from Corinth side by the way of Megara along into their territories: and the men of warre and pyrats ships which from Chalcis had made not onely the seas dangerous to the Athenians, but also the maritime and sea coasts, durst not now approach nearer than to the cape of Sunium, no nor venture into the open maine sea from out of the freights of Euripus.

Euripus. Over and besides, there came in to them three Rhodian galleys with foure bankes of oares: there were also three open ships of Athens well rigged and appointed, for to keepe the quarters that lay along the river. Claudius was well appayed, and thought he had gotten enough for the present, in case the citie and territorie of Athens might be sufficiently guarded by this fleet. But see, there presented unto him an occurrent besides of far greater importance and consequence. Certaine banished persons of Chalcis, expelled from thence by the wrongs and violence of those that sided with king Philip, advertised him, that the citie of Chalcis might be easily surpris'd without any conflict or resistance at all: for, not onely the Macedonians ranged abroad every where up and downe, because there were no enemies neare at hand to feare; but also the townesmen presuming upon the garrison of the Macedonians, neglected the guard of the citie. Vpon the assurance of their words, he set forward: and although he was arriv'd at Sirnium with so good speed, that he might with ease have failed to the entrance of the streights of Euboea, yet for feare of being discovered (when he was got once past the cape) he kept his fleet within the bay still untill night: and at the shutting in of the evening, he weighed anchor and launched forth, and having a calme sea, he arriv'd before Chalcis a little before the breake of day, and presented his forces against those parts of the citie that were least peopled: and with the helpe of some few souldiours, he scaled and got the towre that stood next, with the wall about it, whiles in some places the warders were sound asleepe; and in others, not at all to be found. Then they advanced forward unto those parts that were more inhabited, and stood thicker with houses; where, after they had killed the guard and broken open a gate, they received into the towne all the rest of their souldiours. Whereupon, there was running now on every hand into all parts of the citie, and much hurrie and confusion; which was the greater, because the enemies had set fire on the houses about the market place. The kings garners also were of a light fire, together with the arcanall and annorie, where there was exceeding store of provision, of engines, of artillerie and other ordnance and instruments for warre. After this they fell to execution and to massacre in every place, as well those that fled as those that made head; so as they missed not one that was of age meet to beare armes, but either he was killed or put to flight. Sopater likewise the Acarnanian captaine of the garrison, was there slaine. All the pillage was first brought and piled up together in the common place of the citie, and afterwards embarked. The common goale besides was broke open by the Rhodians, and the prisoners and captives let out, whome Philip had there lodged as in a place of surest guard and custodie. Then they overthrow the Images and statues of the king, and brake their neckes: which done, they founded the retreat, went a shipboord, and returned to Pyreæum, from whence they came. But if the number of Romane souldiers had bene such, that they might have kept Chalcis still with a garrison, without quitting and abandoning the defence of Athens, a great matter had been gotten in the very beginning of the warre: to wit, the citie of Chalcis and the passage of Euripus, had bene taken from the king. For as the narrow passe of Thermopyle stoppeth the way into Greece by land, so the streights of Euripus maketh all sure by sea. Philip at that time lay in the citie Demetrias; where, after he heard the newes of the calamitie befallne upon a confederate citie, albeit now it was too late to helpe when all was lost; yet because he would be revenged (which is a thing that cometh neare to the nature of aid and succour) he went forth immediately with five thousand footmen lightly appointed and deliver, and three thousand horsemen, with all the speed and hast he could to reach nere unto Chalcis; making full reckoning that the Romans might be surpris'd on a foddaine: but being disappointed of this hope, and thither come where he could see nothing els but a piteous spectacle of a friend-citie halfe ruinate and still smoking, and so few people left alive, that they hardly were able to bury their dead, he returned as hastily as he came; and having passed over Euripus at a bridge, hee lead straight to Athens by the way of Bacotia, with a deepe perswasion and hope, that a like enterprise unto the Romanes should have the like issue. And verily he had not mislead of the semblable effect, correspondent to his designes, but that a certaine watchman (one of those whome the Greekes call Hemerodromos, that is, posts and carriers that in one daies space will run and rid a mightie deale of ground) descried from a watch-towre the kings troups marching: whereupon hee ran out afore, and came to Athens ere midnight. There were they all asleepe too, and as retchlesse as they of Chalcis were a few daies past, which was the losse of their towne. The Pretor of the Athenians, and Dioxippus the captaine of a regiment of hired strangers and aid-souldiers, awoke at this so fearfull and foddaine tidings and

A gat up, assembled the souldiers into the market-stead, & commanded to sound alarme from the highest place of the citie, that all men might take knowledge that the enemies were nere at hand. By which meanes they ran every man from all parts to the gates and up the walls. Within few houres after, and somewhat before day light, he approached the citie: and seeing many lights everywhere, hearing also a noise of people running to and fro (as in time of such a tumult) he staied his march, and commaunded his souldiours to sit them downe and rest themselves, intending to proceed by overt and open forces, since covert and craftie courses, sped no better: and so at length he came before Dipylos. This Dipylos is a gate, standing in the very front of the citie, greater and wider a good deale than the rest. Both within and without that gate, are large and broad streets, so that both the inhabitants within-forth may marshall an armie, and lead in battaile ray from the common place directly to the gate, and also the enemies without, have roume at will to conduct a power, as well of horse as foot, by meanes of a spacious cauley or high way, which reacheth out almost a mile in length from the foresaid gate, and leadeth to the place of exercise or schoole called Academia. At this quarter of the citie, the Athenians, together with the garrison of Attalus, and the regiment of Dioxippus, issued forth, & entred the cauley above-named, having first within the gate set their men in order of battaile. Which when Philip saw, he made full account, That he had his enemies as he would himselfe to doe his pleasure with them, and that now he should have his fill of a massacre and carnage that he had wished for so long (for there was not a State or citie in all Greece that he maliced more than this of Athens.) And therefore he exhorted and encouraged his souldiours, that they should have their eie upon him ever as they fought, and know well this, that where the king was, there should the banners & guidons be displayed, there should the strength and force of the battaile be: and so he set spurs to his horse, and ran with full carriere to charge the enemies. Thus was he not onely carried away with heat of choler, but ravished also with a desire of glorie, esteeming it a goodly thing, and a matter tending to his great honour, for to be seene fighting in the view of a great multitude of people that had taken up and filled the battlements of the walls (as it were) to behold a solemne spectacle. Thus being advanced a good way before the maine battaile, accompanied with some few men of armes, he rode among the mids of the enemies, where he bare himselfe so valiantly, that as he mightily heartened his own men, so he affrighted no lesse his enemies. Many a one he wounded with his owne hand, reaching at them that were neere, levelling at those that were farther off, and drave them afore him like sheep, and followed hard upon them in person to the very gate; where he made foule worke among them, thronged and crouded as they were together in the streight of the passage, for hast they made to escape, and committed a greivous slaughter. And albeit this was but an unwise & rash adventure of his, yet he retired himselfe in safetie, without farther danger of his person, by reason that they who were placed in the turrets of the gate, forbore to shoot and launce their darts, because they would not hurt their own side, intermingled among the enemies. But after this, when the Athenians kept their souldiours within the walls, Philip founded the retreat, and pitched his tents at Cynosarges, where there was a temple of Hercules, and a schoole of learning, and a grove standing about it. As for Cynosarges, and the school Lyceum, and whatsoever was either religious, or pleasant and delectable about the citie, was burned. And not onely the edifices, but the sepulchres also and monuments of the dead were defaced and cast downe: in which furious heat of anger, nothing was spared, were it sacred or profane, without regard of God and man. The next morrow, when the gates were first kept shut, and afterwards set open againe upon a suddaine, because the garrison of Attalus entred into the citie from Ægina, and the Romane from Pyreæum side; Philip dislodged and remooved backe from the citie almost three miles. From whence he went to Eleusine, hoping to surpris the temple at unwares, together with the towne and castle, which both environneth the temple, and commaundeth the same. But when he perceived that the corps de guard was not neglected, and that a fleet besides was coming from Pyreæum to succour them, he gave over this designe, and led his armie to Megara, and so streight forward immediately to Corinth: and having intelligence, that the Achæi held a generall Diet and counsell at Argos, thither hee came unlockedgion there was, about waging warre with Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians: Who seeing, that the seignorie of Achæa was taken from Philopemenes and conferred upon Cycliades, a captaine not to bee named and compared with him, and perceiving also that the aids which the Achæans

Achæans had, were fallen from them and gone, took their vantage, renewed the old quarrell, and made fresh war upon them, waisting the villages and territories of the borderers, yea, and threatening the good towns and cities also. Now whiles they sat devising and conferring together what number of souldiours should be levied and enrolled out of every severall state and citie, for to withstand this common enemy, Philip frankly promised to ease them all of that care as touching Nabis and the Lacedæmonians; and not onely to impeach them for spoiling the lands of their Allies, but also to lead his armie out of hand into the very territorie of Laconica and Sparta, and thither to turne the whole terror of this warre. This kind speech and friendly offer of his, being with a generall applause of them all accepted. Marrie, this you must (quoth he) take with all, that good reason it is, whiles I my selfe am content to defend and maintaine your countrie by my forces, mine owne territories in the meane time bee not disurnished of their garriſons, and left naked: and therefore, if yee thinke good, provide me as many souldiours as may suffice for the guard of Oreum, Chalcis, and Corinth, that thus making all sure behind me, I may be secured from daunger that way, and with more resolution prosecute the war against Nabis and the Lacedæmonians. The Achæans smelled him quickly, and knew full well, to what end this gracious promise of his & frank offer of aid against the Lacedæmonians tended. His only drift was to draw forth of Peloponnesus the youth and floure of the Achæans, as a pledge and sure hostage, for to engage the whole nation, so farre as they should be interested in the warre that he had with the Romanes. Cyclades the Pretor of the Achæans, thinking it bootlesse, and no good policie, to discover so much and to enforce that point against him, inserted onely this speech and said, That it was not lawfull by the customes and ordnances of the Achæans, to propose other matters to parle of, than those for which they were assembled together: & so after the order enacted for levying & waging an armie against Nabis, he dissolved & brake up the assembly, which he now had held right stoutly and with the libertie of the place, who otherwise, before that time was taken ever for no better than one of the kings flatterers and favorites. Thus Philip put besides the great hopes that he had conceived, levied some small number of voluntarie souldiours, and returned to Corinth and the land of Attica.

During the time that Philip was in Achæa, Philocles a captain under the king, departed out of Eubœa with two thousand Thracians and Macedonians, for to waite and spoile the confines of the Athenians; and over against Eleusina passed over the Forrest and hill Cytheron, from whence having sent out the one halfe of his forces every way to prey upon the plain country, he sat himselfe downe close with the other halfe in a convenient place for an ambush, to the end, that if peradventure they should make out from the fort at Eleusina, and set upon his souldiours as they drave booties, hee might suddainly arise and charge upon the enemies at unawares, spread and scattered all abroad. But this ambushment was discovered. And therefore after he had called the soldiers back who were run al abroad a boothaling, he put them in order well armed & appointed to besiege and assault the fort of Eleusina, against which he led all his forces: but after much hurt and many a wound received from them he retired, and joined with Philip as he returned out of Achæa. The king also himselfe in person, assailed to force and batter the said hold: but the Roman ships comming from Pyreæum, and a fresh garriſon received into the place, caused him perforce to give over the enterprise. After this the king divided his power, and sent one part thereof against Athens, under the conduct of Philocles, & himselfe with the other marched to Pyreæum: that whiles Philocles kept the Athenians within the citie, by approaching their walls, and threatening to besiege and assault it, he might himselfe with facilitie win and gaine Pyreæum, wherein there was left but a smal & slight guard. But he found as hot a peece of service about the assailing of Pyreæum, as before at Eleusina, by reason of the saine souldiours in manner, that defended as well the one as the other. So on a suddaine he departed from Pyreæum, and marched directly toward Athens. From whence he was repulsed and chased by a suddain fallie both of horse and foot, made from the streights of the wall halfe ruinate; which wall stretching out, as it were, two arms, joyneth the port Pyreæum to Athens. So he left battering and assaulting the citie, and parting againe his armie with Philocles, he went out to forrey and spoile the countrie: and as in his former sackage he exercised himselfe in demolishing the temples all about the citie, so because he would leave nothing entire and safe, he commaunded the chappels of the gods, which were consecrate in every village and hamlet, to be pulled downe, rased, and burnt.

The countrie of Attica was mervailously beautified and embellished (as it were) with goodly peeces

A peece of worke in that kind, (by reason as well of the store they had of native marble, as also of their industrious and excellent workemen) which ministred matter and occasion unto him of this outrage and madnesse. For not contented and satisfied with the ruine of the temples, and casting downe of images, he commaunded that the very stones should be broken and hattered in peeces, that least being whole and sound they might serve to make up and stop the breaches of the ruines. And after that his fell mood and anger was not so much satisfied and satiate, as it wanted matter to worke upon in that place, he departed out of his enemies countrie into Boeotia, and performed no other deed in Greece worthy of remembrance.

Sulpitius the Consull at that time lay in camp betwene Apollonia* and Dyrrachium*, neere the river Apfus: and having caused T. Apustius the Lieutenant to come thither, he sent him with part of his forces to waite the borders of his enemies. Apustius after he had forraied the frontiers of Macedonie, and forced at the first assault certaine holds, as Corrhagum, Gerrhenium, and Orgeſsum, came with his armie before Antipatria, a citie seated in the narrow streights of a certaine passage. And first he called forth the principall and chiefe citizens to a parlie, and assayed to persuade and induce them for to commit themselves under the protection and savaeguard of the Romanes: but afterwards, seeing they trusted upon the greatnes, the strong walls and situation of the towne, and therefore made no reckning of his motives, but rejected them, he assailed it by force of armes, and wan it in the end. All that were above fourteene yeeres of age he put to the sword; the whole pillage he dealt amongst the souldiours; the walls he rased, and set fire on the towne. The feare of like miserie was the cause that Codrio, a towne of good strength and well fortified, was yeelded to the Romanes without assault, or any sword drawne. There he left a garriſon: and after that, he forced Ilium, a towne better knowne for the name that it carieth of the other famous Ilium in Asia, than for any thing els. As the Lieutenant returned with a great bootie to the Consull, one Athenagoras a captain under the king, charged upon the taile of the arriergard, disordered the hindmost, and impeached their passage over the river: but the Lieutenant, at their crie and sodaine affright rode in all hast back, caused them to turne againe and make head, set them in battaile ray, and bestowed all their bag and baggage in the mids upon a heape. The kings souldiours not able to abide the violence of the Romanes, were many of them slaine, and more taken prisoners. So, the Lieutenant having retired his armie in safetie, was immediately sent back unto the Consull to the Armada.

D The warre being thus begun, and the exploit of this first expedition happily performed, the princes, potentates, and LL. that bordered upon the Macedonians, repaired into the Roman camp, to wit, Pleuratus the sonne of Scerdiletus, Aminander king of the Athamanes: and from Dardania, Bato the sonne of Longarus. This Longarus had waged warre aforetime in his owne name and quarell, with Demetrius the father of this Philip. These States offering and promising their aids unto the Consull, had this answer from him, That for the Dardanians and Pleuratus, he would use them, when hee entred with an host into Macedonie. As for Aminander, hee gave him in charge the while to sollicite the Ætolians to warre. The Embassadors of king Attalus (for they also were come at the same time) hee dispatched with this order, That their king should attend the comming of the Roman fleet at Egina, where hee wintered; with which & his owne jointly together, he should assaile Philip at sea, like as he had done beforetime. Embassadors also were addrested to the Rhodians, that they likewise should have their hand and be seene in this warre. Philip for his part foreslowed not to make preparation (for now by this time was he come into Macedonie) & sent with part of his forces for to keep the streights of the passage of Pelagonia, his son Perseus, a very child of yong yeers, having chosen certain of his trustie friends, to direct and govern his tender age. As for Sciathus* & Peparethus*, two towns of no smal importance he destroyed, for fear the enemies fleet should seize upon them, & with their pillage content & pay themselves. He sent likewise embassadors to the Ætolians (a nation inconstant & unquiet by nature) that they should not upon the arrivall of the Romanes, change their alleageance. Now the Diet or generall councill of all the states of Ætolia, which they call Panætolium, was to be held at a certaine day appointed. And therefore to prevent and meet with all dangers, both the kings embassadors made hast to bee present thereat; and also L. Furius Purpurio presented himselfe there, as sent embassador from the Consull. The Athenian embassadors likewise were at this assembly. And first the Macedonians (with whome a league was but lately concluded, and therefore freshest in remembrance) had audience, who said, They had no new matter to speake of, seeing there was no new occurrent and business fallen out: onely this, that upon what motives and considerations they were entred into an accord and peace with king Philip, (as having experience that the alliance with the Romanes never did them good) for the very same they should maintaine it still, being once concluded & confirmed. Or love ye rather (qd. one above the rest of the embassadours) to imitate the Romanes licentiousnes or their levitie, I know not whether? who, as they gave order & commaundement, that your embassadours being at Rome, should receive their dispatch & answer in these termes: Come ye now to us indeed my masters of Ætolia, when without our consent and warrant ye have made peace with Philip? so likewise at this present are readie to require that ye should band with them, and warre upon Philip. They pretended aforetime that they tooke armes against him, by occasion of you, in your quarell and defence; and now they forbid you to be in peace with Philip. At first, they entred into Sicilie for to aid and succor Messana. A second time they went thither to set free and deliver Syracusa out of the oppression of the Carthaginians. And now at this time they hold in possession both Messana and Syracusa: and all Sicilie entier they have made it tributarie, yea and reduced it into the forme of a province, to be ruled under their sword, and the jurisdiction of their deputies and magistrates. In good faith, I assure you, that as ye according to your lawes and customes hold your Diets & Counsels at Naupactum, by your own magistrates elected & created among your selves, wherein ye have libertie to make choise both of friends and enemies whom ye wil, and to entertaine either peace or warre at your pleasure: so, writs are sent out to the States of Sicilie for their knights and burgeses, to assemble in Parlement at Saracose, at Messana, or Lilybæum. And the Romane Pretor it is and no other that summoneth them thither, as also to their Assises and Sessions: at his commaundement & not otherwise they are cited to generall Counsels. Him they see sitting on high in his tribunall seate, guarded with Lictors, attended upon with Vthers, there to heare & determine causes, & from aloft to pronounce hard sentences & proud awards. His rods threaten their backs and sides, his axes are readie to chop their heads from their shoulders: and from yeere to yeere new lords still they choose & send among them. And this dealing, none of them either can or ought to mervaile at: for why? they see cities of Italie, by name Rhegyum, Tarentum, and Capua, (to speake nothing of their neighbour townes, by whose fall they arose, by whose ruines Rome grew mightie) subject likewise to the same rule and government. As for Capua, the very sepulcher and tombe of the Campane nation (now that the naturall people thereof are either dead and buried, or driven out as exiled persons) remaineth at this day as a monster and wonder in nature, resembling a headlesse and limlesse dismembred trunk of a bodie: a towne (I say) without Senate, without Comminaltie, without magistrates: where more crueltie was shewed, in leaving it to it selfe thus abandoned, and in this manner to be inhabited, than if it had bene cleane rased and laid even with the ground. Meere folly it is and without all sense and reason, to beleve or hope, that if these strangers and aliens borne (who differ more from us in language, in customes and lawes, than they are distant and disjoyned by space betwene of land and sea) be once seized and possessed of these places, that anything will continue long entier in the present state. The kingdome of Philip (ye will say) is a block in your way, and seemeth to prejudice your freedome and liberties: yet he being made your heavie friend, and that through your owne fault and desert, required no other thing at your hands for amends, but peace; and even now desireth nought els but your alliance, and the faithfull observance of the same. Acquaint foreign legions once with this your country: you take the yoke of servitude upon your necks for ever. Accept the Romanes once for your lords: too late it will be then and in vaine for you, to seeke Philip againe, and wish him your allie. Small matters and momentanie occasions may well cause the Ætoliens, Acarnanians and Macedonians, (men of one language) to fall out, and as slender motives, will soone make them friends againe: a little thing setteth them at a jarre, and as little bringeth them in tune. But all Grecians both are and ever will be at warre with Barbarians: enemies they are by nature, which is perpetuall and immutable; and not by occasions which alter every day. But where I began my speech, there will I leave and make an end. In this very place you the same men, agreed three yeeres past to have peace with Philip: and the selfesame Romanes as they misliked then and disfavoured that peace, so now they will needs disquiet and trouble it after it is once passed and accorded. And since the case still is all one, and fortune hath made no alteration, I see no reason why ye should varie and change your minds.

After

After the Macedonians, the Atheniens entred in place, for the Romanes were wel contented therewith, and would needs have it so: These Atheniens having suffered many wrongs and indignities at the kings hands, had juster cause of complaint, and more reason to inveigh and aggravate matter against his crueltie and outrageous dealings. First, they bewailed the piteous spoile and miserable sackage of their territories: neither complained they so much and found themselves grieved, in that they had sustained harmes and suffered hostilitie from an enemy, (for there be certain lawes and rights belonging unto warre, by vertue whereof, to geve and take, to suffer harme and to do harme interchangeably, is an ordinarie matter and allowable: As for example, the burning of standing corne in the field, rasing and pulling downe of houses, harrying and driving of booties both of men and cattaille, rather pitefull calamities, than shamefull indignities to endure.) But this is the point say they, and hereof we complaine, That he who termed the Romanes, strangers borne, & barbarous, hath so polluted and violated at once all lawes of God and man: so as in his former rode and expedition he seemed to make most impious war with the infernall gods and spirits beneath: and in the second, with the heavenly powres and gods above. All the monuments and tombes within their confines are defaced and destroyed: the dead in their graves are all laid bare, not so much as the bones of any one lye covered with mould. Temples we had and chappells, which, as in times past when our auncestors inhabited those small holts, hamlets and villages, they consecrated and hallowed: so when they were reduced into one citie, and enrolled into wards and parishes, they forooke not nor abandoned altogether. Round about these sacred churches hath Philip set fire, and consumed all: the holy images of the gods, lye some scorched and halfe burnt: others headlesse & dismembred, among the pillars & poits of the temples throwne along on the ground. And looke what foule work he hath made in the country of Attica, so rich & so bewtifully adorned in times past, the like havock he if he might be let alone, would he make in Ætolia and in all Greece throughout. For had not the Romanes come in time to succour, our very citie also had bene so served, and piteously disfigured. For with like mischievous intent came he to the citie which worshipped those gods, not sparing the goddesse Minerva, the patronesse and protectresse of our towne and castle: the same wicked mind he caried against the temple of Ceres Eleusina: and no better affected was he to Julia and Minerva in Pyreæum. But being repulsed by force and armes not only from our temples, but also from the walls of our citie, he wreaked his anger and raged, against those chapels and religious houses, which had nothing for their defence, but only the reverent regard of the gods, whereof he had none. Hereupon, they prayed and humbly besought the Ætoliens, to have compassion of the Atheniens, and to enterprise the warre, under the conduct first of the immortal gods, and then of the Romanes, who next to the gods are most powfull and mighty. Then the Romane embassadour spake in this wise. The Macedonians first, & after them the Atheniens, have altered the whole course & forme of my speech. For, whereas my comming hither was to complaine of the injuries done by Philip to so many cities of our allies and associates: ther was to complaine of the injuries done by Philip to so many cities of our allies and associates: rather to employ my wits in making a defence of our selves, than in framing an accusation against others. The Atheniens againe in reckning up and recounting the impious, abominable, and inhumane parts of king Philip committed against the gods, both above and beneath, what have they left behind for me or any man els to object against him besides? What they have said, you may well thinke, and truly suppose, that the men of Chios, Abydus, Aenus, Maronea, Thasos, Paros, Samos, Larissa and Messene; those also heere of Achaia, Complaine of the same, yea and of more grievous and cruell enormities; as whom he had grea- ter meanes to annoy and hurt. As for such things as hee hath laid to our charge, if they deserve not honor and glorie, I confesse they can not be answered and defended. Reproched us he hath with Rhegyum, with Capua, and Saracose. I cannot denie, but, during the warre of Pyrrhus wee sent a legion to Rhegyum, there to lye in garison at the instant prayer of the Rhégines themselves, who requested us to send them. This legion I confesse, most wickedly and treacherously seized upon the citie, and possessed it to their owne use, for the guard and defence whereof they were first sent. Avowed wee (I pray you) that act of theirs? Nay, pursued wee not by armes that leaud legion and ungratious? and when wee had them in our power and at our devotion, forced not wee them to make amends and satisfaction to our allies, with the smart of their backe and sides, and with the losse of their heads in the end?

And when wee had so done, restored wee not unto the Rhegynes their citie, their lands, G all their goods whatsoever, together with their liberties, franchises, and lawes? As for the Syracusians, when they were oppressed by straunge and forraigne tyrants, wee judging it to be a great indignitie, relieved and succoured them: and after we had bene (for three yeeeres space almost) wearied and toiled out with continuall siege and uncessant assault both by land and sea of their citie, so exceeding strong and so well fortified, we seeing that the Syracusians themselves made choice rather to be in servitude under those tyrants, than to be taken by us, gave them their citie againe, both forced and freed by the same armies. Neither denie we that Sicilie is our province; and that the cities which took part and sided with the Carthaginians, and joyntly with them accorded to wage warre against us, are tributaries unto us and pay us yearly rents and pensions: nay we are so farre from not taking this upon us, that contrariwise wee would, that both H you and all nations besides well knew, that every one received at our hands that measure of fortune that he duly deserved. And now as touching the Capuans, should we repent that wee have chastised them in such sort, whereof they themselves verily can not complaine? These men, after we had maintained warre against the Samnites in their quarrell and defence, for the space well neare of seventie yeeeres, to no small dispende of ours, and with many a losse and overthrow, after we had linked them unto us, first by league and alliance, then by marriage and affinitie, and last of all, by freedome and burgeoise of our citie: these men I say, in our adversitie, were the first of all other nations of Italie, that vilanously massacred our garrison there, and revolted unto Annibal: and then for very spight and indignation that they were by us besieged, sent Annibal to assault the citie of Rome. And if we had proceeded in that rigour against them, that we had left I neither citie standing nor any one person of them living, who could take offence thereat, and justly say, That they had bene more hardly entreated and dealt withall than they deserved? There were more of them, that upon touch and pricke of guiltie conscience for their leaud and wicked deeds, made themselves away and so perished, than were by us executed and put to death. As for the rest, we took from them indeed their town, we deprived them of their possessions and livings, yet so, as we left them both lands to occupie, and place to dwell in: the guiltlesse towne it selfe we suffered to stand still safe and sound, that whosoever at this day seeth it, can not find the least token or shew of a citie either forced or wooen. But what speake I of Capua? seeing wee have af-flooded unto Carthage (a citie conquered and subdued) both peace and also libertie: In so much K as we have cause rather to be afraid, least by remissenesse and over-willingnes to pardon those whome we have vanquished, we give occasion to many more to be so bold as to trie the hazard and fortune of warre against vs. And thus much I had to say in defence of our selves. Now somewhat I have to speake against king Philip; whose horrible murders committed upon those of his owne house, even his neerest kinsfolke and friends; whose loose life and unbridled lust (more unkind and inhumane in manner than his crueltie) yee know better than are neerer unto Macedon. As for you, my masters of Aetolia, we have for your sakes begun warre with Philip, and you againe without us have concluded peace with him. It may be you will alledge, that whiles we were occupied in the Punicke warre, yee were forced and compelled for feare, to take such contritions of peace at his hands, who was the stronger: we likewise (pressed with greater affaires and troubles) forbore to prosecute and follow that warre, which by you first was laid L downe and given over. At this present, seeing by the grace and goodnesse of the gods the Pu-nicke warre is come to an end, both we have employed and bent all our forces against Macedonie, and ye also have good occasion and opportunitie offered to reenter into amitie and alliance with us, unlesse ye had rather perish with Philip, than vanquish with the Romanes.

When the Romane Embassadour had ended this Oration, the Aetolians generally were enclined and affected to the Romanes: but Damocritus their Pretor (corrupted as the speech went with a summe of money received from king Philip, and made for him) gave assent neither to the one partie nor the other, but said, That in counsels of great weight and importance, there was nothing more hurtfull and prejudiciall, than hast: for repentance (qd. he) follow it never so soone, when a thing is once done, yet it commeth too late and booteth not: considering, that rash M counsels can not be revoked, haltie and headlong courses cannot possibly be recalled, nor matters once past be reduced againe to their former state. As for the proper time of that resolution now in hand, whereof my selfe am of advise, that the due maturitie and full ripenesse should be expected, it might now at this present be set downe and concluded upon. For seeing that by our lawes

A lawes and ordinances provided it is, that we may not treat of any affaires concerning peace or warre, but in the generall counsels called Panætolaik or Pylaik: therefore for the present I would have you to ordaine and decree, that your Pretour without fraud or covin might call and hold a Diet or court of Parliament, whensoever he is minded to treat of warre or peace; and whatsoever then and there shall be propofed and determined, it may stand in as good force, strength, and vertue, as if it had passed in a full Panætolaik or Pylaik counsell. Thus the embassadours being dismissed and sent away in suspence, and nothing decided and concluded, he said, That hee had performed a singular peece of service to his nation and countrey. For now they would side and take part with those, whose fortune it were to speed better in the field. Thus went matters in the assembly of the Aetolians.

Now Philip with all diligence prepared for warre both by sea and land. His sea forces hee assembled together unto Demetrias, a port in Thessalie; making account, that Attalus and the Ro-mane flect would in the beginning of the next spring depart from Aegina. Over his navie and all the sea coasts he appointed Heraclides Admirall, like as he had done aforetime. Him selfe levied and gathered his land-forces, supposing verily that hee had debarred and bereft the Romanes of two great meanes of aid, to wit, the Aetolians of the one side, & the Dardaniens of the other; in that the narrow streights and passage of Pelagonia, was stopped and made sure against them by his sonne Persus. The Consull on the other side made not preparations for warre, but was on foot and in action already, conducting his armie through the confines of the Dassaretiens, and transporting with him out of his wintering harbor all the provision of grain, whereof the country C yielded him sufficient to the maintenance of his soldiers. The great towns and villages were sur-rendred unto him, partly for love and partly for feare: some were forced by assault, others abandoned by the inhabitants, and were found desolate, by reason that the barbarous people were retired into the mountaines neare by, to save themselves: and at Lingum neare the river Bevus he encamped; from whence hee sent to purvey for corne out of the garners and barnes of the Dassaretiens. Philip saw well enough that the country all about was in an hurrie, and the people in great feare and fright; but being uncertaine to what place the Consull intended to march, he sent out a cornet of light horsemen as espials to discover what way the enemies tooke, and whither they pretended to goe. The Consull likewise for his part was as doubtfull: well hee wist that Philip was dislodged from the places where he had wintered, but in what quarter he journeyed, he D knew not: and therefore hee also had set forth certaine horse in espiall to scoure the coasts. These two bands or troupes from divers and contrarie parts, encountered in the end in one way, after they had a long time wandered at adventure through the countrey of the Dassaretiens. Both parties knew well by the noise they heard a farre off, as well of men as horse, that enemies ap-proched; and therefore they had both horse and armour in readines, before they were in sight one of another: for so soone as ever they were within their entervieu, they made no stay, but charged immediatly and joyned issue. It fortuned, that for number and valour both, they were equally matched, as being choice and elect men of either side: whereupon they fought for certaine houres alike, untill such time as their owne wearines and the faintnesse of their horses parted the battaile in doubtfull victorie. Of the Macedonians there died 40 horsemen: and of the E Romans, five & thirty. And for all this, neither brought the Macedonians any better intelligence to their king, nor the Romans to their Consull, of the place where the enemies were incamped.
But certaine fugitive traitours gave advertisement thereof: who commonly in all warres, upon a running head and light humour that naturally they have, are given to hearken after news, and to enquire in what tearmes enemies stand. Philip imagining that it would avails somewhat both to purchase the affectionate love of his souldiours, and also to induce them more cheere-fully and readily to undertake all hazards for his sake, in case hee seemed to have a carefull regard to burie those horsemen which were slaine in the journey and expedition afore said; commaunded their bodies to be brought into the campe, to the end, that all men might see what honour hee did them in their funerals. But see how nothing is more uncertaine, nor whereof a man may F make lesse reckoning than the minds and affections of the multitude! That which was thought would have made them more willing and forward to enter into any daunger and jeopardie whatsoever, even that, wrought a contrarie effect, and caused them to be most fearefull and backward.
For they who were used to fight with Greeks and Illyrians, and to see mens bodies wounded with push of pike, galled with arrowes, and pierced with launce here and there, in this or that part; Y y y after

after they beheld once their fellowes so butcherly mangled with the Spanish curtelaes and arming swords, the armes cut away from the bodie, the heads either smitten clean off by the neck, or cloven down right, and lying on the shoulders; their paunches ript with the bowels open, and guts drawing after; with other deepe wounds and broad slashes, most hideous and fearefull to behold; then they saw all full well (fearefull creatures as they were) what manner of weapons, and what kind of men they were to deale against. Nay the king himselfe was terribly afraid, who had not as yet encountered with the Romanes in any set field. Whereupon he sent for his son, to come backe with the garrison that he had in the streights of Pelagonia, thereby to encrease and strengthen his owne forces: and so laid open the way into Macedonia, for Pleuratus & the Dardaniens. Himselfe in person with a power of twentie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, guided by the fugitives abovesaid, marched toward the enemy, and about a quarter of a mile or somewhat lesse from the Romane campe, possessed himselfe of a little hill neere to Athacum, which he fortified with trench and rampier. From whence, when he beheld the Romanes encamped hard under him, he wondered (by report) to see not only the whole bodie of the camp, with the form and order thereof in generall, but also how every part was raunged and set out in severall, both in the manner of quartering and pitching their pavilions, and also in the proportion of the waies for breadth and length betweene. And having viewed and considered every thing accordingly: Beleeve me (quoth he) there is no man who seeth this, that can either thinke or say, it is the campe of a barbarous nation. For two daies space the Consull and the king (expecting one anothers attempts and enterprises) kept their souldiours close within their holds. When the third day was come, the Romane Generall brought forth his whole power into the field. But the king fearing to hazard all so soone upon a cast, drew forth foure hundred Triballians (which were, as we have said elsewhere, of the Illyrian nation) and three hundred Cretensians, all footmen, accompanied with the like number of horsemen; and sent them under the conduct of Athenagoras, one of his courtiers and gallants, for to brave the Cavallerie of the enemies, and to challenge them to fight. The Romanes, whose maine battaile was little above halfe a mile off, put out against them their light armed vantage-curriers, & as it were, two companies or cornets of horsemen: to the end, that they might be equall with the enemy in number, both of foot and horse. They of the kings part supposed verily, that they should fight after their old and accustomed manner: namely, that the horsemen should by turnes, one while ride forward in the face of the enemy, other while retire againe; sometime follow in chase and have use of their darts and weapons, and sometime turne and shew their backe parts; that the nimblenesse and activitie of the Illyrians would stand in good steed to make excursions and suddaine skirmishes; also that the Cretensian archers should be employed in shooting arrowes aloofe at the enemies, as they advanced and came forward, or flung out all abroad on every side: but the violent charge of the Romanes, no lesse continuall and obstinate, than fierce and eager, put them quite out of this manner of service, and disordered all. For no otherwise than if it had been a set battaile betweene two entier armies, their footmen lightly armed, so soone as they had launced and let goe their javelins from them, tooke them to their swords, and came to hand fight: the horsemen likewise, no sooner affronted the enemies, but either staying their horses they fought on horsebacke, or els alighted on foot, and among the footmen maintained the medley. By this means neither the kings Cavallerie could match the Romanes, because they had not been used to a steadie battell; nor his footmen who were wont to traverse their ground, and skirmish, never standing still, and withall in manner halfe naked for any harness they had, was able to make their parts good with the Roman light appointed footmen, who had their swords and bucklers, and were furnished with armour, as well defensive as offensive. So they could not endure long to maintaine fight, but were forced to retire into their campe, and by nothing els saved themselves but by good footmanship and riding apace. There passed one day betweene, when the king minding to trie a conflict with all his forces of Cavallerie, and footmen lightly appointed, had laid in await by night certaine targatiers, whom they call Pelastae, in a convenient place betweene both campes, and given direction and charge unto Athenagoras and his men of armes, That if they sped well in open battell & plaine fight, they should on still and follow their good fortune: but if they went by the worse, and were too weak, they should give ground by little and little, and traine the enemy to the place of ambush. Well, it fell out so, that the horsemen indeed reculed accordingly, but the leaders of that cohort aforesaid of targatiers, not attending the signall long ynough, but raising their men out

A of ambush before due time, lost the opportunitee of playing their part, and performing a good peece of service.

The Romane Consull having both obtained victorie in ouvert battell, and escaped the danger of a covert traine, retired himselfe into his campe. The morrow after, he came down into the plaine field with all his forces, and put them in battell array, having arraigned his elephants in the forefront of the vaward. And this was the first time that ever the Romanes had use in their warres, of this beast; by occasion, that in the late Punicke war, they had taken some of them alive from their enemies. But perceiving that Philip kept himselfe close within his campe, hee approached under the very rampier, yea, and reproched him for his cowardise. And seeing for all that, he could not even then be drawne to a battell: considering also, that if he kept there a standing campe long, so neere unto the enemy, his provision of corne should bee exposed to dangers; B for no sooner should the purveyors and forragers be gone abroad into the countrey, and spread over the fields, but the enemies light horsemen would be readie at their heeles to fetch them in, and cause them to come short home: therefore he removed his campe to a place almost eight miles off, called Octolophum, where he might make his provision with lesse danger. Now when the Romanes purveied for corne and victuals in the territorie thereabout, and were come upon a time somewhat neere and within danger of Philip, at first the king let them alone, and kept his men within their campe, to the end, that they might be more bold and venturous, and withall, lesse warie and circumspect: but espying them once stragling asunder here and there out of order, he set forward with all his Cavallerie, and the auxiliaries of the Candiotes, and marched so fast, as the swiftest of his footmen by running might keepe pace with the horsemen: thus having gotten betweene them and home, he pitched downe his ensignes betwix the Romane camp and the forragers. Then divided he his forces in two companies, the one he sent forth to course and chase them, so dispersed as they were; giving speciall charge and direction, not to leave any of them alive that they could reach: with the other he staid himselfe behind, and beset all the waies, and stopped the passages by which the enemies were like to retire and have recourse unto their campe. Soone were they killed or put to flight in every place, and as yet not one escaped to the Romane campe, for to bring newes of this discomfiture: for, as many as fled backe, chaunced upon the guard that the king had set: and more were slaine by them that beset the waies, than those that were sent out to the pursuite and execution. At length some happened to escape through the midst of the kings corps de guard, and in great hast and fearefull manner came into the campe with a troublesome noise and tumult, rather than any certaine tidings. D The Consull, after order given to the horsemen, that every man should succour and rescue what way soever hee could, their distressed fellowes in this extremitie, himselfe led forth the legions out of the campe, and marching in a fouresquare battaillon advanced toward the enemies. The horsemen being spread over the fields in divers places, some lost their right way, being deceived by other outcries heard from a contrary part: otherwise met with their enemies, and at one instant, the skirmish began in many and sundrie places. The band that guarded about the king, fought most fiercely and cruelly: for both they were for their owne number as well of horse as foote, a full armie welneere; and also most of the Romanes light upon them, because they kept the very port and rodeway in the middes. In this regard also were the Macedonians the better and had the vantage, because the king himselfe was present in person to encourage and exhort them: and withall the auxiliarie Candiotes wounded many of the Romanes ere they were aware of them: for why, they were well prepared aforehand, raunged thicke and close together, and so fought against them that rode skattering abroad one from another, and without array. And verily, if they could have kept any mean and measure in their chase, they had mightily advanced themselves, not onely in winning the honor of that day, but also, in the maine point of the whole warre. But pursuing them beyond all reason, and without discretion, upon a bloudthirstie desire that they had of massacre, they chaunced upon the Romane squadrons which were gone before with the Tribunes and Colonels: in so much as the horsemen aforesaid, who before fled, when they once saw the ensignes of their owne infanterie, reined their horse heads, and turned againe upon the enemy that ran with bridle in horse neck: and so in the turning of an hand, the fortune of the battaile chaunged and came about, and they that erewhile made pursute, now shewed their backs, and fled amaine. Many of them were slaine that came to close handfight, many likewise of those that ran away. Neither fell they all upon the edge of the sword, for some there were who plunged into bogs and marishes, where both horse and man G sunke in the deep mud & mire, & so were swallowed up & perished. The king himselfe also was in great daunger: for his horse being wounded under him and fallen, he also came headlong down to the ground, and hardly escaped, but hee had been troden under foot, and mischeved as hee lay along. One horseman above the rest saved his life, who hastily leapt himselfe from horsebacke, and withall mounted the king (so skared as he was) upon his owne horse: who being now on foote, and not able to run as fast as the horsemen that fled away, was with many a stab and thrust soone dispatched by the enemies that came running together to the king when he was seene to fall. And the king after he had ridden in fearefull flight about the fenny meeres, one while where there was some way, and otherwhiles where there was none at all to be seene, chaunced at length to come to his camp, when most men were in despaire that he could possibly escape in safetie. H In this skirmish there were two hundred Macedonians slaine, a hundred almost taken prisoners: four-score brave and goodly courfers, with rich caparisons and other furniture, together with the spoile of faire armours caried away.

There were that blamed the king for being too rash that day, and the Consull for his slacknesse. For Philip, say they, should have kept him quiet in rest and repose, knowing, as he did, that the enemies within few dayes would have bene brought to extreame want and penurie, now that the territorie all about was cleane spoiled and wasted. And the Consull for his part, when he had foiled the Cavallerie and light armed souldiours of the enemies, and as good as taken the king prisoner, ought presently to have advanced against the kings camp: for never would the enemies so discomfited have stood to it: and so in the minute of an houre, they had bene vanquished for ever. This is soone said, but (as most things els) not so soone done. For in case that the king had likewise brought forth into the field all his Infanterie, peradventure in that tumult, when all his men were discomfited and driven to flie out of the field to their camp, yea and to keepe within the rampiar, for feare of the enemy, readie upon his victorie to get over the counterescarp and other fortifications, the king might have bene defeized of his hold, and lost all. Again considering, that the whole power of Philip his footmen remained still intier within the camp, the corps de garde before the gates warding the sentinels & watch set in convenient places of the rampiar attending: what other good should the Consull have done in advancing thither, but imitated the rash foolhardinesse of the king, who a little before so hotely followed the chase of the horsemen discomfited? Neither was the kings first designement to be re-proved and found fault with, when he charged upon the foragers, skattered as they were over all the fields: if he could have seene when he was well, and have used his good hand in measure and moderation. Lesse mervail it is besides, that he was willing to trie the fortune of a battaile; because there ran a rumor, that Pleuratus and the Dardanians were departed from home, and with a puissant power entred already into Macedonie: And if hee thus were beset round about with these armies, there was no doubt but the Romanes might have vanquished and subdued him, and never stirred foote for the matter. Philip therefore supposing that upon these two late received foiles of the horsemen, he should have but unquiet and dangerous sitting in the same standing camp still: and minding to dislodge from thence, and in his remove to beguile the enemie and not be seene, dispatched a Pursivant at armes or herald unto the Consull, a little before sunne setting, to crave surcease of armes, untill he had buried his horsemen that were slaine: and at the reliefe of the second watch he deceived the enemy; for leaving many fires through all his camp, he marched without any noyse and departed. The Consull had newly supped, and was going to rest, when he was advertised that a Pursivant was come, and what his errand was.
And for the present, he made the messenger no other answer but this, that the next morning he would talke with him, and geve him audience. But Philip by this meanes got the advantage of that whole night, and part of the next day, to gaine riddance of way in his journey, which was the only thing he sought for. And toward the mountaines he tooke his flight, for that way he with well the Romanes would not follow after, with an armie so heavie and charged as it was. M The Consull by day breake, graunted the Pursivant a cessation of armes, and gave him his dispatch: but it was not long after that he was advertised how the enemy was gone: and not knowing which way to follow after, he passed some few dayes in foraging and purveying provision all about the place where he lay encamped.

After this he marched to Strubera, and gathered together all the graine that was to be had about

A about Pellagonia. From thence he went forward as farr as to Pluvina, and all this while knew not for certeine into what quarter of the countrey the enemies were retired. Philip having first set him downe and encamped before Bruana, and departed from thence by crosse and crooked wayes, strucke a sodaine feare into the enemy, whereupon the Romanes dislodged from Pluvina, and neere unto the river Ospagus pitched their pavilions. The king likewise rested himselfe not farr from thence, and had cast a trench and rayed a rampiar along the banks of the river, which the inhabitants call Erigonus. And after he was for certein advertised, that the Romanes intended to goe to Erduea, he marched afore to seize upon the streights, and to empeach the enemies, that they should not gaine the passage that lyeth as it were in a narrow gullet, barred and enclosed on each side. There hee raised in one place a rampier, and B cast a trench in another; made barricadoes heere and there, partly by piling stones up on heapes in steed of a wall, partly by felling of trees acrosse, according as either the ground would geve leave, or the place afforded matter: And thus stopping up all the wayes by sundrie devises and meanes, hee made the place (to his thinking) both unpassable and imprena-ble, which of it selfe by nature was hard enough and troublesome. The countrey all about was for the most part Forrests, and full of wood, verie incommodious, especially for that manner of battailons and ordinance of array, which the Macedonians call Phalanx: which serveth them in small or no steed at all, unlesse with their long pikes they may make a pallisade, or hay (as it were) and oppose them before their shields: which they cannot well doe, unlesse they have free scope and libertie of plaine and open ground. The Thracians also were C foully troubled and combed with their speares named Rhomphaea, which were likewise of a mightie length, and by reason thereof (catching as they did, and snarling within the boughes and branches of trees that grew in their way every where about) hindered them verie much.
There remained the Cohort or band of the *Candiot*es, that seemed of some use for to be employed. And yet the same also as it was able to discharge arrowes against both horse and man, and to annoy them so long as they lay open and exposed to shot, if happily they offered to charge; so they were not of strength sufficient to drive their shafts level, and to pierce through the Roman targets: for otherwise there was no part of the bodie offered it selfe unarmed and naked for to aime at. And therefore so soone as they perceived that kind of shot to serve them to little or no purpose, they caught up stones which lay all over the valley, and let them D flie at the enemy. Which stones, as they light and beat upon their bucklers, kept a great clattering, and with the sound they made (rather than with any hurt besides) kept the Romanes for a time from mounting up the banke. But the Romanes making no reckoning of these stones neither, partly by pavoises and target-fences over their heads, made way directly through the thickest of their enemies; and partly by wheeling a little and fetching some compasse about, gained the pitch of the hill, and were gotten up to the very top: from whence they drave the Macedonians (all affrighted as they were) downe the hill, and chased them from their holds and guards: and by reason they had much adoe to flie (the ground was so rough and uneven) most of them were killed and cut in peeces. Thus the difficultie of the streights was overcome, and they were possessed thereof, with farre lesse trouble and conflict than they looked for and made account of. Then they marched on forward as farr as to Erduea, where the Consull after he had E put the fields all over to the wast, retired himselfe to Elimæa. From thence he forced Orestides, and assailed the towne Celerum, situate as it were, in a demie-land: there is a lake that envi-roneth the walls, and but one way by land that leadeth to the towne from the maine, and the same very streight and narrow, in forme of a gullet. At the first when the towne was summoned, the inhabitants trusting to the naturall strength of the place, kept their gates shut against the Consull, and refused his summons. But after they saw once the ensignes displayed and marching against them, when they perceived the enemies defended under a pavoise to approach close to the gate, and the narrow streight and avenue afore said, beset with a band of them; before they would encounter & fight, they yielded themselves for very fear. From Celerum he marched on towards F the Dassaretians, & wan by assault the cite Pelium. From thence he caried away the bondslaves, with the rest of the pillage; but all persons whatsoever free borne, hee let goe at libertie without paying ranfome. The towne he gave them againe, after hee had planted in it a strong garrison: for it stood well, and in a verie good place, for to make rodes, and incursions into Macedonia.
Thus the Consull having raunged over the countrey of the enemies, brought his armie backe Yyy iij through through the peaceable parts into Apollonia, where he began first to make warre.

Now the Ætoliens, the Athamans, and Dardaniens, and many other warres rising sodainly at once, some from one place and some from another, had diverted and turned Philip a contrary way. Against the Dardaniens (as they returned out of Macedonia) he sent Athenagoras with the footmen lightly armed and appointed, and the greater part also of the horse, giving him in charge and direction to follow them hard at their heeles as they departed, and to play upon their backs, and cut off the raile of their reeward; to teach them against another time, not to be so hasty to come abroad with an armie againe. Democritus the Pretour of the Ætoliens (who in the Dict aforesaid held at Naupactum, perswaded to take a longer time for to consult about this warre) had in the next councell or parliament following, mooved the Ætoliens to enter into armes; namely upon the fame that was spread abroad of the horsemens fight before Ocolophus; and also upon the coming of the Dardaniens, and Pleuratus with the Illyrians into Macedony: besides the arrivall of the Romane fleet at Oream, and the generall voice and bruit that went, how Macedonia should shortly be assailed also by sea, over and above so many nations that from all parts about were come already by land. These motives regained Democritus & the Ætoliens to friend the Romanes againe. Who joyning unto them Aminander the king of the Athamans, went forth together for to besiege Cercinium. They within the towne had shut their gates, whether by constraint or willingly of themselves, it was not knowne: for they had the kings garrison within among them. However it was, within few daies Cercinium was taken and burnt. As many as remained alive after that great defeature, as well bond as free one with another, were with the rest of the pillage carried away. This fearefull example caused all the people inhabiting about the marish of Boebe, to abandon their cities, and to retire themselves for securitie into the mountaines. The Ætoliens for want of rich prey and boocie (which they could not find there) turned from them and marched toward Perthebia. In that quarter they woon by force the citie Cyretie, & cruelly put it to the ransack. The inhabitants of Malloea surrendered of themselves without compulsion, and were received into protection as allies. Out of Perthebia Aminander was of advice and desirous to march against Gomphos, by reason that the countrey of Athamania bordered so neere upon that citie, and seemed easie to be forced without much trouble. But the Ætoliens fingers tickled and itched againe to be doing with the rich and fertile fields of Thessalie, and thither went they to raise booties and seeke pillage. Aminander followed still for companie, albeit he liked well neither of these fashions of the Ætoliens thus outrageously to make rodes and to spoile every where; nor of their manner of encamping at adventure, in what places soever they chanced to come, without all discretion, regard, and care of fortifying and guarding the armie. Fearing therefore least their inconsiderate rashnes and supine negligence, might be an occasion that he or his should come to a shrewd turne, and incurre some damage, tpyed his time; and seeing them to incampe in a plaine neere to the citie Phrecadum, he tooke a little hill little above halfe a mile off, where both he and his, might with the helpe of any small guard, lie in securitie. Now when as the Ætoliens seemed in manner to have forgotten that they were in the enemies countrey, but that they drave some booties: whiles they were some of them wandring and stragling, disbanded and halfe armed, others within their campe without any corps du guard, swilling and sleeping all night and day long, and made no difference of the times, Philip came upon them before they looked for him. And it being once known by the report of some that fled out of the fields in great affright, that he approached, then Democritus and the rest of the captaines began to quake for feare. Now was it about noone tide of the day, at what time as most of them having taken their full lode of wine and viands, lay along fast asleepe. Then they fell to awake and raise one another, and to give the alarme: anon they sent out every way to call in those that were preading abroad in the fields. So much they were astonied, that for hast many of the horsemen went forth without their swords, and most of them forgot to put on their cuiraces. Thus being led out in post hast, and hardly in all (foot and horse together) able to make up the number of fixe hundred, they light upon the kings Caval-lerie, for number, armour, and courage much better than themselves. And therefore at the first push were discomfited: for before they were well entered into skirmish, they fled shamefully away toward their campe. Some of them came short thither, and were either slaine or taken prisoners, even as many as the kings horsemen overtooke, and gat betweene them and their other companies that fled. Philip when he saw his men approach neere unto their campe, com-

A maunded to sound the retreat: for both horse and man was wearie, not so much with fight as with their long journey and the exceeding speed that they made. Whereupon hee gave commaundement, that the horsemen by troups, and the light armed footmen by their companies and squadrons should water their horses one after another, and go to their dinner and repast. Others he kept still in armour for a guard attending the regiment of the footmen, that came but slowly forward, by reason they were heavily armed at all peeces; who being come, they also were enjoined to pitch downe their ensignes, and lay their weapons before them, and to take a short bait and hasty pittance, sending two or three at the most out of every band for to water the horses. All this while the horsemen, together with the light armed souldiours, stood well appointed and in readinesse, if happily the enemy would have given any attempt.

B The Ætoliens bestowed armed men all about the gates and the rampier, intending to guard and defend their strength and fortifications, for now by this time they also that were scattered over the fields, had retired themselves into the campe. And so long as they beheld the enemies to keepe quiet, and not stirre, and were themselves in a sure hold, they made their bravadoes, and were very lustie: but after that the ensignes of the Macedonians began to advance forward, and march in order of battell well appointed, close unto their trench; all at once they abandoned their guards and quarters, and ran out at the backe part of their campe, and fled to the foresaid hill, where the Athamaniens were encamped. Many of the Ætoliens were likewise in this hasty flight killed or taken prisoners. Philip made no doubt, but that the Athamaniens also might have been driven from their hold, if there had beene day ynough behind: but the day being spent alreadie first in the skirmish, and afterward in the ransacking of their campe, he set him downe upon the next plaine, hard at the foot of the hill aforesaid, intending very early the next morning to assaile the enemy. The Ætoliens skared as much now, as they were before when they quit their owne campe, fled scattering away the night following. Here Aminander stood them in very good stead, by whose good guidance and direction, the Athamaniens being skilful in the coasts of the countrey, conducted them into Ætolia, over the high mountaines, whereas the enemies followed after them in blind and unknowne by-waies. Some few of them happened in this confused and scattered flight to loose their way, and stumble upon the Macedonian horsemen, whom Philip by day light, had sent to cut off the taile of the enemies, so soone as he perceived the hill abandoned. About the very same time, Athenagoras a capraine under the king, overtooke the Dardaniens as they returned into their countrey, and at the first put their arrierward in disaray. But afterwards the Dardaniens turned head againe, & embattelled themselves: so they fought on even hand, & nothing was woon nor lost on any side. The Dardaniens began not so soone to advance forward and march on againe, but the kings power, with their horsemen and light armed souldiours came upon them afresh, and put them to great trouble. For they had no such meanes of helpe, and were besides surcharged with heaveie armour, and withall, the place gave great advantage to those of the kings part. Very few were slaine, more wounded, none at all taken prisoners: for the manner of the Dardaniens, is not to breake out of their ranks and arraies for a litle, and upon small occasions; but as they fight close, so they retire together, and part not. Thus Philip having restrained these 2 nations, by 2 brave exploits, which were as happily performed as bravely enterprised, recovered the losses againe, by him received in the Romane warre. There happened besides, another occurrent, which diminished the number of his enemies the Ætoliens. For Scopas, one of the cheefe noblemen of that nation, being sent from Alexandria by king Ptolomeus, with a mightie masse of gold, caried away with him into Ægypt fixe thousand footmen, & certaine horsemen, waged for mony to serve. Neither had he left behind him any of the floure and youth of Ætolia, if Democritus had not chastised and rebuked them, and so by that means kept some of them at home; making remonstrances unto them, one while of the warre that was toward, and another while of the desolation which was like to ensue thereupon. But whether he did this upon a good zeale and care that he had of his countrey, or only to crosse Scopas, because he had not fed him well with rich rewards and fat presents, it is not known. And thus much concerning the affaires passed betweene Philip and the Romanes for that summer.

The Romane fleet having in the beginning of the same summer committed to sea from Corcyra, together with the lieutenant An. Apusius passed beyond the point of the cape Malca, and joined with king Attalus, neere Scyllaum in the territorie of Hermione. Then the whole citie and State of Athens, upon hope of present aid and succour, brake out and poured forth at once all

all the hatred and malice which they had conceived against Philip, and which a long time for-C very feare they had held in, and therefore kept themselves in good and reasonable tearmes with him. Now in this citie there never want prompt and readie tongues to stirre up and provoke the common people to a commotion. And as in all free States generally such kind of men are entertained and borne out by the favor of the multitude, so in Athens especially, where eloquence is in most request, and beareth greatest sway. Presently therfore an Act was put up and proposed unto the common people, and by them graunted and confirmed, That all the Statues and images of king Philip, together with their titles and stiles, likewise of all his progenitors and predecessors, as well men as women, should be defaced, pulled downe, and destroyed. Item, That all the festivall daies, the sacrifices and sacrificers, which had been instituted and ordained for the honor of him, should bee profaned and unhallowed againe. Item, That the very places, wherein ought H had been erected, or inscriptions graven to his honour, should be held as detestable and accursed: and that from thenceforward, it might not bee lawfull to set up there any of those things that ought to stand, and be dedicated in a pure and cleane place. Item, That the publicke priests of the citie, in all their prayers, and so often as they prayed for the good estate of the people of Athens and their allies, for the preservation of their armies and armadaes; should detest and curse by name king Philip, his children and realme, his forces both by land and sea, with all the race and name of the Macedonian nation. Moreover, it ran on in the decree, That if any man from that time forward, would preferre and propound any thing that might tend to the disgrace and infamie of Philip, the whole people of Athens should approve and allow the same whatsoever, and make an act thereof. Contrariwise, if any person say or doe any thing for his ho-I nour, or to impeach and checke his dishonour, whosoever should happen to kill the said partie, he should be deemed and reputed, that he had killed him justly and lawfully. Finally, this branch was comprised within the decree, That all things ordained in times past against Pissistratus his line and progenie, should bee observed and stand in force against Philip. Thus verily warned the Athenians against Philip with letters and words: wherein they are right valiant, and to say truth, good at nothing els. But Attalus and the Romans, having from Hermionæ shaped their course for Pyreæum, arrived there. And after they had sojourned some few daies in Athens, & were lo-den with a number of decrees, wherein the Athenians recounted the praises and commendations of their allies beyond all measure, like as they had before exceeded in shewing their malice against their enemy: they set saile from Pyreæum to Andros. Where, riding at anker in the bay K called Gaureleon, they sent certaine men to sound the minds of the inhabitants, Whether they would chuse to yeeld the towne willingly, or rather abide the hazard of a forcible assault. Who answered againe, that the kings garrison being possessed of the castle, and keeping it for Philip, they were not their owne maisters. Whereupon the king and the Roman lieutenant set their forces on land, and with all preparation of engines & artillerie fit for an assault, approached the citie divers waies. The Roman standards and their armes, not seen before in those parts, the resolute courage also of the souldiours, who so lustily and nimbly came neere to skale the walls, terrified and amased the Greekes, much more than any thing els. Therefore immediately they fled into the castle, and the enemies were LL. of the citie. Now, after they had for two daies space held out in the fortresse, presuming more upon the strength of the place, than the force of their armour and weapons; they and the garrison together, compounded upon the third day to quit the place, so they might be brought with a convoy to Delium, a towne in Boeotia, and every man to have one single suite of apparell. Then the Romanes leaving the bare citie unto king Attalus, ransacked it themselves, and tooke away with them all the pillage and ornaments that beautified the same. And to the end, that the Isle should not lie wast and desart, Attalus perswaded the Macedonians in manner all, and certaine also of the Andrians, there to remain. Afterwards, they also who by composition were transported to Delium, were by the faire promises of the king drawn away from thence: which they gave eare & credit unto the sooner, for the love of their native country, the misse whereof they might hardly brooke. From Andros they crossed to Cythus. There they spent certaine daies in assaulting the citie, to no purpose: and seeing the gaines would hardly M quit their paines, they departed from thence. Neere unto Prasæ (which is a place of Attica within the maine) there joined unto the Roman fleet twentie pinnasses of the Issæans, who were sent to rob & spoile the territorie of the Carystians: the rest of the fleet remained at Cerestum, a noble rode and port of Euboea, untill such time as the Issæi were returned from Carystum. Then all together

A together they made saile, & passing the mids of the maine sea, they fell with the isle of Icus, neer unto Scyrus. There they were staied for certaine daies, by reason of the raging Northwind: which being once laid and the sea calme againe, they passed to Scythos, a citie lately pill'd & ransacked by K. Philip. The soldiers raunged over the cuntry, and brought corn with them to their ships, and whatsoever else was fit for mans food. Other bootie neither was there any, nor deserved had the Greekes to be spoiled at their hands. Thence they bent their course for Calandrea; & first they rode at anker neer unto Mendis, a village situate by the sea side, & belonging to that State. From whence having sailed beyond the cape, and desirous to come about with their vessels for to ap-proch the verie walles of the citie, there arose a tempest and sodaine ghust; wherein they had like to have bene cast away: but scattered they were asunder; and having for the most part lost B the tackling of their ships, they escaped with much adoe to land. This tempest at sea, was also a fore-token presaging unto them, that they were to follow the warre by land, and to give over sea service. For when they had brought all their ships together and set their men a shore, they assailed the towne: but they had the repulse with many a bloudie blow besides (for there was within, a strong garison of the kings) whereupon they gave over their enterprise, returned backe, and sailed over to Canastæum a citie of Pallæne. And having doubled the point of Torona, they set their course for Acanthus. There at first they forraied the territorie; then forced the towne, and ran-acked it. And for that their ships had their fulfraught & charge of pillage, they sailed no farther forward, but returned from whence they came to Scyathus, and from thence to Eubæa: where leaving behind them their maine navie, they put in with ten ships lightly appointed, C to the Bay or gulf of Malca, for to parley with the Ætolians about the whole counse and managing of the warres. The chiefe of this embassage sent from the State, was one Sipyrrhicus an Ætolian, who came to Heraclea for to treat and conferre about these affaires together with the king and the Roman Lieutenant. They demanded of Attalus by vertue of the accord and agreement before made, to furnish them with a thousand souldiours: for so many ought hee by right to set out and mainteine, whensoever they were to wage warre against Philip. But this demand was denied to the Ætolians; in regard that aforetime they likewise thought much to make a rode to spoile Macedonia, at what time as Philip kept foule worke about Pergarius, burning all edifices before him, as well sacred as prophane, when they mought have drawne him perforce from thence into his owne realme to looke unto his proper affaires there.
 D Thus the Ætolians were dismissed with more hope than helpe: for the Romanes fed them only with faire words, and large promises of all things. Then Apustius with king Attalus returned to the fleet.

After this they laid their heads together, and began to consult about the siege and assault of Oream. A strong citie this was both in regard of the walls, and also of a good garison, by reason that heretofore it had ben once assailed. Now there were 20 saile of Rhodian ships all close covered with hatches and decks, which under the conduct of captaine Agessimbratus, had joynd with the fleet of Attalus and the Romanes, after the winning and conquest of Andros. These ships they sent to lye in the Bay of Zelasium, (a promontorie or cape above the citie Demetrias, lying very conveniently over against Isthmia) for this intent, that if the Macedonian ships E should come abroad from thence, they might be readie in gard to make saile against them.
Heracles an admirall for king Philip, lay there at rode with the navie, attending rather some enterprise by opportunitie and vantage of the enemies negligence, than by plaine and open force.
 The Romanes and Attalus in the meane time planted their ordinance against Oream at divers parts. The Romanes at the castle side that standeth upon the sea: The king from the vale that lieth betwene two forts, where as the citie is enclosed also with a wall. And as they assailed in sundrie places; so their manner of assailing was much different, and their engines divers. The Ro-manes assayed to approach the wall with tortoisies, pavoises and mantlers, and to shake it with the Ram: They of the kings part used Crossebows, Balists, Catapults, and all manner of engines to shoot forth quarels and darts, yea and to levell and weigh mightie stones of exceeding great F weight. They undermined also: and in summe, they practised all meanes which they saw by experience did good during the former assault and siege. But the Macedonians were not only more in number than the time before to defend the citie, but also of better courage and resolution: by reason that the king had rebuked them sharply for their fault passed: and they remembered well both his menaces, and also his promises for the time to come: in so much as the assaiassailants had small hope to win the towne in hast. Meane while the Romane Lieutenant, supposing that some other exploit might be performed, leaving a sufficient number (as he thought) for the finishing of the fabricks begun, and other engins of assault, put over to the next places of the continent: where he surprisid on a fodaine Larissa (not that noble and renowned citie in The-salie, but another, which they call Cremaste) and woon it, all but the fortresse. Attalus in like sort tooke Ægeleon, fearing nothing lesse than such an accident from them that were busie in besieging another towne. By this time, as the engins and other fabricks without Oreum were at the point of finishing, and readie to performe the batterie for which they were made: so the garison within was overtoiled with continuall paine and travaile, spent with watching night and day, and faint with many a grievous wound. Moreover, part of the wall, shaken underneath with a butt and push of the Ram, was already fallen downe in sundrie places, in so much as the Ro-manes entred by night at the open breaches, and all the way above the Key, and so were possessed of the castle. Attalus likewise by the breake of day, after he saw the banner reared upon the fortresse, and the signall which the Romanes put forth, entred the citie; for now the walls in many places lay along. The garison and the townesmen fled to a second citadell that they had, from whence alter two dayes they yeilded. The citie was the kings lot: the bodies of the prisoners, were the Romanes share. Now drew the sunne neere unto the Æquinoctiall line in Autumne, at what time the Euboean gulf called Coela is dangerous, and not well trusted of mariners. Therefore being desirous to be gone into a place of safe retreat, before the troublesome winter weather overtooke them, they turned their course and made head to Pyræum, from whence they came: where Apollonius leaving behind him thirtie ships, set a compasse about the cape of Malca, and sailed to Corcyra. But the king stayed still so long as the festivall dayes of Ceres continued, because he would be present at the celebration of those solemnities. After the feast ended, himselfe likewise retired into Asia: but first he sent Agemimbron and the Rhodians home againe. These were the affaires and exploits performed this summer by sea and land, by the Romane Consull and the Lieutenant generall, with the aid of king Attalus and the Rho-dians, against king Philip and his allies.

The other Consull C. Aurelius being come into his province when the warre was brought to an end, could not smoulder and conceale his anger conceived against the Pretour for fighting in his absence. When he had taken order therefore to send him into Etruria, himselfe with the legions invaded the country of the enemies: where by way of robbing and spoiling he warred so as he got more prey then praise. But L. Furius, seeing there was little to do in Etruria, and withall desirous rather than his life of a triumph over the Gaules (which he supposed to obtaine with more ease, whiles the Consull was absent, who was both angrie with him, and also envied at him) arrived at Rome before any man looked for him, and assembled the Senate in the temple of Bellona. Where, after he had declared what acts he had achieved, he requested that he might be permitted to ride into the citie with triumph. In great credit and account he was with many of the Senatours, both for his noble and worthie deeds, in which regard they honoured him: and also for a speciall favour and love, in which respect they affected him. But the more auncient and elder Senatours denied him triumph, as well for that he had warred with the armie of another, as also because he had abandoned his owne province and government, upon a greedie desire to catch a triumph, by waiting his opportunitie, and taking advantage: a thing not warrantable by any former precedent or example. And as many of them as had bene Consuls laid moreover, That above all things he ought to attend upon the Consull his returne. For well might he (say they) being encamped neere unto the citie, have defended and guarded the Colonie only, and so have drawn the time out untill his coming, and never needed to have fought a set battaile for the matter. And although the Pretour have omitted so to do, yet ought not the Senate to follow his example, but expect the Consull. When as therefore they shall have heard the Consull and Pretour discoursing and arguing the matter both together face to face, then they should be able to judge better and more soundly of the cause. A great part of the house was of opinion that they ought to looke unto nothing els but the good service done, and whether he were lawfully called thereunto, as a magistrate of himselfe, to manage his affaires by his proper conduct and the guidance of his owne fortune. For, of the two Colonies (say they) which were oppossed as two forts and bulwarks to restrain the fodaine impressions and tumults of the French; when the one was sacked and burnt, and the same

A same fire like to leape from it to the other so neere, (as from house to house that joyne together) what could the Pretour have done otherwise in that case? For if there might be nothing attempted without the Consull, it must needs follow, that either the Senate did amisse in geving the Pretour the charge of an armie (for if their will was that the warre should be managed not by the Pretours armie, but by the Consuls, they might have limited it in the Commission by speciall words, expressly forbidding the service to be done by the Pretour, but onely by the Consull) or else the Consull hath committed a fault, who having commaunded the armie to go out of Tuskane into Fraunce, came not himselfe in person to Ariminum to encounter the enemy, and be present in that warre, which without him might not be lawfully fought. Over and besides, the occasions and seasons of warre attend no stayes, and tarie for no politick delayes of Generals. And otherwhiles, fight a man must, not because he is willing thereto, but because his enemy puts him to it. To conclude, the very battaile it selfe, and the hap-pie issue thereof, ought onely to be considered and regarded. The enemies are defeated and slaine; their camp taken and ransacked; the siege raised from the one Colonie, and it preserved; the captives of the other recovered and restored to their friends; and to be brieve, in one battaile the quarell is decided, and the warre finished. And not onely men have rejoiced for this victo-rie, but also there have bene processions for three dayes space to the honor of the immortal gods: For that Lu. Furius hath managed the COMMONWEALE WELL AND HAPPILY, AND NOT ILL AND RASHLY. Finally, these French warres fall by a fatall destenie to the house and race of the Furij. By these and such like remonstrances alleaged by himselfe C and his friends, the majestie of the Consull absent was overweighed with the favour borne to the Pretour present. And so in a frequent assembly of Senatours, a decree was graunted, That L. Furius should ride in triumph. Thus triumphed over the Gaules L. Furius Pretour, whiles he was in office. He brought into the common treasure 320000 Asses, 170000 pound weight of silver. But neither were there any prisoners led captives in shew, nor spoiles caried in pomp before his chariot, nor yet his souldiers followed after. So as it appeared, that all other things besides victorie alone, pertained properly to the Consull.

After this were the plaies exhibited with great magnificence, by P. Cornel. Scipio, which hee had vowed in Affricke, during his Consulship. Also there passed an order for the lands of his souldiours; That for so long as each one had served in Spaine or Affricke, hee should have two D acres for every yere: and that these lands should be set out and assigned unto them by ten De-centvirs for the purpose deputed. Then were certaine Triumvirs created for to supply and make up the number of Romane inhabitants in Venusia, by reason that during the time of Annibal his warre, the strength of that colonie was much enfeebled and impaired. C. Terentius Varro, T. Quintus Flaminius, and P. Cornelius Scipio the sonne of Cneius, enrolled new coloners to in-habite Venusia.

The same yeece C. Cornelius Cethegus, who governed Spaine as Proconsull, discomfited a great host of the enemies in the country of the Sederanes. In which battaile, by report, were slaine 15000 Spaniards, and 78 militarie ensignes taken. C. Aurelius the Consull, when hee was returned out of his province to Rome against the solemn election of magistrates, complained, E nor as men made reckoning he would have done. That the Senate expected not for his com-ming, nor that the Consull was not permitted to debate the matter with the Pretour) but found himselfe grieved, That the Senate had decreed him triumph so, as the partie onely was suffered to speake who was to triumph, and none of them might be heard who were present at the battaile.
 And whereas our forefathers ordained, that lieutenants, colonels, marshals, and centurians, &c yea, and in one word, the souldiours should be at a triumph; for this end and purpose, that the truth might appeare to the world, of all things achieved by him unto whom so great honor was to be done: Was there any one (quoth he) of all that armie which fought with the Gaules, I say not a souldier, but so much as a lackey or horseboy following the campe, of whom the Senate might enquire, whether the Pretour spake true or false? This done and said, he published F the day of assembly for the election above said: wherein were created Consuls L. Cornelius Len-tulus, and P. Villius Tappulus. After them were Pretors chosen L. Quintus Flaminius, L. Valerius Flaccus, L. Villius Tappulus, and C. Bibius Pampilius. Graine and other victuals that yeece were cheape. Great store of corne was brought out of Affricke, which the Ædiles of the chaire distributed to the people, at two Asses a Modius. They also set forth the Roman games and pastimes right right sumptuously; yea and represented them one day more than ordinarie, Moreover, of the G

 which raised by fines and forfeitures, they made seven brassen statues, which they set up in the measure house of the city. The Plebeian plaies likewise were thrice renewed all over by the Ædiles of the commons L. Terentius Mafaliota, and C. Sebius Pamphilus Pretour elect. Finally, the funeral games that yeere were four daies together exhibited in the common place of the citie, occasioned by the death of M. Valerius Levinus: and celebrated they were by his two sonnes P. and M. who also shewed unto the people a brave spectacle of fencers at the sharpe: wherein there were five and twentie couples that entred the lists & performed combat. M. Aurelius Cotta one of the Decemvirs, that yeer departed this life; and in his place M. Acilius Glabrio was subordained. In the solemne assembly for electing Ædiles of the chaire, it chaunced that those two which were chosen, might not immediatly enter into office: for C. Cornelius Cethegus was crea- H ted in his absence, while he governed the province of Spaine. And C. Valerius Flaccus who was present at his owne election, might not be sworne to maintaine the lawes, because hee was the Flamin or priett of Jupiter. For lawfull it was not for any magistrate to exercise his place above five daies, untill he were sworne to the lawes. Then Flaccus preferred a petition that he might be dispensed with: wherupon the Senat ordained, That if the Ædile would find one to sweare in his name at the good pleasure and discretion of the Consuls, then the Consuls (if they thought it meet) should deale with the Tribunes of the Commons, to propound it unto the people that it might passe under their graunt. So L. Valerius Flaccus (the Pretour elect for the yeere following) was presented to take the oath for his brother. Then the Tribunes put it to a canvass before the people, and they enacted, That the oath of his brother should be of the same validitie as if the Ædile himselfe had taken it in his own person. Concerning the other Ædiles also, there passed an act of the commons. For when the Tribunes propofed unto the people, Which two they would have to go into Spaine as LL. deputies, with commaund over the armies; to the end, that C. Cornelius the Ædile of the chaire might come home to beare his office, and L. Manlius also after so many yeeres, depart out of his province: the people ordained, that Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Ster- tinus should have the conduct and government in Spaine, in qualitie and title of Proconsuls.

THE XXXII. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padua, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the two and thirtieth Booke.

Any strange and prodigious sights (as they were reported from divers countries) are here related and set downe: among which, this is one, that in Macedonia there was a bay nee sprung up of it selfe in the ponne of a galley. T. Quintius Flaminius the Consull fought fortunately against Philip in the heights of Epirus: and having put him to flight, hee compelled him to retorne into his owne kingdom. Himselfe, with the assistance of the Æto- lians and Atbamans, infested sore and plagued Thessalie, which bordereth upon Macedo- nie. L. Quintius Flaminius the Consull his brother, by the aid of king Attalus and the Rhodiens, made conquest by war at sea, of Eubœa and all the sea coast. The Achai were received into amitie. The conspiracie of slaves, that plotted to deliver and set at large the hostages of the Carthaginians, was detected and took no effect. The number of Pretours was increased to sixe. The Consull Cornelius Cethegus defeated the French Insulbrians in battaile. League and amitie was concluded betwene the Romans and the Lacedemonians, with their tyrant Nabis. Over and besides, there is contained in this booke, the winning of many cities in Macedonie.

When the Consuls and Pretors were entred into office upon the * Ides of March, * 15 of March. they cast lots for the government of the provinces. To L. Lentulus, fell Italic, and to P. Villius, Macedonie. As for the Pretours, L. Quintius had the jurisdiction of the citie of Rome, & C. Babius the government of Ariminum. L. Va- lerius ruled Sicilie, and L. Villius his lot was to commaund Sardinia. Lentu- lus the Consull had order given him to levie new legions, and Villius to receive the armie of P. Sulpitius, with commission and licence to take up as many souldiers as hee thought good himselfe to furnish the same with a fresh supply. Those legions which C. Aurelius Consull had in charge, were assigned over to Babius the Pretour, with condition to keepe them with him, untill the Consull were arrived in Fraunce with a new armie; and so soone as hee came, to discharge and dismiss all the souldiours home to their houses except 5000 allies: E for as much as this number was thought sufficient to governe the province about Ariminum.
 The Pretours of the former yeere continued still Commanders of their armies. Cn. Sergius was enjoined to see and take order, that certaine lands should be set out for those souldiers who had served many yeeres together in Spaine, Sicilie, and Sardinia. And Q. Ariminius had in charge to goe through with that inquisition of certaine conspiratours and traitours in the Bru- tians countrie, upon which hee had sitten already, as Pretour with great fidelitie and diligence; and also to send unto Locri for to receive due punishment of those prisoners, whom being at-tainted and convicted of sacrilege, hee had sent bound to Rome. And finally, to cause all the treasure taken out of the temple of Proserpina, to bee restored thither againe, with an over-encrease, to make satisfaction and to raise out the wicked part committed. The Laun feasts and holydaies were solemnised againe by vertue of an ordinance of the bishops, upon this occasion, That certaine embassadors from Ardea, complained in the Senat, how they had not their ordinarie allowance of flesh at the Latine feasts aforesaid in the mount Alba, according to the old custome. Newes came from Suessa, that two of their citie gates, and all the wall between, was smitten with lightning. Messengers also from Formia reported, that their temple of Jupiter was

was likewise blasted. Moreover, they of Ostia brought word of the semblable mischance with G them in the church of Iupiter. And from Velitrae tidings came of the like mishap, fallen upon the temples of Apollo and Sangus. And that in the temple of Hercules there sprung up a bush of haire. Letters came also from Q. Minutius the Propetour out of the Brutians country, that there was a colt toled with five feet, and three chickens hatched with three feet apeece. After all this, P. Sulpitius the Propetor sent letters from out of Macedonia, containing among other matters this newes, that there was a lawrell tree grew of it selfe in the poupe of a galley.

The Senate in regard of all the former prodigious sights, ordained, that the Consull should sacrifice greater beasts, unto what gods hee thought good: but about this last rehearsed, the Soothsayers that prie into beasts inwards, were sent for into the Senate house; and by the direction of their answer, an edict went forth, That the people should goe in procession, and make supplications one day, and in all temples and alters of the gods, there was sacrifice celebrated with great devotion.

The Carthaginians this yeere came to Rome with the first payment of the tribute imposed upon them: and for as much as the treasurers & receivers of the citie made report, that the silver was not good and lawfull, and being brought to the triall, was found too light by one fourth part washed away, those Carthaginians were constrained to take up money of the bankers of Rome, and to make good the defect and losse of the silver above said. They put up a petition besides unto the Senate, that it might stand with their good pleasure to redeliver now their hostages. Whereupon an hundred of them were rendered backe, and good hope there was of the rest, if so be they continued loial and fast in their allegiance. And when they made a farther request in behalfe of those hostages which were not delivered, that they might be transported from Notba (where they were not to their good liking and ease) to some other place, graunted it was, that they might remoove to Signia and Ferentinum. In like sort, the Gaditanes made humble suite, and obtained this libertie, that there should not be sent from the Romanes a captain to govern Gades, any thing to the contrarie, in their covenant (concluded with L. Martius Septimius, when they yeelded themselves under the subjection of the Romanes) notwithstanding. Moreover, for as much as the embassadours of Narnia made complaint, that they had not their full number of inhabitants, and that there were certain straungers entermingled among them, not of their own nation, who bare themselves as Coloners; therefore L. Cornelius the Consull was commaunded to create three Deputies or Commissioners, called Triumvirs, for to reforme this disorder. And chosen there were for this purpose, Publius & Sestius Aelius, who had both of them the surname of Patris, and C. Cornelius Lentulus. This that was graunted to them of Narnia, was denied to the embassadours of Cosla, who likewise requested that the number of their inhabitants might be increased.

The affaires thus finished at Rome that there were to be done, the Consuls went into their severall provinces. P. Villius so soone as he was arrived in Macedonia, was welcommed at his first comming with a dangerous mutinie of the souldiours, which long afore being kindled, was not well quenched at the first beginning. These were those thousand, which after the deaturation of Anniball, were sent out of Affricke into Sicilie, and from thence, a yeere after almost, transported into Macedonia for voluntarie souldiours; but they themselves stood stoutly to it, that it was no voluntarie act of theirs, but that they were shipped by their Colonels & Tribunes full against their wils. And howsoever it was, whether they served willingly or unwillingly, it was but meet and good reason, that the time of their souldierie should run out, and their service have an end at length. Alledging, that for these many yeers they had not seen Italie, that they waxed old men under their harness, having borne armes in Sicilie, in Affricke, and in Macedonia; that with toile and travell so tedious, they were weak and feeble, and after so many wounds and hurts received, they had no more blood to loose. The Consull made them answer, that their cause was good and reasonable, but marred in the handling; and meet he thought it, that they should bee dismissed, if they could have requested in modest terms: but neither it, nor any cause els whatsoever was warrantable to make a mutinie and sedition. Therefore, if they could bee content to keepe to their colours, and bee at commaund as loial souldiours, hee would in their behalfe write his letters unto the Senate, as touching their conge and dismissal: for bee they well assured, that they shall get more by sober and gentle behaviour, than by any such stubborne, froward, and wilfull demeanure.

At

A At the same time Philip assailed the citie of Thaumaci with terraces and mantelets in all forcible manner, so that he was now at the point to batter and shake the wall with the ram. But the sodaine arrivall of the Ætolians enforced him to surcease his enterprife; who by the conduct of Archidamus having passed through the mids of the Macedonian guards, and entered the towne, never ceased day nor night to make sallies forth, one while upon their standing watch, otherwhils upon their fabricks & engines. The naturall situation of the place yeelded them good helpe and vantage: for the towne of Thaumaci is seated on high to a mans thinking as he goeth from Pylæ and the gulf of Malea by the way of Lamia, & sheweth it selfe aloft, seeming to overlooke and command the streight passage of the forrests called Cœle. Again, when one travaileth and passeth over the craggie rough places, and the crooked waies entangled with so many windings and turnings in the vallies of Thessalie, & is approached once neer to the citie, all on a sodain he may discover and discern before him a mightie large and open plain, as it were a wide and vast sea, so as aman shall have much adoe to reach with his eye so farre as these downes lye out everie way under him, and see all over them. And hereupon, by reason of this strange and marvailous prospect, the citie is called Thaumaci*. Over and besides that, the high ground affourdeth it security, it standeth also upon a huge rocke; divided into divers crags and broken cliffes. These difficulties forced Philip to give over his attempt, and namely, when he considered and weighed withall, that the towne it selfe when it was woon, would not quit the painefull labour, and pay for the danger about it. Besides, the winter was now at hand, when hee departed from thence, and reined his forces into Macedonia, there to harbor. Where, when all others, during the time that they could catch any repose and rest, refreshed their spirits and bodies with some recreations and sports; Philip onely, how much respit soever hee had, either of intermission or remission from continuall labour of marching in journey, & fighting in battell; so much more trouble he had in his mind, whiles he coured & discoursed with himselfe, what the total & finall issue might be of this warre: whiles he stood not onely in feare of the enemies, which persecuted him by sea and land, but also in doubt, as well of the hearts of his allies, as of the affections of his own subjects: least the one in hope of the Romanes friendship should revolt, and the other (even the Macedonians themselves) desire novelties, and long for a change. Therefore hee addressed his embassadours into Achaëa, both to exact an oth of the Achaëans for their allegiance (for they had capitulated in the accord and agreement made, yeerely to sweare fealtie unto Philip) and also to deliver into their hands, Orchomenus, Herea, & Triphylia. And when they demaunded also Aliphera, the embassadours answered, that the citie never pertained to Triphylia, but that of right it ought to bee restored unto Philip: as being one of them, which in the generall counsell and assembly of the Arcadians, were assigned and set out for the building of Megalopolis. And thus verily he entertained firme alliance with the Achaëans. As for the Macedonians he gained their hearts unto him, by occasion of Heractides: for seeing that by meanes of him he incurred their exceeding ill will and hard conceit, and that he was charged with many greivous crimes, he cast him in prison, to gratifie his owne subjects: whereat the people took great joy, and hearts content. Then made he preparation for war, with as earnest endeavor, as at any time before: he exercised as well the Macedonians as mercenarie souldiours in pay, namely, to wear their armor, and handle their weapons; and in the very prime of spring, he sent all his forraigne aids and light armed souldiours, under the leading of Athenagoras into Chazonia by the way of Epirus, to seize upon the streight passage neere to Antigonie, which the Greekes call Stena. Him selfe a few daies after followed with his maine armie more heavily appointed. And when hee had well viewed and considered the situation of the countrey, & how it lay, he judged that the quarter coasting upon the river Aous was the meetest place to fortifie and encampe in. This river between two hills, the one by the peasants of the countrey called Æropus, the other Asinaus, runneth within a narrow vale and yeeldeth but a small passage upon the bancke side. Hee commaunded Athenagoras to gaine and fortifie Asinaus with his light armed souldiours: him selfe encamped upon Æropus. And looke what way as the hill was fenced with broken and craggd rockes, there he kept a small guard of some few souldiours: but whereas there was more danger, and easier access for the enemy, he fortified with trenches, rampiers, and bulwarkes. He planted also, and disposed in convenient places a great number of engines to send out quarrels and other shot, for to keepe the enemies aloofe. The roiall pavillion of the king him selfe, was pitcht before the rampier upon a banke, in a most conspicuous place of open sight, for to terrifie the enemy, and also to encourrage and harten his owne men, when they should see him so confident and resolute. The Consul advertised by Charopus the Epirote, what passages the king with his armie was possessed of, after he had passed the winter in Corcyra, himselfe likewise in the beginning of Spring, went up into the maine land, and held on his march toward the enemy. And being advanced almost within five miles of the kings camp, he left his legions in a strong fenced place, and went himselfe in person forward with certain lightly appointed in espiall to discover the quarters: and the morrow after held a consultation, Whether he might do better to assay to passe through the place which the enemy kept (notwithstanding he saw evidently before his eyes great trouble and hazard in that adventure) or to bring his armie about and fetch a compasse the same way, whereas the yeare before Sulpitius entred into Macedonie. This deliberation held him for certain dayes in even balance and suspence, untill newes came unto him that T. Quintius was created Consul; and having the province of Macedonie allotted unto him, made hast thither, and was alreadye passed to Corcyra.

Valerius Antias writeth, how Villius was entred the passe aforesaid, and because he could not take the streight and direct way (by reason that the king and his forces had beset all places) followed the valley along, through the middle whereof the river Aous runneth: and having made a bridge over it, in great hast passed over to the banke, whereas the king was encamped, and there fought a battaile: wherein the king was discomfited and put to flight, and driven out of his camp: that twelve thousand enemies were slaine in that conflict, 2200 taken prisoners, 132 ensignes woon and caried away, besides 230 horse. Also that during the combat, there was a temple vowed unto Iupiter, in case the Consul sped well in the battaile. But all other writers both Greeke and Latin, at leastwise whose Annales I have red, report that Villius performed no memorable act, and that the Consul T. Quintius who next succeeded, tooke in hand the whole and entier warre himselfe.

Whiles things thus passed in Macedonie, the other Consul L. Lentulus who staid behind at Rome, held a generall assembly for the election of Censors: And among many famous and noble personages who sued for that dignitie, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, and P. Aelius Patus were created Censors. These two agreeing together in great concord, both elected a Senat without diffaming any person; and also fermed out the toll for portage of all things that were sold at Capua: Item, they set and to ferme let, the custome for passage that way whereas the camp stood, and where now there is a towne built: and enrolled three hundred coloners (for that number was limited by the Senat) there to inhabit. They sold also the lands of Capua lying under the hill Tifata.

About the same time L. Manlius Acidinus departed out of Spaine, and was prohibited by M. Porcius Lecca a tribune of the Commons, to enter at his returne into the cite with the solemne pomp of an Ovation, notwithstanding he had that honor granted by the Senat. So he came into Rome as a private person, and brought into the chamber of the cite 1200 pound weight of silver, and thirtie pound weight welneere of gold. The same yeere Gn. Babius Tamphilus, who had received the province of Fraunce from C. Aurelius the Consul of the former yeere, engaged himselfe rashly within the marches of the French Insulbrians, and was environed and enclosed round about, both he, and in manner his whole armie. He lost above 6600 men. See what an overthrow was received in a warre, whereof there was no reckning made, and from whence no danger was feared any more. This caused L. Lentulus the Consul to come out of the cite of Rome, who being arrived into a province full of trouble and tumult, after he had received the charge of a frightened and dismayed armie, gave the Pretour a great check and rebuke, and tooke him up roundly with reprochfull termes, yea and commaunded him to get him gone out of the province, and to repaire to Rome. Neither performed the Consul himselfe any exploit worthie of remembrance, by reason that he was called home to Rome for to hold the solemne election of Magistrates: which also was stayed by M. Pulvius, and M. Curius Tribunes of the Commons: who likewise would not suffer T. Quintius Flamininus, having ben but Quæstor, for to stand for a Consulship. Now adayes say they, the dignities of Ediles and Pretours are nought set by, and not worth the seeking for: and these noblemen will needs mount into the Consuls place, not by steps and degrees of other offices, wherein they should make proffe and geve good testimonie what their carriage is, but leaping over those in the mid, joynd the lowest, and highest together. This debate which began in Mars field in the assemble of the people, came

A came at length to be decided before the Senat. And the LL. ordeined, That for as much as he which sued for that dignitie, was by law capable thereof, it was reason that the people should have plenarie and absolute power to create him, or whomsoever els they pleased. So the Tribunes submitted themselves under the authoritie of the Senatours. And for Coss. were elected Sex. Aelius Patus, and T. Quintius Flamininus. Then ensued the election of the Pretours. In which were created L. Cornelius Merula, M. Claudius Marcellus, M. Porcius Cato, and C. Helvius, who had bene Ediles of the Commons. By whom the Plebeian playes were renewed; and a solemne feast made in the honor of Iupiter, in regard of those playes. The Curule Ediles likewise C. Valerius Flaccus, who also was the Flamine Dialis or Priest of Iupiter, and C. Cornelius Cethegus, exhibited the Romane games with great magnificence. The great Pontifes or Bishops Servius Sulpitius and L. Calpurnius dyed that yeere: In whose places were enstalled M. Aemilius Lepidus, and Gn. Cornelius Scipio. Now when Sex. Aelius Patus and Titus Quintius Flamininus the Coss. were entred into their Magistracie, they assembled the Senat in the Capitoll: where the LL. gave order, that concerning the two provinces of Macedonie and Italie, the Consuls should either agree between themselves, or els cast lots whether of them should governe the one or the other: And that he, whose hap was to have the charge of Macedonie, should enroll of Romanes three thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen: Also of Latin allies five thousand foote, and five hundred horse, for to supplic and furnish out the legions. And for the other Consul it was decreed, that he should have an armie, all entier and new. L. Lentulus the Consul of the former yeere, continued still Governor in the province, with expresse commaundement, that neither himselfe should leave the government, nor withdraw his forces from thence, before the Consul were come with the new legions. So the Consuls referred themselves to the direction of the lots. To Aelius fell Italie and Macedonie to Quintius. As for the Pretours, who also were guided by lots, L. Cornelius Merula had the jurisdiction of the cite of Rome. M. Claudius governed Sicilie. To M. Porcius was allotted Sardinia, and C. Helvius his lot was to be L. Deputie in Gaule. After this, they began to take musters. For over and besides the Consular armies, the Pretours also were charged to levie souldiours. To Marcellus were assigned foure thousand footmen of Latin allies, and three hundred horsemen, to go into Sicilie. And for Cato three thousand foote of the same kind of souldiours with two hundred horse, to serve in Sardinia: upon condition, that when both these Pretours were come into their provinces, they should discharge all the old souldiers there, as well footmen as horsemen.

Then the Consuls graunted the Embassadours of king Attalus leave to come into the Senate house: where having audience given them, after they had declared how their king and maister had assisted the State of Rome with his forces as well by sea as land, and shewed himselfe cheerefull, readie and obedient to his present day for to execute and performe whatsoever the Romane Consuls had enjoined him to do, they said how, that they much feared least from hence forward he should not be able to do the same; by reason he was impeached by Antiochus. For Antiochus taking his vantage, and finding the realme of Attalus disurnished of garisons, and unprovided of forces both by sea and land, had invaded the same. For which occasion Attalus besought the LL. of the Senat there assembled; that if they minded to use his navie, and employ the means that he could make, in the service of the Macedonian warre, they would then send him a sufficient garison to defend his kingdom: but if they thought not well thereof, his request was to permit himselfe to returne with his fleet and other forces, to the defence of his owne. The Senat gave order to returne this answer unto the Embassadours: Whereas king Attalus had succored the Romane Captaines with his Armada, and other meynes of warre, the Senat accepted thereof in the best part: But as touching Antiochus the king, an alie and friend of the people of Rome, they neither would send any aid against him: nor yet deteine the aiding Attalus in any service of theirs, longer than the king himselfe should thinke it stood with his owne commoditie. For the manner of the people of Rome hath alwayes been, to serve their owne turne with the help & assistance of others, but yet at the good pleasure and discretion of others. And whosoever were willing to relieve the Romanes, they were at their owne libertie to begin and end when they would themselves. Howbeit, they purposed to address their Embassadours unto Antiochus, to adverte him: and let him understand, that the people of Rome employed the help of Attalus his ships and souldiers against Philip, a common enemy: and the Senat would take it kindly at his hands, if for their sakes he forbore the realm of Attalus, & abstained from from warre. For meet and reason it was, that the KK. who were friends and allies to the people of Rome, should likewise entertaine peace and amitie among themselves.

T. Quintius the Consull made halt to be gone into his province: and when he had levied and mustered his souldiours so, as that he had enrolled those old experienced servitours for the most part, who had given good proof of their valour in the service of Spaine and Affricke, he was deteined so long at Rome by occasion of certaine prodigious signes reported, untill he had taken order for the appeasing of the gods, and expiation of them. The lightning scorched and blasted the great port way from Veij; the common hall likewise of publicke assemblies, and the temple of Jupiter in Lanuvium: also the temple of Hercules in Ardea: the walls besides and turrets of Capua, and the temple there which is called Alba. At Arretium the skie appeared to be on a light fire. At Velitrae the earth setled and sunke downe, leaving a great gaping chinke for the compasse of three acres of ground. Word moreover was brought that in Suessa Aurunca a lamb was yeened with two heads; and in Sinuessa a porket with a mans head. In regard of these prodigies, there was a procession and supplication one whole day, and the Consuls intended devoutly to their sacrifices: and after they had pacified the gods, they tooke their journey into their provinces. Aelius, together with C. Helvius the Pretor went into Fraunce, and gave unto the said Pretor the armie which he received of L. Lentulus, and should have dismissed and discharged of their service; because he purposed himselfe to employ in his owne wars the fresh and new legions which hee brought with him: but hee performed no action worth the report. The other Consull T. Quimius having taken the sea, and departed from Brundisium sooner than other Consuls were wont, arrived at Corcyra with eight thousand foot and eight hundred horse. From thence hee crossed the seas with a galleace of five rankes of oares, directing his course for the nearest coasts of Epirus, and by great journeyes made halt untill he was come to the Romane campe: from whence after he had licensed Villius to depart, and staid there some few daies, untill his forces which were at Corcyra could overtake him, he called his counsell together to resolve, Whether hee should keepe on his journey directly, and make way through the midst of his enemies where they lay encamped, or rather without any such attempt (which could not but carrie with it great paine and perill) fetch a compasse about with safetie, and so enter into Macedonie by the way of the Dassaretians countrey and Lingus. And verily, this latter course of the twaine had taken place, but that hee feared, when hee were retired once farre from the sea, and had let the enemy slip out of his hands, if the king happily were minded (as he had done before) to defend himselfe within the desarts and forests, that he should spend all the long sommer and doe no good. Therefore come what would of it, he resolved to assaile the enemy in that verie place as difficult as it was, with all the disadvantage whatsoever. But as they determined in their intention thus to doe, so they were not so readie in the meanes to execute and effect the same. Thus they sate still and spent fortie daies within the eye of the enemy, and made no attempt. Then Philip conceived some hope to assaye a peace, by the means and intercession of the Epirote nation. And after consultation had, there were certaine agents chosen for that purpose, to wit, Pansianus the Pretour, and Alexander Generall of the horse, who brought the Consull and the king together for to parle, unto a place whereas the river Aous is narrowest and the bankes nearest together. The demaunds of the Consull in summe were these, That Philip should remoove his garrisons out of the cities: That whose territories or townes he had pilld and spoiled, he should make restitution againe unto them all those things that were extant and to be found: as for the rest, they should be prized and valued indifferently to their worth. Philip made answer againe, That all those peeces were nor of like qualitie and condition. As for such as hee had taken himselfe, he would be content to set them at libertie: but for those that were left unto him by his progenitors and predecessors, he would not forgoe the possession thereof, since hee held them lawfully in right of inheritance. Finally, if those cities wherewith hee had warred made complaint, that they were ever endamaged by him, hee would repaire them selfe to what cities and states they would themselves, and stand to their award; so they were neighbours, or in peace as well with the one side as the other. The Consull hereunto replied and said, That for this matter it was needlesse to referre themselves to the arbitrement or doome of any. For who seeth not evidently (quoth he) that he hath done the wrong, who first tooke arms? And that Philip before ever that he was molested and troubled by any war from others, offered violence first unto all? After, when it was debated what cities should be set free, the Consull named

A first of all Thessalonica: at which word the king was in such a heat of choller, that he cryed out aloud, What harder condition Quintius, would you impose upon him that you had vanquished? and withall, he flang away in a chafe from off the place of meeting and entervue, & would no longer parle. And much adoe they had on both sides to hold their hands from shooting one at another, for the river ran in the midst betweene them, that they could not trie it out by the eares. The morrow after, there passed many light skirmishes betweene the corps de guard on both parts by way of excursions, first in a plaine that lay out broad enough for that purpose: but afterwards as the kings men retired themselves into the narrow streights and rough rugged places, the Romanes of an ardent desire to be fighting, entred thither soone after. The Romanes had on their side the benefite of good order and militarie discipline, and were furnished with such kind of weapons as were fit for to maintaine a medly in a set battaile. The enemies againe for their parts had the vantage of the ground, and the helpe of sundry engins to cast forth shot farre off (as balists and catapults) planted and raunged almost upon every cliffe and rocke as it had bene upon the walles of a citie. After they had on both sides given and taken many a wound, so as divers of them were left slaine on the earth, as if they had fought in a full battaile, the night at length parted them asunder.

Things thus standing in these tearmes, there happened a certaine heardman sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirotes to be brought before the Consull: who gave him to understand, that he kept cattell a grasing in that forest (which then was overspread with the kings pavillion) and knew all the cranks, all the windings, turnings, and blind wayes of those mountaines; promising, that if he would send out a band of souldiours with him, he would conduct them thorough a place that was neither dangerous, nor yet difficult and hard of ascent: which if they had once gained, they should be over their enemies heads and able to commaund them. And these things (quoth he) you may surely trust upon; for Charopus willed me to make declaration, That he could wish you the Consull were master of all, rather than any other. The Consull was desirous to beleve all, but durst not credit him. And thus being troubled in spirit, while hee entertained in his heart both joy and feare together, at length the authoritie of Charopus induced him to resolve and give the adventure of this hope thus offered and presented unto him. And to the end that the enemy might distrust and suspect nothing, for two daies following hee never ceased to assaile and provoke him, setting companies of armed souldiours in every place, to charge upon him, and ever seconding them with fresh men to succed in the place of the wearied. After this, he delivered to a Tribune or Colonell foure thousand chosen footmen, and three hundred horsemen; with this direction, to lead forward the Cavallerie, as farre as the ground would give leave: and when they were come once to a place where the horsemen could not passe nor march farther, then to plant them in some plain and even ground: willing the footmen to march on as the guide should lead them, and point out their way: but after they were mounted above the enemies heads, according as he undertooke and made promise, then to give a sign by smoke, and not to shout and set up a crie, untill one might guesse, that upon signall of battell by him given, the medley was begun. And the Consull gave commaundement to march by night (for as good hap was, the moone was at full, and shone all night long) and take their rest and sleepe in the day time. As for the guide aforesaid, hee made unto him many faire and large promises, if it might appeare, that he meant truth, and dealt faithfully: howbeit in the mean time he delivered him bound to the custodie of the said Colonell. When these companies were thus sent away, the Roman Generall travelled and endeavoured so much the more to gain vantage of the enemies guards. All this while, the Romanes that were sent out with the Colonell, marched forward: & upon the third day, when they had given token by smoke, that they had won the pitch of the hill as they intended, and held it still: then the Consull divided his forces into three squadrons, and entred the midst of the valley with the main strength of his armie, but he led forth the wings of his battell, both the right and the left, against the very campe of the enemies. Who also for their parts were not behind to reencounter and receive him. And all the whiles that they advanced without their fortifications of defence upon a hote desire of conflict, it fell out, that the Romane souldiour had the better a good deale, as being more valorous, more skilfull, & better appointed with weapons for that kind of service. But after that the kings souldiours, whereof many were sore wounded or killed outright, retired themselves to places of safetie, either by naturall situation, or by art of man, the danger returned upon the Romanes heads, who incon-

considerably were engaged into places of disadvantage, and into narrow streights, from whence they could not retire with ease. And surely they had not returned backe againe unpunished for their rashnesse, but that the kings men hearing first an outcrie behind their backs, and seeing also a skirmish begun, were astonished at the suddaine terror, and put besides themselves. Some fled here and there away; others that made a stand and taried still, for that they rather wanted ground to flie than had heart ynough to fight it out, were environned by their enemies both before and behind. The whole armie might have beene utterly defeated, if the winners had lustily followed the chase. But the streights and the roughnesse of the waies hindered the horse, and the weight of armour combed the footmen. At first the king rode amaine with bridle in horse neck, without regard of any thing, or looking behind him: but after he was gotten five miles before, and guessing (as it was indeed) that by reason of the disadvantage of the place, the enemy could not possible make way after; he rested upon a certaine mount, and sent his people all abroad over hills & dales, to rallie his souldiours together, that were disparked. Thus with the losse not all out of two thousand men, the rest of the multitude met together, as if they had repaired to a Rendez-vous upon some signall given, & so marched with a great traine into Theffalie. The Romanes pursued them as farre as they might with safetie, killing them, and tising the dead; yea, and ransacked the kings campe, which though it were naked without defendants, yet for the difficult accesse unto it, they had much trouble to win; and that night they lodged in their own camp. The next day the Confull made pursue after the enemy along the streight, whereas the river runneth among the valleys. The king came the first day unto the hold or campe of Pyrhus (a place so called) in Triphylia, belonging to the territorie of Melotis. From whence the morrow after hee marched a nightie journey with his whole armie (for needs he must goe that feare drives) & approached the mountaine Lingos. These mountaines are in Epirus, situate betwene Macedonie and Theffalie. The side that lieth to Theffalie regardeth the East: that which butteth upon Macedonie, hath the North directly before it. Covered they are and overspread with abundance of woods; yet so as the very tops doe afford open plaines and running waters. The king keeping his campe there for certaine daies, was much troubled and perplexed in his mind, casting and revolving, whether it were expedient for him to returne immediately into his owne kingdome, or possible to retire himselfe into Theffalie. In summe, his resolution was to bring downe his armie into Theffalie. And so to Tricca he marched, the next way hee possibly could. From thence hee passed in great hast through all the cities that were in his way. As many men as were able to follow, he forced to quit their habitations and dwelling houses. The townes he set on fire: yet he permitted every one to carrie away with him as much as he could of his owne goods; all the rest fell to the souldiours share. No manner of crueltie there was, that the very enemy could exercise, but hee practised among his owne allies. And Philip himselfe in the execution thereof, greeved not a little, and was vexed at the heart; but alas, he could do no other: yet his desire was, in that country which within a while should be possessed by the enemy, to save the bodies at leastwise of his associates. In this manner were ransacked and spoiled these townes following, Phacium, Iressæ, Euhydrium, Eretia, and Palæphatus. Against his comming to Pheræ, the gates were shut upon him. And because it would aske some time to win that towne by assault, and no leisure he had thereto, he gave over that enterprise, and passed into Macedonie: for the bruit went, that the Ætoliens also approached. Who having heard of the issue of the battell fought by the river Aous, first waited and ransacked all the countrey neere unto Sperchia and Macra-Come (as they call it) and having from thence passed over into Theffalie, wan Cymines & Angeas with the first assault. Howbeit, a repulse they tooke at Metropolis, whiles they harried the fields about it, by reason, that the townesmen ran together to the defence of their walls. After this, they gave the attempt upon Callithera, where they found the like resistance and violence of the enemies, but there they persisted longer, and gave not over, nay, they drave the enemies that issued forth, within their walls, and contenting themselves with that victorie, they departed thence, seeing no great hope to force the towne. Then they wan and pilld two villages, Theuma and Calathana. As for Acharæ, it was surrendered by composition. And upon the like feare Xynia also was abandoned of her owne inhabitants. These citizens thus driven out of their owne houses, stumbled at a venture upon a garrison which was a leading into Athamania, for the better guard of the forragers that were to purvey com. This multitude, I say, marching disorderly without armour, pell mell together, with a fort that were unmeet for warre, was hewen in peeces by the armed souldiours, and

A Xynia was sacked, thus left and forsaken as it was. After this, the Ætoliens woon Cyphara, a fort and towne of strength, well seated for to empeach and command Dolopia*. These exploits performed the Ætoliens hastily, all in few daies.

Neither rested Aminander nor the Athamans quiet and still, after they heard the newes of the prosperous battaile which the Romanes had fought. But Aminander reposing small trust in his owne souldiours, craved of the Confull a small supply of other forces: and as he marched toward Gomphi, hee surprized forthwith and forced a towne named Pheca, situate betwene Gomphi and the streights that divide Theffalie from Athamania. From thence hee advanced before Gomphi, & assailed the town, which was defended right valiantly for certaine daies: but after that he had erected scaling ladders against it, hee forced the townesmen within, for very feare to yeeld and render all into his hands. The surrender of this cite testified the Theffalians exceedingly: in such sort, that the citizens of Argenta, Pherinum, Thimarum, Lissinas, Stimon and Lamplum, one after another submitted themselves, with other pieces thereby of small importance.

Whiles the Athamanians and Ætoliens (secured from all daunger of the Macedonians) made spoile and raised gaine to themselves by the victorie of others: whiles Theffalie was pilld and sacked by three armies at once, and knew not their friends from their foes, nor whom to trust: the Confull passed over into the countrey of Epirus*, by the way of the streights which hee had opened and made cleere by reason that the enemies were fled. And albeit he knew full well which way all the Epirotes in generall went, and with whom they had sided, excepting onely

C prince Charopus, yet because he saw them not onely carefull to make amends and satisfaction, but also willing and forward to do whatsoever he commaunded, he esteemed and regarded them by their present state, more than by their demeanour past; and so by shewing himselfe inclined to mercie and ease to pardon a fault, he woon their hearts, and gained them unto him for the time to come. After this he dispatched messengers to Corcyra, to will that the hulkes and ships of burden should put into the gulfes of Ambracia*, whiles himselfe travailed by easie journeyes; and the fourth day after pitched his tents upon the hill Cercetius*: and thither he sent for Aminander to repaire with his aids, not for any need hee had of his forces, so as much as of his guidance to direct him in his journey for Theffalie. Most of the Epirotes also, for the same intent were received, who voluntarily offered their helpe and assistance. The first cite that hee assaulted

D in Theffalie, was Phaleria, wherein there lay a garrison of two thousand Macedonians. Who at first held out and resisted most manfully, and as much as either armour or the walls were able to doe, defended themselves. But the assault and batterie continuing uncessantly both night & day; overcame at length the constant and resolute valour of the Macedonians. For the Confull made this reckoning, That upon this point depended the hearts and dispositions of all the other Theffalians, if the first should not bee able to abide the violence and force of the Romanes. Phaleria was no sooner woon, but there came embassadours from Metropolis* & Piera, to render up their cities into his hands, who craved pardon; and obtained it. Phaleria was burnt and sacked. From thence he set forward to Æginium; but seeing the place defensible with any small garrison; and in manner imprenable, he bestowed some small shot of darts upon the next corps de guard, and

E turned his armie toward the countrey about Gomphi, and from thence he marched downe into the plaines of Theffalie. And because his armie was disurnished of all necessaries (for that hee had forborne to make spoile in the territories of the Epirotes) after he had sent out espials afore, to discover whether the hulkes above said were arrived at Leucas* or Ambracia, he sent out his companies one after another to Ambracia, sort to purvey com and victuals. The way betwene Gomphi and Ambracia, as it is comberous and hard for passage, so againe, it is but short and very compendious. So that within few daies he had transported certaine convoies of victuals from the port of Ambracia, whereby the campe was stored with plentie of all provision. From thence he passed to Rhages, a towne almost ten miles distant from Larissa. The citizens thereof are defended from Perthæbia, and the cite it selfe seated upon the river Peneus*. The Theffalians were nothing afraid at the first comming of the Romanes. As for Philip, like as hee durst not himselfe in person march forward into Theffalie, so having taken a place within Tempe*, which he held with a standing campe, he espied into what quarters the enemies intended to go, and ever as he could find any opportunitie and advantage, sent underhand succour and reliefe thither accordingly.

Much

Much about the same time that the Consull first encamped against Philip in the streights of Epirus, L. Quintius also, the Consull his brother, who by commission from the Senat had the charge of the fleet and the government of all the sea coasts, sailed beyond Corcyra with two Gallies of five banks of oars: and hearing that the navie was departed from thence, seeing also there was no staying there, he made saile after apace, and having overtaken them at the Ile Zamma, he dismissed Apollonius, in whose place he succeeded: from whence he went saile and softly, haling after him the most part of the ships which followed with the provision of victuals, until he came to Malca. From whence, when he had given order, that the rest should make as good speed as possibly they could after him, he went with three Quinquereines lightly appointed, and arrived before at Pyraeum, where he received the other ships that L. Apollonius the Lieutenant had left there for the guard and defence of Athens.

At the same time there were two Armadaes set out of Asia, the one conducted by king Attalus, consisting of foure and twentie saile of Quinquereines: the other were of Rhodians, and stood of twentie covert ships with decks and hatches, commaunded by Agelimbrotus, the Admirall. These fleets joyning together about the island Andros, crossed the narrow seas from thence to Euboea. And first they torraited the territorie of the Carystians: afterwards seeing Carystus strong enough against them, by reason of a garison sent to them in all hast from Chalcis, they approached to Eretria. L. Quintius having intelligence that king Attalus was come, repaired thither also with those vessels which had bene at Pyraeum, and gave commaundement, that as many ships as arrived thither belonging to his fleet, should bend their course for Euboea. Now was Eretria by all forcible meanes assaulted, for not only the vessels of three joynt navies had brought thither all sorts of engins and artillerie devised for to shake and batter the walls of cities, but also the fields and country hard by, yeilded them plentie of timber, and other matter to make new. The townes-men from the very first day shewed no valour and courage in defending their walls: and afterwards when they were wearied, and some of them hurt, and saw withall a part of their wall overthrowne by the ordinance and engins of the enemy, enclined to yeeld: but they had amongst them a garison of Macedonians, whom they feared no lesse than the Romans. Moreover, Philoctetes a captaine under the king, sent messengers unto them from Chalcis, assuring them, that if they could hold out still and endure the siege, he would in good time be with them, and bring reliefe. Thus hope and feare together constrained them to drive off longer than either they were willing or well able to do. But when they heard once that Philoctetes had a repulse by the way, and in great hast and feare was retired and fled to Chalcis again, then immediately they sent their embassadors unto Attalus, to crave pardon and protection. Whiles they were wholly bent to seeke peace (whereof they had some hope) and forelacked the affaires of warre-service, opposing their corps de gard on that side only of the wall where the breaches were, and neglecting all besides, behold, Quintius in the night season gaue a camissado in that quarter which was least suspected, and with skaling ladders woon the towne. The whole multitude of the inhabitants fled with their wives and children into the Castle, which also afterwards was rendered up. As for money, gold and silver, there was no great store to speake of: but images, and painted tables of antique worke, artificially wrought, and such like ornaments, there were more found, than for the proportion of the bignesse, or other wealth besides, of such a citie as that was. From thence they set saile once againe for Carystus, where the whole multitude, before the enemies were put aland, having abandoned the citie, were fled into their fortress: from whence they sent their oratours unto the Romane Generall, humbly craving their mercifull protection. The townes-men presently had their lives and libertie graunted them. But the Macedonians were put to their ransom, and they compounded to pay * three hundred silver sesterces apiece, and to give up their armour and weapons, and so to depart: With this summe of money having redeemed themselves they were set over disarmed into Boeotia. These forces at sea having in few dayes gained two noble and renowned cities in Euboea, coasted about Sunium, a promontorie or cape within the territorie of Attica, and arrived before Cenchreae, a towne of merchandise and trafficke belonging to the Corinthians.

The Consull all this while had a longer and more dangerous peece of service in the siege (of Rhages) than all men looked for. And the enemies within made resistance, where he would have least of all suspected. For he supposed verily that all the trouble and difficultie would be in battering downe the wall, and making some breach. For thus he thought, that if he had once

A opened way for his armed souldiours to enter into the towne, the enemies afterwards would either see or be slaine, as it falleth out commonly in cities when they are forced. Howbeit, when part of the wall by the battery of the Ram lay flat along, and the enemies were gotten over at the breaches and ruines thereof: then began their labour and paines anew, as if they had had no trouble nor toile afore. For the Macedonians in garison, who were many in number, and those approved and select souldiours, thinking how honourable a service it would be to defend the citie by valour and dent of sword, rather than by the strength of walls, had raunged themselves in a battaile within forth, strongly marshalled into many ranks and files close together: and when they perceived the Romanes were mounting over the breaches to enter the citie, they repelled & beat them back in that place of great disadvantage, where they had much ado to recover and retire themselves. The Consull hereat was much displeased, and vexed in himselfe: and making this accompr, that such a foule soile and disgrace was not only an occasion of a longer tract of time, before he could force that one citie; but also materiall and important for the maine progresse and proceeding of the whole warre, which commonly dependeth upon the occurrences of light matters and of small moment in the beginning: after he had rid and cleared the place which was choked up with the ruines of the halfe broken wall lying there upon heapes, he reared a towre or frame of timber of a huge height to overtop the walls, consisting of many stories and floores one over another, which contained and carried a mightie number of armed men, and drave the same upon wheelles and rollers close to the wall. More over he sent out certaine ensignes one after another by turnes, to breake through by force (if it were possible) that strong and close battailon of the Macedonians (which they themselves call Phalanx.) But the place being so streight (for that the breach of the wall was nothing broad): the enemies had the vantage both in regard of the weapons which they used, and of the forme of battaile wherein they were raunged. For when the Macedonians standing close one to another with a continued roufe or fence of targuets over their heads, opposed their pikes before them which were of an exceeding length: the Romanes neither with their darts could hurt them as farre off, nor with their swords drawn come neere them to fight close at hand, or cut their pikes atwo: and if it chaunced that they whipt off or snapt any asunder, yet the Steele and truncheon thereof being sharp still at the point (headlesse though it were) among the other pikes that were headed, served to make a fence as it were an haie or palaifade. Over and besides, that part of the wall that stood whole and sound still, was a sure defence unto both flankes of the enemies: neither had the Romanes any large roume at length to returne, and from thence to fetch their beire, and so geve a violent charge, which is the thing that usually breaketh and disordereth ranks. Moreover there chaunced one thing by meere fortune that encouraged them within: for as the towre aforesaid was in driving over a terrasse or banke whereof the floore was not fast and soundly hardened with the rammer, one of the wheelles hapned to sinke in and make a deepe rut in the ground, whereby the whole frame nodded so forward, that the enemies without thought verily it was readie to fall; and the armed souldiours standing upon it within, quaked for feare, and were put welneere besides their wits. Thus when nothing that was provided might availe and come to any great effect, the Consull was vexed at the heart, to see himselfe so much overmarched in souldiours, in armour, and in manner of service; and withall hee considered, that hee had no helpe to force the citie and to win it in any short time, nor could make meanes to passe the winter in those parts so farrre from sea, and left naked alreadie and wast by those calamities that follow warres. Whereupon hee raised the siege: and because there was no haven in all the tract and coast of Acarnania and Aetolia, which was able both to receive and harbour all his hulkes that brought victuals for his armie, and also to yeeld winter lodging for his legions; he thought upon the Isle Anticyra within the countrey of Phocis; which lying toward the gulfes of Corinth, seemed to him most fit & commodious for his purpose; because they should not remove far from Thessalie; & the territorie belonging to the enemies; having besides Peloponnesus affront even over against them, divided but by a small arme of the sea: at their backe Aetolia and Acarnania: and of each side Locris and Boeotia. At the first assault, the Consull without any resistance wan Panopea in Phocis. Anticyra likewise long endured not the siege. Then Ambrysus and Hyampolis were received by composition. Daulis by reason that it was situate upon an high hill, could neither be scaled nor forced by instruments and engins of batterie. But the Romanes by launching their darts and shooting arrows rowes against them that were in guard, trained them forth to skirmish; and after some light G scuffings to no effect, whiles one while they seemed to flie, and other whiles to pursue, they brought them to be so carelesse, so negligent and so little respectiue, that when the enemies fled backe within the gate, they entered pellmell with them, and so were masters of the towne. Other small forts likewise of Phocis yeelded rather for feare than any force offered unto them. Elatia kept their gates shut, and made a countenance, that unless they were driven thereunto, they would receive within their walles neither Romane captaine nor armie.

While the Consull lay at the siege before Elatia, there was presented unto him the hope of a greater matter, namely, of withdrawing the nation of the Achæi from the kings alliance to the amitie of the Romanes. For they had expelled and banished Cycliadas the chiefe of that faction that sided with Philip: and Aristhenus who friended the Romanes and fought to be confedered H with them, was Pretour for the time.

Now the Romane Armada, together with Attalus and the Rhodians, rode at ancre in the haven of Cenchreæ, & they all were agreed in common to assail Corinth. But the Consull thought good, before that they should put that designment in action, to send embassadours to the State of Achaia, promising, if they would revolt from the king and turne to them, to deliver Corinth into their hands, for to be incorporate into the auncient league and councell of their nation. And so by the aduise of the Consull, there were embassadours addressed to the Achæans from his brother L. Quintius, from Attalus, the Rhodians, and the Athenians. And at Sicyone was there a counsell and Diet held, for to give them audience. Now the Achæans were not all of one mind and alike affected. The Athenians (a dangerous, an ordinarie, and continuall enemy of theirs) put them in feare of one side: the Romanes they had in dread and horrore of another. To the Macedonians they were obliged and bound by many good turnes and favours, as well old as new. The king himselfe they held in jealousie for his crueltie and treacherie: and casting a prooffe and conjecture by those courses which he then tooke, and by his practises for the time, they foresaw well, that after the war ended, he would be intollerable and a very tyrant over them. They were besides not onely ignorant, what every man had said in the severall councells of every particular State, and in the generall Diets of the whole nation, when they were required to deliver their opinions; but also uncertaine and unresolute among themselves in their owne minds what to will or wish. Vnto men thus doubtfully disposed and unsetled, the embassadours above said were admitted, and license was given them to deliver their message. First, the Romane K embassadour L. Calpurnius; after him, those that were for king Attalus: and in the third place, the Rhodians spake and made discourse: and consequently, the embassadours of Philip were permitted to parle. The Athenians had audience given them last of all, and were reserved of purpose to confute whatsoever should be spoken and alledged by the Macedonians. And these Athenians inveighed most sharply & bitterly against the king, for none had received either more wrongs, or suffered the like indignities at his hands as they had. So this assembly verily for that time (by reason that the day was spent in hearing the continued orations of so many embassadours) brake up about sun-setting. The morrow after, they assembled againe: where the magistrates by the voice of the Bedle or publique cryer (after the custome of the Greekes) gave libertie to every person to deliver his mind, and no man stepped forth. Great silence there was, L and not a word among them for a long time, looking wistly one upon another who should begin first. And no marvaile, if they whose spirits were astonished in some sort within them, when they of their owne accord cast and tossed in their minds things so different and contrarie, were now more troubled and perplexed by those orations besides that had lasted all the long day, broaching, uttering, and advising many matters so harsh, so difficult, and unpleasant unto them. At length because the Councell should not be dissolved without some speech and parle, Aristhenus the Pretor of the Achæans began to speak, and said: What is become (my masters of Achæa) of those hearts of yours and couragious stomacks, whereby at all your assises and in your privat meetings (when talk is ministred of Philip and the Romanes) you can hardly hold your hands, but are ready to flie one in anothers face? And now, when as this honourable court of parliament is M published and holden for the same purpose only; when ye have heard the reasons and allegations of the embassadours of all parts; when the magistrats propound the matter to be debated in councell; when the publique cryer calleth you to give your opinions, ye are mute and dumb: If the regard of the common good and welfare of us all, will not cause you to open your lips; cannot the

A the privat respects and affections neither (which have inclined and caried your minds to the one side or the other) fetch out a word from any of your mouthes? Considering especially, that no man is so grosse and blockish, who can be ignorant that now is the very time or never, for each one to say and deliver his mind as he will himselfe, and as he thinketh best, before we resolve and determine of any course: and when a decree or act is once passed, that all men are bound (even they themselves that before misliked it) to defend and maintaine the same, as a good and profitable accord. This admonition of the Pretour was so farr short of drawing any one of them to utter his opinion, that it caused not so much as the least noise or humming in so frequent an audiorie and congregation of so many States together. Then Aristhenus the Pretour began againe and followed his speech in this manner. It seemeth (my masters and friends of Achæa here assembled) that ye are not so much to seeke for counsell and aduise, but ye are as short of your tongues and loth to speake. And every one here is unwilling to provide for their generall good, for feare least hee should incur some particular perill. My selfe likewise peradventure would be silent and hold my peace if I were a privat person: But now being Pretour, I see thus much, That either there should have no audience at all beene given unto the Embassadours, or else, that they ought not to be sent away from hence without an answere: and answere them how can I, without your ordinance? Now seeing that there is none of you all, who have beene summoned hither to this Councell, that either will or dare say a word to the cause: let us examine thoroughly and consider well in lieu of your opinions, those speeches which yesterday were pronounced by the embassadours: let us (I say) revise them so, as if they had not demanded C those things which concerned their owne good and commoditie, but as though they proposed such points as they esteemed profitable and expedient for us all. The Romanes, the Rhodians, and king Attalus require our alliance and amitie: and in that warre which they wage against Philip, they thinke it reason to be aided from us. Philip againe, putteth us in mind of our societie with him, and of our oath. Once while he requireth us to stand and band with him: otherwhiles, hee saith hee will be content that wee should sit still, and meddle neither one way nor other. Is there no man here knoweth the reason, why they that are not yet our allies, demand and crave more than hee that is our allie already? It is neither the modestie of Philip, nor the impudencie of the Romanes that is the cause hereof. The ports and haven-townes they be of Achæa, which minister confidence and assurance to those demanders, and take away the same from D them againe. From Philip wee see nothing but only an Embassadour. The sea-forces of the Romanes and their fleet, ride in the harborough of Cenchreæ: they carrie afore them in shew, the spoiles of the cities in Eubœa. The Consull himselfe with his land armie of the legions, we see disjoined from us by a small arme onely of the sea, raunging at their pleasure all over Phocis and Locris. Marvell now longer if you can, why Cleomedon the embassadour of Philip demanded erewhile so coldly and diffidently, that wee should take armes for the king against the Romanes: who, if we by vertue of the same league and oth, wherewith hee seemed to charge us in conscience, required of him againe, that Philip should defend us both from Nabis and the Lacedemonians, and also from the Romanes; would bee to seeke not onely of a garrison and power of armed men to shield us, but likewise of a very answere to shape us. And verily hee E would be no more ready to satisfie us, than Philip was himselfe the last yeere; who notwithstanding hee frankly promised to levie warre against Nabis, and thereby assaied to traine and draw the flower of our youth from hence into Eubœa: after that hee saw once that we neither agreed to send him that power, nor yet were willing to entangle our selves, and be interested in the Romane warre, forgot soone that societie that now hee standeth and vaunteth so much of, and left us to the mercie and devotion of Nabis and the Lacedemonians, to bee spoiled, pilld, and waited at their pleasures. And certes, so much as I can conceive of Cleomedon his Oration, methinks it hangeth not well together, and one peece thereof sorteth not well with another. He seemed to speake of the Romane warre contemptuously, as if it were a matter of nothing; saying the event and issue thereof would be like the former, which they maintained with Philip. How is it then, that he keepeth himselfe away, and in his absence demandeth our helpe, rather than with his personall F presence protecteth us both from Nabis and the Romanes? Vnto I say, his auncient Allies? But what speake I of us? Why hath he suffered them to force and win Eretria and Carystum? why endured he, that so many cities of Thessalie should bee lost? How could hee abide Locris and Phocis to be overrun so, as they are? and Elatia now at this day so streightly besieged, and horly assaulted?

assaulted? Why quit he the streights of Epirus, and abandoned those imprenable holds upon the river Aous, by force, for feare, of his owne accord, or howsoever? and when hee had forgone and disleis himselfe of that passe which hee held, why retired hee into the inland parts of his realme for his safetie? If willingly and of his owne accord hee abandoned so many of his allies, and left them to be spoiled and ransacked by the enemye, what can hee alleadge or say for himselfe, why those allies aforesaid may not provide for themselves the best they can? If for feare, let him pardon us likewise, if we be afraid. But if he were vanquished by force of armes, and therefore retired backe, shall wee, good Cleomedon, sustaine and endure the Romane puissance and their mightie armies, against which yee Macedonians were not able to stand? Or would you have us to beleve you, that beare us in hand, how the Romanes warre not at this present, either with greater numbers or stronger forces than they have done heretofore, rather than trust our owne eyes, and that which daily wee see before our faces? In those daies they succoured the Ætolians with their navie, and warred neither under the conduct, nor with the armie of a Consull. The maritime cities of the confederates of Philip, were then in trouble and tumult, but all the mediterranean parts within the continent, were so secure and warisied from the Romane forces, that Philip spoiled and forraied the Ætolians, imploring and seeking for helpe of the Romanes, but all in vaine. But now at this day the Romanes having finished the Carthaginian warre, which for sixteene yeares space they supported in the very heart and bowels of Italie, have not sent a garison to succour and maintaine the Ætolians in their warres, but are come themselves, as leaders and commanders Generall, and by land and sea at once have warred upon Macedonie. And this is the third Consull of theirs, who at this present maintaineth mortall warre upon it, to the uttermost of his power. Sulpitius hath encountred the king in the midst of Macedonie, bidden him battell, discomfited and put him to flight, after hee had laid wast and desolate the wealthiest quarter of all his kingdom. Quintius lately hath driven him out of campe and field, notwithstanding he were possessed of the streight avenues of Epirus, and bare himselfe boldly and confidently upon the naturall situation of the ground, of his strong defences, and force of a complete armie: and having pursued him as hee fled into Thessalie, hath taken the garison townes of the king, and in manner within his owne sight, woon by fine force his confederat cities. Suppose and say, that all those things which the Athenians erewhile have alleadged concerning the crueltie, the avarice, and unbridled lust of the king, bee not true, but supposed slaunders; admit that those enormities and wicked parts committed within the Atticke land, against the gods of heaven above, of the infernall spirits beneath, touch not us at all, and are much lesse pertinent, than those outrages which the Elæuntij and the Abydenes, so far remote from us, have endured. Forget we our selves, if yee will, the hurts, the wounds, and losses that we have received, the murders, the pilling and rising of the goods of Messenia in the midst of Peloponnesus. Likewise, how his friend and host Garitenes at Cyparissia, was killed against all law of god and man, even in a manner sitting at the board with meat in his month. Say we nothing also of Attalus the father and sonne, both Sicyonians, who were cruelly massacred, and yet he was wont to call the slie and wretched old man, Father. Also forbear we to speake of the sonnes wife, who was carried away into Macedonie, to make her his harlot and concubine, & to abuse her at his pleasure. Let other rapes of virgines, forcings of honourable dames be forgotten: let us imagine that wee have nothing to doe, nor to meddle with Philip, for feare of whose crueltie ye were all so mute, and could not open your mouth. For what other cause of silence had yee, being called hither to this counsell? Let us put the case, that we were to debate the matter with Antigonus, that most mild and just prince, at whose gracious hands wee have received so many favours and pleasures above all other kings: would he demaund, thinke ye, that wee should doe that which possibly then could not be done? Peloponnesus is a demie island, joined to the firme continent and maine land, by the narrow streight or banke of Isthmus, lying open and exposed to nothing more than to sea forces. If one hundred covert and decked ships with hatches, and fiftie lighter vessels which are open, together with thirtie Brigantines or foists of Iffa, should come to pill and spoile our sea coasts, and begin to assaile our townes and citties that lie open upon the river, even on the very strand, and sea bankes; should we retire our selves, thinke yee, into our cities within the land? Why? what els? As though we were not already afflicted and plagued with intestine war, which sticketh even within our ribs and bowels? When Nabis and the Lacedæmonians by land, the Romane navie by sea shall lie upon us, to doe us all annoy, how should it call upon the kings societie, or for the helpe

A helpe of the Macedonians? Or shall wee of our selves, by our owne strength and meanes save our cities which shall be assaulted, against the puissance & power of the Romanes? For in the former war we bravely defended (did we not) the citie of Dymæ. We have examples ynough of the fearful calamities and losses of others, that we need not to make our selves examples unto others. Take heed (I beseech you) how you set light and disdain, that the Romanes have of their owne motive offered their friendship and alliance, which indeed yee were to with for, and seeke all that everye could. It is for very feare (no doubt) that they are driven, being in a strange land, to flie unto you for your alliance, because they would gladly shroud themselves under the shadow of your wings, be harboured within your havens, and sustained by your victuall and provision. No, no, lords they are first of the seas, who can denie it? there is not a land they set foot into, but immediately it is their owne, and in subjection unto them: whatsoever they seeme to request, they can commaund if they list. And because they are willing to spare and forbear you, therefore it is that they suffer you not to enter into any action that might be cause of your ruine & overthrow. For whereas Cleomedon erewhile seemed to shew and lay before you a meane and indifferent course, and that forsooth, which should be the safest way that you could take, namely to enter into no armes at all, to sit still and sleepe in a hole skinn, that, I say, is no middle way, no nor (to speak truth) any way at all. For besides this, that yee must either accept or refuse the alliance with the Romanes, what els will become of us, but to be a prey unto the conquerour, having lost the grace and favour both of the one and the other? as men that like neutres, expecting the issue of the warre, frame our designements and counsels to the blind direction of fortune. Well, once again I say, take heed you thinke not scorne of that which with all your heart you should wish and pray for, onely for that it is tendered and presented unto you. And never thinke, that because to day you have the choise of both in your owne hands, therefore yee shall ever have the same libertie hereafter. Occasions and opportunities are not alwaies the same, neither do they continue long. All this whiles have yee had a desire to save and free your selves from Philip, but evermore by wiles & paires in secret heart, rather than by taking armes in open hand. Now there are those which with great armies and armadaes have passed the seas, who without your paine and perill are ready to deliver you from his hands. These men, if yee reject and refuse for your allies, yee are not well in your wits, and have them you must either your allies or your enemies, there is no remedie.

D After this Oration of the Pretour, there arose a muttering and noise in the assemblie, whiles some approved and gave assent unto that which he said, others rebuked in churlish wise those that accorded. In so much, as they jangled not one with another in particular, but the very States there assembled were at variance, yea, and this debate betweene the magistrats of the whole nation (whom they call Demiurgi, and ten they are in number) was as hotely maintained, as among the multitude. Five of them said, they would propound unto the people, and debate with them in counsell about accepting the alliance of the people of Rome, & put it to voyces. The other five protested, that this was directly against a law, in that case provided, forbidding expressly that no magistrats should either propound or determine ought in any Diet, prejudiciall to the societie and league with Philip. Thus was this day also spent in debating & wrangling, and nothing done. There remained one day yet of a full Diet and counsell, for by law they were to conclude and decree somewhat within three dayes at the farthest. Against that time, the parties were so hotely bent one against the other, that the fathers could hardly forbear to offer violence to their very children. There was one Rhissasus of Pellenæ, who had a sonne named Memnon, and he was a Demiurgus, who tooke part and sided with them that would not permit the matter to be put to question, and determined by a scrutinie of voyces. This Rhissasus having instantly a long time importuned his sonne, and besought him to suffer the Acheans to provide for their weale publick, and not by his peevish frowardnes undo the state of the whole nation: when he saw once that all his prayers prevailed nothing, he sware a great oath that he would kill him with his owne hands, and not take him for his sonne, but for an errant enemy. By which his menaces, he gained thus much in the end, that content he was the next day to joyne with them that put the matter to question: who now being more in number than the other, made a report, and proposed the cause to the assemblie: and when all the States in manner there met, enclined thereto, and approved thereof, so as they avowed openly what they would ordeine; the Dymæans, Megapolitans, and certeine Argives, before the decree was enacted, rose up all at once, and departed ted out of the assembly, and no man either wondered at it, or blamed them for it. As for the Megapolitanes, no longer ago than in their grandfires dayes, at what time as they were expelled out of their country by the Lacedemonians, K. Antigonus had restored them again. The Dymeans being but lately taken prisoners, and rancked by the Romane armie, Philip having given order that they should be redeemed wheresoever they were in slavery and bondage, he not only set free, but also replanted in their owne country. The Argives last of all, besides that they are of a settled opinion and beliefe, that the Macedonian kings are descended from them, were for the most part linked unto Philip in the right and regard of private hospitalitie, and familiar friendship. In these respects, they went out of that assembly which inclined to the contract of alliance with the Romanes, and were held excused for this departure; being thus obliged unto Philip the adverse part, by great favours and benefices, yea and those newly received at his hands. All the other States of the Achæans, when they were demaunded their opinions, without delay confirmed by their immediat decree, the societie with Attalus and the Rhodians: but the league with the people of Rome, because it could not be ratified and established without the Act of the people, was referred and put off untill the time that embassadours might be sent unto Rome. But for the present it was thought good that three embassadours should be addressed unto L. Quintius, and that all the forces of the Achæans should march toward Corinth, for that Quintius having woon the port of Cenchreæ, was already at the siege and assault of that citie.

These Achæans encamped themselves over against that gate that openeth toward Sicyone: the Romanes lay against that part of the citie which looketh toward Cenchreæ, and Attalus having led his armie through the narrow streight of Isthmus, assailed them of Lechæus side, which is an haven of the other sea. At the first they made no hore assault, hoping that there would be some mutinie betweene the townes-men and the kings garison. But perceiving they were all of one mind and resolution, and that both the Macedonians defended the citie, as their owne native countrie: and also the Corinthians were content to be at the full command and direction of Androphæus the captaine of the garison, as well as if he had bene their fellow-citizen, and lawfully chosen by their owne election and suffrages: then the assailants had no other hope but in the violent force of armes and engines. And of all sides they had raised banks and mures, and were come close to the walls, although with hard access thereto. Now had the Ram from that quarter where the Romanes lay, beaten downe a good part of the wall. To which breach, because it lay naked without defence, all the Macedonians ran to guard and defend it by strength of armes: where there was a cruell fight between them and the Romanes. At the first the Romanes were soone repulsed by meanes of the great numbers of defendants: but after the succours of the Achæi and Attalus came unto them, they received them with equall valour: neither doubted they but to be able with ease to drive the Macedonians and the Greeks from their standings, and force them to recule. But there were within the towne a multitude of Italian fugitives revolted and fled from the Romanes: part of them, a residue left of Anniball his armie; who having transgressed the lawes, for feare of punishment were fled from the Romanes, and tooke part with Philip: part also were mariners and seafaring men, who for hope of more honorable intertainment and service, had abandoned their ships, and were gotten into the citie of Corinth. These fellows past all hope of life, if the Romanes happily should have the better hand, fared more like mad men than hardie and audacious souldiours. Now there is over against Sicyone a promontorie of Iuno, which they call the cape of Acree, and it runneth into the sea: from whence the passage over to Corinth is a cut almost of seven miles. Thither Philocles, a captaine also under king Philip, had conducted through Boeotia 1500 souldiours: and certaine Brigantines of Corinth were there ready to embarke that supplie of aid, and to transport them to Lechæus. By this time Attalus advised to set on fire the engines and fabricks that they had made, and presenly to geve over the siege. Quintius persisted yet more obstinately in his enterprize begun. But he also seeing the kings guards raunged and quartered at every gate, and that if they should happen to fallie out, their violence would hardly be sustained, was of the same mind with Attalus. So without effecting anything, the Achæans were dismissed, and the rest returned to their ships, Attalus to Piræcum, the Romanes to Corcyra.

During this service by sea forces, the (other) Consull who lay in camp before Elatia in Phocis, first assayed to gaine the citie by conference and parlie with the principall citizens thereof: but after answer made, that it lay not in their hands, and that they who were for the king, out-

A went the townes-men both in number and strength: then at once from all parts he gave an assault unto the citie both by force of armes, and also by engines of artillerie. The Ram was bent against the walls, and as much thereof beaten downe with a mightie crash and fearefull noyse, as stood between the towres: whereupon the towne was dismanicled and laid naked; and withall a cohort of Romane souldiours entred at the open breach; so as from all parts the defendants abandoned their guards, and ran to that place that thus was distressed by the enemies. And at one instant the Romanes advanced themselves over the breach, and set up skaling ladders against the wall which was standing: and whiles the enemies were amused wholie, and had their eie only upon that one place where the conflict was, the wall in many parts was scaled, and armed souldiours mounted into the citie. At which sodaine tumult and alarme, the armed men having B quit the place which they guarded with a thick troupe, fled all into the castell for feare, and the unarmed and naked multitude followed after. Thus the Consull was maister of the citie: which being rancked, he sent unto the castell certaine messengers, promising life to as many of the kings garison as would depart away without armes, and offering libertie to the Elatians: and after securitie given hereof, within few dayes the castle also was rendred into his hands. Moreover, by the arrivall of Philocles (a commander for the king) in Achæa, not Corinth only was delivered from siege, but the citie also of the Argives, was by certaine of the principall rulers betrayed unto Philocles, who before had founded and sollicitated the minds and affections of the common people. There was a custome in this citie, that upon the first day of their generall assemblies, the Pretor should in token of good luck pronounce the names of Jupiter, Apollo, and Hercules: and C afterwards ordeined it was besides by a law, that the name of Philip should make up the fourth. Now after the alliance accorded betweene them and the Romanes, it hapned that the beadle or publick cryer left out the name of Philip: whereat the multitude first began to mutter & grumble: then arose a loud cry of those that put him in mind to name the king, willing him to geve him his honor due by law: untill at last his name was also pronounced with great applause & consent. Vpon the confidence & assurance of this favour, Philocles was sent for, who by night seised upon an hill that commaundeth the citie, which commonly is called the fort of Larissa; and having put a garison there, the next morning betimes he advanced forward with banner displaid, and came downe toward the common place, lying under the fortresse aforesaid: where there encountered him a band of armed men well appointed in order of battaile. These were the garison of the D Achæi lately there placed, to the number of five hundred elect men chosen forth of all the States of Achæa: and one Anefidemus a Dymeian was their commander. Vnto him Philocles (one of the kings captaines aforesaid) addressed a speciall messenger to persuade and exhort him to quit the citie; giving him to understand, That hee and his companie were not able to match the townesmen alone, who caried the same mind that the Macedonians had done: much lesse then should they stand out when the Macedonians were joined unto them; the Macedonians (I say) whome the verie Romanes themselves could not sustaine at Corinth. At first he did no good either with leader or souldiour: yea and when within a while they beheld the Argives also marching armed against them with a great troupe from another part, and saw present death before their eies, yet it seemed they would have put it to the hazard of a conflict, and E sought to the last man, in case their captaine would have stucke to it, and not relented. But Anefidemus for feare lest together with the citie, the floure of all the youth of Achæa should perish, capitulated with Philocles, that they might be permitted to depart and goe their way: but himselfe kept his ground still in his armour, with some few of his followers and vassals, and remooved not a foot. Then Philocles sent out unto him, to demaund, What he meant thereby? Vnto whom he gave no other words, but holding forth his shield before him made answer, That armed as he was he would live and die in the guard and defence of that citie which was committed to his charge. Then by the commandement of the captaines, the Thracians launced their darts and shot at him, and so both he and the companie about him were slaine every one. Thus after the accord of alliance betweene the Achæans and Romanes, two most noble and famous cities (Argi and Corinth) came under the subjection of the king. These were the actes achieved F by the Romanes as well by land as sea this summer.

In Fraunce there was no exploit performed worth remembrance by Sext. Atilius the Consull, notwithstanding he had under his government two entire armies: the one that he retained still with him, which by order hee should have discharged, and was the same that had before bene commanded by L. Cornelius the Proconsull, and now by him was committed to the charge of C. Aelius: the other, that he brought himselfe with him into the province. So that hee employed the whole yeere almost in compelling the men of Cremona and Placentia to returne into their colonies, from whence by sundry casualties of warre they were chased and dispersed. As Fraunce that yeere was in quiet beyond all hope and expectation, so about the citie of Rome there had like to have beene a commotion and tumult of bondslaves. The Carthaginian hostages were in guard and kept at Setia, where they had attending about them (as meet was for the children of the chiefe nobles and princes of Carthage) a mightie traine and retinue of servants. The number of them was the greater by occasion of the late Africane warre; during which time and presently after, the Setines also themselves had bought up many of that nation which were taken captives, and came in pott-sale with the rest of the prizes. These having conspired together, sent out certaine of their owne companie to sollicite also the other slaves that were in the territoire of Setia, and so forth, as many as they could find about Norba and Circij. Their plot was, that when all things were provided aforehand, they should upon the very day of the solemne games and plaies (which shortly were to be exhibited and set forth in Setia) take the opportunistic of the time, when as the people were busie in beholding the spectacle and shew represented unto their eye, and to run upon them: and when they had by inasacre in this sodaine hurlyburly possessed themselves of Setia, then to go forward and surpris Norba and Circij. This horrible complot and conspiracie was detected, and information given at Rome to L. Cornelius Merula Pretour at that time of the citie. For two bondslaves early in a morning before day, presented themselves unto him, and opened from point to point in order, namely, what had ben contrived and done, and what remained yet to do. The Pretor having taken order for their safe custodie at home within his own house, called the Senat together; where, after he had recounted and declared unto them what these enformers had revealed, he was commanded to goe abroad to search out and repress this conspiracie. Forth he marched with five lieutenants of the campe, & looke how many he could meet with in his way all over the fields, villages, and hamlets, he rendered unto them a militarie ord, and constrained them to arme and follow him. Thus in this hastie manner of levie, he armed well neere two thousand, and with them all together (who knew not whether he meant to goe nor to what peece of service he led them) to Setia he came. At his first entrance, he sodainly in great hast apprehended the principall heads of the conspiracie; whereupon the slaves fled out of the towne. Then were sent out certaine into the fields, to trace and to find them out by their tracks. In this businesse there were two bondslaves and one free man that performed singular good service. Unto him the LL. of the Senate gave order, that there should be paid 100000 Asles in brasse coine: but unto the slaves 25000 & their freedom. For the redemption of whom, their masters were contented their full price out of the chamber of the citie. Not long after, it was reported that the remnant of this conspiracie purposed to surpris Preneste. Thither marched L. Cornelius the Pretour of the citie, where he executed about five hundred persons who were found guiltie. The citie was in great feare to see how the hostages and captives of the Carthaginians practised such troubles. Therefore in Rome a standing watch was kept in every street: and the inferior magistrates were charged to see to it and to walke the round, and the Triumvirs likewise (or three Sheriffes) to have a better eye and looke to the Quartie-prison. The Pretour also directed his letters into all quarters of the Latine nation to this effect, That all the hostages should be kept within doores, and not suffered to goe abroad into the streets: that all captives and prisoners should have gyves about their heeles of ten pound weight at least, and be kept in no other ward but in the common goale.

The same yeere came embassadours from king Attalus, who presented in the Capitoll a golden crowne of 246 pound weight, with great thanksgiving unto the Senat, that king Antiochus in regard of the autoritie and countenance of the Romane Embassadours, had withdrawn his forces out of the confines of Attalus. The same sommer two hundred men of armes, ten Elephants, and 200000 Modij of wheat sent from king Masiniissa, arrived at the campe in Greece. Likewise out of Sicilie and Sardinia, there was sent great store of victuall and liveries for the armie. In Sicilie M. Marcellus was L. governour, and in Sardinia M. Porcius Cato, an upright man and living without touch and reproch, save onely he was thought somewhat too severe in restraining of usurie. Hee banished out of that Iland all usurers: hee abridged also and cut off cleane the charges which the allies were wont to defray for the entertainment of the Pretour.

Sax.

Sax. Aelius the Consull being returned to Rome out of Fraunce in regard of the generall assembly for election of magistrates, created Consuls Cn. Cornelius Cethegus and Q. Minutius Rufus. And two daies after, the election was held for Pretours. This yeere first were chosen six Pretours, by reason that the number of provinces encreased, and the Romane Empire and seignorie extended farther. And these were they, to wit, L. Manlius Volsus, Cn. Sempronius Tuditanus, M. Sergius Silus, M. Helvius, M. Minutius Rufus, and L. Aclius. Of these, Sempronius and Helvius were Aediles of the Commons; Q. Minutius Thermus and T. Sempronius Longus Aediles of the chaire. The Romane games this yeere were four times renewed. Cn. Cornelius and Q. Minutius being Consuls, above all things went in hand with the provinces of Consuls and Pretours: and first they dispatched those that concerned the Pretours (a matter that might be decided by calling lots.) To Sergius fell the jurisdiction of the citie, and to Minutius the foreine, over strangers. Aclius was appointed to Sardinia, Manlius to Sicilie, Sempronius to that part of Spaine betwene Italie and Iberus; and Helvius unto the other beyond the river.

When the Consuls were upon the point to cast lots likewise for their provinces, namely, Italie and Macedonie, L. Oppius, and Q. Fulvius Tribunes of the Commons, interposed themselves and staid them, alleading, That Macedonie was a province lying farre off, and there was no one thing that had more impeached and hindered the proceeding of warres to that day than this, That in so remote parts, the Consull ever of the former yeere was called home before hee were settled in his affaires, and when hee should bee employed most in warres. Now have there foure yeeres already gone over our heads, since we decreed and concluded to follow the Macedonian warre; during which time, Sulpitius spent the greater part of his yeer, in seeking after the king and his armie; Villius, when hee should encounter the enemy, was called away before hee had effected any exploit; as for Quintius, he was kept at Rome still for the most part of the yeer, in attendance about church matters and sacrifices: howbeit the affaires of warres under his conduct were managed so well, that if either he had gone sooner into his province, or the winter had been later, he might have dispatched the warres there: and now, that he is ready to retire into his standing campe and wintering harbours, the report is, that hee hath brought the warre to that good passe and forwardnesse, that unlesse hee bee not hindered by a new successe, in all likely hood and apparence, he will make a small end thereof the next summer.

With these speeches they prevailed so much, that the Consuls for their part promised to be ordered and set downe by the Senat in this behalfe, upon condition, that the Tribunes would be content to doe the like. Now when of both sides they had referred themselves to a free and absolute consultation, the LL. of the Senat assigned to both the Consuls the government of Italie, and continued the command of the armie still with T. Quintius, untill there came another to succeed him. Two legions were appointed for the Consull, with commission to war upon the Gauls betwene Rome and the Alps, who had revolted from the people of Rome. And for Quintius ordained it was, that there should be sent into Macedonie unto him, a new supplie of five thousand foot, three hundred horse, and three thousand sea-servitours and mariners. And likewise, that the same L. Quintius Flamininus should be Admirall of the navie, as before. For the Pretors who were to go into Spaine, there was an allowance of eight thousand footmen out of the allies of the Latine nation, and foure hundred horsemen, so that they dismissed the old soldiours out of Spaine: and enjoined they were to limit and set out the bonds of their severall provinces, whereas the higher Spaine and the lower should part. And for Macedonie there were two lieutenants more for the armie appointed, to wit, P. Sulpitius and P. Villius, who had ben Consuls both, and in that province.

Before that either Consuls or Pretours went out into their provinces, it was thought good to take order for the prodigious tokens which happened. For at Rome the temple of Vulcanus and Samnanus; at Fregellæ, the wall and a gate of the citie, were stricken with lightning. At Frusino it appeared light (as it had been cleare day) in the night season. At Asculum a lamb was yeened having two heads and five feet. Also at Formiæ two wolves entred into the towne, and worried some that were in their way. Last of all, at Rome there was a wolfe, that not onely came into the citie, but went forward as far as to the Capitoll.

C. Aclius a Tribune of the Commons proposed a law, that there should bee five colonies conducted to the sea side, and there planted: two at the mouth of the rivers Vulturinus and Liter- Puzzele nus, one at Putcoli, another in the Burrough town of Salernum, & to make the fift Buxentum Discenta Ni- gro, or Festia, was Ligorio.

was adjoined to the rest. Into every Colonie order was taken, that there should bee thirtie households sent. The three Commissaries, called Triumvirs, for the conducting of these colonies were created, namely, M. Servilius Geminus, Q. Minutius Thermus, & T. Sempronius Longus. These three had commission to continue in the charge of this office three years. After the muster, and all other matters accomplished, pertaining to God and man, that were by the Consuls to be performed, then they set forward both into their provinces. Cornelius took his way directly against the Insubrians, who accompanied with the Cenomanes, were entered at that time into annes: Q. Minutius in his journey bare on the left hand of Italie toward the nether seas; and conducting his armie to Genua, began with the Ligurians to make warre. Clasidium and Litubium, townes both of the Ligurians, likewise two States of the same nation, the Celelates and the Cerdiciates surrendered unto him; insomuch as all the countie on this side the Po, were in subjection to the Romanes, except the Boians among the Gaules, and the Iuates among the Ligurians. By report there were fiftene townes containing twentie thousand men, which yeelded unto them. From thence he led the legions into the territorie of the Boians. The armie of the Boians had passed over the Po a little before, and joined with the Insubrians and Cenomanes: for hearing that the Consuls would warre jointly with both their forces, they intended likewise to make themselves more strong, by uniting and bringing their power together. But the bruit being blowne abroad, that one of the Consuls invaded and fired the countie of the Boians, presently there arose a tumult. For the Boians demanded, that they all in generall would helpe them in their distresse. The Insubrians refused and said, That they would not abandon their own confines: by which occasion they disbanded. The Boians went to the defence of their owne countie, and the Insubrians with the Cenomanes, sat them downe upon the bankes of the river Mincius. Five miles beneath that place, the Consull Cornelius also encamped himselfe neere the said river: from whence he sent certaine messengers all about the villages, and to Brixia, the head citie of that nation: and being advertised sufficiently that the youth was up in arms, without the warrant and consent of their auncients; and that the Cenomanes joined not with the Insubrians in their rebellion by vertue of publick counsell and authoritie; he sent for the principall persons among them, and began to labour and deale with them, that the Cenomanes would forsake the Insubrians, and openly with their ensignes advaunced, either to returne into their owne countie, or turne to the Romanes. This they could not bring them to: howbeit they assured the Consull, that in the field they would either sit still and doe nothing, or els, if any good opportunitie was presented unto them, they would aid the Romanes. The Insubrians knew nothing of this comploit: and yet, some doubt & suspicion they had, that their allies halted, and were not sound of heart: and therefore when there was occasion to lead forth to fight a field, they durst not trust them with either of the two wings and points of the battell, for fear if they reculed like false brethren, they should hazard the maine chaunce: but placed them behind the ensignes in the arriergard. The Consull in the beginning of the battell vowed a temple to Iuno Sospita, in case he discomfited the enemies that day, and put them to the rout. The souldiours set up a shout, & cried aloud that they would bring it to passe that the Consull should have his desire, and therewith charged the enemy right fiercely. The Insubrians could not abide the first shooke. Some write, that in the very conflict the Cenomanes also suddainely set upon their backe, whereby they were distressed and in daunger both before and behind; and that there were slaine enclosed in the mids five and thirtie thousand of the enemies, and seven hundred taken prisoners, and among them Amilcar the Generall of the Carthaginians, who was the cause of this war: also that there were a hundred and thirtie ensignes carried away, and of chariots above two hundred. All the townes that followed this revolt, yeelded to the Romanes.

Minutius the Consull, at the beginning made excursions into the countie of the Boians, wasting and spoiling it all over: but afterwards when they had forsaken the Insubrians, & were retired home to defend and save their own, he kept himselfe within campe, making full account to trie a set battell with the enemy. Neither would the Boians for their part have been behind, but ready to have answered them, had not the rumor of the Insubrians overthrow, daunted & broken their hearts. Whereupon they forsooke their leader, quit the campe, and bestowed themselves in the townes and villages to guard every man his owne, and quite altered the course of their enemy his warre, and put him besides his account. For the Consull past all hope now to determine the quarrell in one ranged battell, began againe to forray the fields, burne all buildings, and and force townes by assault. Much about the same time Clasidium was set on fire. And from thence the legions were conducted against the Iuates among the Ligurians, who onely stood out and would not come in, and yeeld obedience. Which nation likewise hearing that the Insubrians were defeated in a battell, and that the Boians were so scared, that they durst not venture the fortune of a field, submitted themselves. At the same time the letters of the Consuls, containing their happie affaires in Fraunce, were brought to Rome. M. Sergius the Pretour of the citie first red them in the Senate, and afterwards by the advise of the Senate, rehearsed them in a full audience and assembly of the people. And a proceession was decreed for the space of foure daies.

Now was winter come, and whiles T. Quintius after the winning of Elatia, wintered his armies in divers harbors within Phocis and Locris, there arose a mutinie in Opus. The one faction sent for the Ætolians their neere neighbours to side with them: and the other for the Romanes. The Ætolians came first, but the mightier faction would not suffer them to enter in: for having dispatched a messenger to the Romanes Generall, they held the town untill his coming. The kings garrison kept the fortresse, neither could they be brought to abandon it either with the menaces of the Opuntians, or the authoritie and countenance of the Romanes commaunder. The onely let and stay why it was not immediatly assaulted was this: Because there was come an herald from the king, requesting time and place of a parle, which with much ado was graunted to the king: not because Quintius of himselfe was not desirous and wished that hee might bee thought to have ended this warre, either by force of armes or conditions of peace; for as yet he knew not whether one of the new Consuls should be sent to succede him, or his government continued still unto him (according as he had given his friends and kinsfolks in charge to bring that about by all the endeavour and meanes that he could make: but hee supposed verily, that this parling would be to good purpose for him, if it might be in his libertie to drive matters unto warre if he stayed still, or draw to a peace if he departed home. So upon the strond and shore of the gulf Malea, they chose a place neere unto Nicea. Thither came the king by water from Demetrias with five brigantines or pinnaces, & one ship of war with a brasse beake-head: There accompanied him the chiefe LL. of Macedonie, and Cyclidas a noble personage of great mark among the Æthians, and one that was from thence banished. With the Romanes Generall were king Amintor, Dionysidorus an embassador of king Attalus, and Agelimbrotus Admiral of the Rhodian fleet, Phaneas the chiefe & principal magistrat of the Ætolians, and two Achæans Aristhenus and Xenophon. The Romanes Generall in the mids of these, advanced himselfe forward to the edge of the very shore, even to the banke side, whiles the king came forward to the foredeck of his ship standing at anker: and thus he began & said unto the king, Sir, you may do better to come ashore, that wee may commune and conferre together close, and both speake and heare one another, more easily. The king refused so to do: and why forquoth Quintius, who is it that you feare, if a man may know? Then with an haucie spirit and kinglike: I feare none (quoth he) but the immortall gods; but I trust not the fidelitie of all that I see heere about you, and namely the Ætolians least of all other. Why (saith Quintius againe) this is the common case of all them that come to parlie with enemies, namely, to be in danger one of another. Yea mary, quoth the king, but by your leave Quintius, the price and recompence of trecherie & falshead (if it should come to that) is not all one for killing Philip and Phaneas: for the Ætolians should not find it so hard a matter to substitute another Pretor, as the Macedonians to create another king in my routine. This said, there was not a word more to the point: while the Romanes generall thought it reason that he should begin who sought for a parle; and the king supposed it meet that it was his part to speake first who should give conditions, and not for him that stood at receipt, and was to accept thereof. Then Quintius began and said, that his speech should be plain & simple: for he would say no more, but propose only those points, which if they might not be performed, there would be no peace upon any condition at all. First, that the king must withdraw his garrisons out of all the cities of Greece. Item, That he is to deliver up all the prisoners and fugitive revolts that hee hath unto the allies of the people of Rome. Item, That he restore againe to the Romanes all those peeces in Illyricum, which after the peace concluded in Epirus, he had seized upon. Last of all, that he surrender unto Ptolomeus king of Ægypt, all those cities which he possessed himselfe of, after the death of Ptolome Philopator. These (saith he) are the conditions, that I and the people of Rome doe demand: but meet it is besides, that you heare the demands also of the allies. Then the

Embassadour or agent for king Attalus required, that the ships and captives which had been taken in the sea-fight before Chius, should be rendered, and that Nicephorium and the temple of Venus, which hee had pill'd and spoiled, should be restored as good and entier, as they were before. After him, the Rhodians made claime to Peræa (a countie in the continent right over-against their Isle, and an auncient appertenance of their siegnorie) and demanded withall, that the garrisons should quit Iassus, Bargyllæ, and the citie of the Euromensians, and about Hellepontus, likewise the cities of Sestos and Abydos. Item, that Panopolis should be restored unto the Bizantines, with the auncient chartre of their franchises and liberties. Finally, that all the Merchant townes and Ports in Asia might be freed from paying custome. Then came upon him the Achæi, and chalenged Corinth and Argi as their owne. After them, when as Phaneas (the Pretour of the Ætolians) had demanded in a manner the same that the Romanes had before, namely, that the kings forces should depart out of Greece, adding moreover, that those cities should be rendered unto the Ætolians which in times past belonged to their dominion and jurisdiction: then one of the heads of the Ætolians named Alexander, an eloquent man among them, as any other, presently inferred and said, That he had a long time sitten still, and opened not his mouth, not because he thought that in all this conference they would grow to any point or conclusion, but for that he would not interrupt any of his allies in their speech. And as for Philip quoth he, he dealeth not foundly and bona fide in treaties of peace, no more than ever heretofore he hath managed his warres with vertue and true valour. For in all these parties and conferences he layeth traines, and lieth to catch advantages: in warre he never striketh a battaile in plaine field, nor commeth to close fight hand to hand; but in his retreats and flights, bur-neth and sacketh cities: and thus being himselfe vanquished, spoileth and maketh havock of that which by right is the due reward and recompence of conquerours. But the noble Macedonian kings in old time, tooke no such courses. Their manner was to fight it out in open field, and to spare cities and townes, all that ever possibly they could; to the end that their dominion might be more wealthy and puissant. For what kind of pollicie is it, for him to ruinate and destroy utterly that, about the possession whereof he is in question, and reserve nothing for himselfe but only warre? This Philip the yere past hath laid desolate in Theffalie more cities of his allies there, than all the enemies have done that ever Theffalie had: and hath taken more from the Ætolians themselves, while he was a confederate friend with them, than all the time that he was their professed enemy. Hee hath seized upon Lyfimachia, expelled their Pretour, and chalenged out the garison of the Ætolians. Chios also, a citie under his owne subjection he hath rased subverted and quite destroyed. By semblable falshood and deceit he is possessed of Thebes in Phthia, Echinum, Larissa, and Pharalus. Philip netled and galled at these words of Alexander, commaunded that his ship should approach neerer to the banke, to the end that himselfe might be better heard. And as he began to frame bitter invectives against the Ætolians principally, Phaneas cut him off, saying, That the quarell was not to be decided by word, but with the sword: and either he must win it by fine force, or yeeld obedience to the mightier. That is true quoth Philip, and so evident, that a blind man may see it; jesting merily at Phaneas, who was troubled with a paire of bad eyes. And geven he was by nature to be pleasantly conceited, yea and fuller of his trumps ywis, than befecmed the majestic of a king: so as many times even in treatie of serious matters and of great consequence, he could not forbear but make himselfe merry and laugh a good. Afterwards he fell to a fit of choler and indignation, that the Ætolians should take upon them like Romanes to commaund him out of Greece, who if they were put to it, were not able upon their knowledge to set downe the bounds of Greece, and limit how far it reached. For as much as the Agrei, the Apodeotes and Amphilochi, which take up a great part of Ætolia, are not within Greece. And what just cause (quoth he) of complaint have they, in that I have not spared some of their allies? Why? even they themselves hold this old custome for a law, namely, to permit their youth to take armes and serve against their owne allies, so they do it without the publick order and warrant from the State: and very often a man may see Ætolians in contrarie armies, and come to aid as well the one side as the other: As for Chius, it was not I that forced it; I did no more but aid Prusias my friend and ally, in the siege and assault thereof. And as touching Lyfimachia, I defended it against the Thracians: but for as much as of necessity I was called away from the guard thereof unto this warre, the Thracians now hold it. Thus much by way of answer to the Ætolians. Now concerning Attalus and the Rhodians, by right I owe them them nothing: for it was not I but they, that began the warre. Howbeit, for the honor that I beare to the Romanes, I will make restitution to the Rhodians of Peræa, and restore I will to Attalus the ships and the captives as many as are forthcomting and may be found. As for the restitution and making good againe of Nicephorium & the temple of Venus, what answer should I returne to them that demand it; but this, that I will endeavour and be at charge of planting new trees (which is the onely way and meanes whereby groves and woods that are cut downe and fallen, may be recovered againe) seeing that ye will needs have it, that kings (forsooth) must commun and reason to and fro about such matters as these. In the last place, he framed his speech to answer the Achæans: wherein, first he began with the benefites and pleasures that Antigonus had done unto that nation; then, of the favours and good turnes they had received from his owne selfe; and withall he commaunded their decrees and edicts to be red, containing all kind of honors as well divine as humane: adding moreover the late and fresh revolt of their armie from him: and albeit he inveighed sharply against their disloyaltie and treacherie, yet he promised to render Argos unto them. As for Corinth, he would conferre and consult with the Romane Generall, and demand of him, whither he thought it reason that he should depart from those cities which he wan by armes, and held by right of conquest, or dispossesse himselfe of those also, which he received from his progenitours as his lawfull inheritance? The Achæans and Ætolians addressed themselves to answer those points; but the sunne was welneere downe: whereupon the conference was adjourned untill the morrow, Philip retired to the harborough from whence he came, and the Romanes with their allies to their camp. The day following, Quintius at the time appointed was readie before the citie of Nicea (for that was thought a convenient place.) But Philip appeared not, nor for the space of certaine houres came there any at all from him, nor so much as a messenger. Now when they were out of all hope of his repaire thither, behold of a sodaine his ships were descried. For himselfe he said by way of excuse, that considering how hard, how grievous and intollerable indignities were imposed upon him, he had employed all that day time untill then in consultation, and could not resolve. But it was generally thought among them all, that he had of purpose prolonged the time, and made it so late even toward evening, because the Achæans and Ætolians should have no leisure to answer unto him. And this opinion of theirs himselfe confirmed, in that he requested that he alone might parlie with the Romane Generall himselfe, and that all others should go aside and absent themselves; to the end they two might spend and loose no more time in debate and wrangling, but briefly to the point, and make an end one way or other. This petition of his would not at first be accepted by Quintius, pretending that he would not have it seene that the allies were excluded out of the conference. But afterwards upon his importunate suite, by the advise of them all, the Romane Generall together with Ap. Claudius a Colonell, when the rest were voided away, advanced forward to the banke side: the king with the other two whom he had with him the day before came aland. Thereafter they had parled in secret together a certaine time, they parted: What Philip related unto his companie is not certainly knowne: but Quintius made report unto his allies of their conference in this wise: namely, that Philip was content to quiet the whole coast and tract of Illyricum, for the Romanes to enter upon. Item, to send back all the traitorous renegates, and as many captives as were to be found. Item, to redeliver unto Attalus the ships and the mariners taken prisoner therein. Item, to render unto the Rhodians the countie of Peræa: but in no wise to be seized of Iassus and Bargyllæ. Item, to deliver unto the Ætolians Pharalus and Larissa, but not Thebes in any case. Last of all, to part not onely with Argos, but with Corinth also, for the behoufe of the Achæans. There was not one of them all well pleased at this limitation and setting out of particular parts, which hee would deliver, and which he would not. For in this reckning and account they should be more losers than winners. For unless (say they) hee remove his forces and garrisons out of all Greece throughout, he will never cease to give or take occasions of quarrell. As they all cried out from the whole assembly to this effect, their high voice was heard of Philip, albeit he stood aloof. Whereupon he requested Quintius to referre the whole matter once more unto the next day, and then certainly without faile, he would either persuaue him and his allies and bring them to his mind, or else would come off and suffer himselfe to be persuaued and overruled by them. The place of meeting was appointed upon the strand neare Thronium; and thither they repaired on both parts betimes. There Philip first and foremost, besought both Quintius and all those

those that were present, not to disturbe the hope of peace; but that it might come to some effect: and in conclusion, craved time wherein he might send his embassadours unto the Senate of Rome; assuring them, that if he could not obtaine peace under those articles above said, hee would accept of any other conditions, which it should please the Senate to put upon him. All the rest misliked hereof, supposing that he sought for nothing else but delays and tract of time, whiles he might gather his forces together. But Quintius interred againe, That well it might so be, and a truth indeed that they alledged, if it were some time and a season fit for warre and marriall exploits: but now, considering winter was at hand, they could loofe nothing by granting him respite to adresse an embassage. For neither (quoth hee) will any capitulation and composition which wee should make with Philip stand good and firme without the approbation of the Senat: and in this one winter (when of necessity we must surcease from warre) it may be knowne what the Senate by their authoritie will approve. To this advise the chiefe of the confederates accorded, and therein rested. So there was a cessation of armes for two moneths granted: in which meane time it was thought good, that each of them likewise should dispatch one embassadour to advertise the Senate, to take heed they were not over-raught by the subtiltie and fraud of the king. But provided it was in the covenant of the truce aforesaid, That incontinently the kings garrisons should void the territories of Phocis and Locris. Quintius also himselfe sent (together with the Embassadours of the allies) Aminander king of the Athamans; and to make the embassage more honourable, Q. Fabius (his owne wives sisters sonne) Q. Fulvius and P. Claudius accompanied the king.

When they were arrived at Rome, the Embassadours of the allies had audience given them before those that were sent from king Philip. Most of their speeches were spent in railing against the king: but in this one point they most of all mooved the Senat to give care unto them, namely, when they described by demonstration (as in a map) the situation of those countries as well by land as sea, that all men might plainly see, that if the king might hold in his hands the citie Demetrias in Thessalie, Chalcis in Euboea, and Corinth in Achaia, Greece could not possibly be at libertie, considering that Philip himselfe was wont to tearme them (no lesse truly than rauntingly) The shackles and fetters of Greece. After them were the kings embassadours permitted to enter into the Senat house: and having begun to make a long oration, their speech was cut off with this one brieve and short interrogatorie, Whether Philip would quit those three cities aforesaid or no? Whereunto they made this answer, That they had no expresse warrant in their commission touching that matter by name. So the kings Embassadours were sent away without conclusion of any peace: and Quintius had full authoritie to determine of war or peace at his pleasure. Who seeing plainly by this, that the Senate was not wearie of warre, and being himselfe more desirous of victorie than peace, he would never after graunt Philip any more parties, but gave him to understand, that he would admit no other embassage from him; but that which should bring him newes of his departure quite out of Greece.

Philip seeing no other way now but that he must needs fight and trie the issue by a maine battail, and that hee was to gather his forces together from all parts: being perplexed most of all for the cities of Achaia (a countrey farre remote from him) and yet more careful in regard of Argi than Corinth; he thought it best pollicie to make it over (as it were upon trust) into the hands of Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians; upon condition, That if hee obtained the victorie, Nabis should deliver it up unto him againe; but if hee should come to him himselfe, then Nabis himselfe to have and hold it as his owne. Unto Philip, governor of Corinth and Argi, he dispatcheth his letters, That hee should himselfe in person commune with the tyrant above-named about it. Philocles, besides that hee came now with a present, added moreover of his owne head (for the better assurance and pawne of amitie betwene the tyrant and the king) That Philip would give his daughters in marriage to Nabis his sonnes. The tyrant refused at the first to accept of that citie, unless hee were sent for, by a decree of the Argives themselves to come for to aid the citie. But afterwards when he heard say, That in a frequence assembly there they not onely rejected him, but also detested and abhorred the very name of a tyrant, as an execrable abomination; supposing now that he had a good occasion and quaine offered to make a spoile of them, he willed Philocles to deliver the citie unto him when hee would. So the tyrant was received into the town in the night season, without the privitie and knowledge of any person: and by breake of day hee seized upon all the higher places. The gates were shut, and few of the principall heads in the beginning of the tumult made shift to escape. Those that were absent had their houses ransacked and their goods pilled: as many as were present, had all their gold and silver taken from them; besides, great summes of money were imposed upon them to be paid. They that made speed and were not long about it, but tendered readie coine, were let goe without any outrage or hurt done unto their bodies: but such as were suspected either to hide or keepe ought backe, were mangled and tortured like bondslaves. After this, hee assembled the people together and published two lawes; the one, for crossing all debt-bookes and cancelling obligations: the other, for division of lands among the people by the poll: two firebrands to serve their turne that seeke for change and alteration in a State; enough to set on fire the Commons against the Nobles and chiefe of a citie.

When the citie of Argos was thus brought in subjection under Nabis, the tyrant never remembering at whose hands, nor upon what condition he had received it, sent Embassadours to Elatia unto Quintius, likewise to Attalus wintering then in Aegina, certifying them, That Argos was in his hands and at his devotion; and if Quintius would repaire thither to parle with him, he doubted not but they two should agree well enough in every point. Quintius granted to come thither, to the end, that by this meanes he might disfigure Philip of that garrison: and he sent likewise to Attalus, willing him, that he would depart from Aegina and meet him at Siccyone: himselfe loosed from Anticyra, and with ten galeaces called Quinqueremes; which (as hap was) L. Quintius his brother some dayes before had put to sea out of the wintering harbour of Corcyra, crossed over to Siccyone. Now was Attalus there already, who making remembrance unto Quintius, That it became a tyrant to come unto a Romane Generall, and not a Romane Generall to goe unto a tyrant, induced Quintius to condescend unto his opinion, and not to enter the citie of Argos. Not farre from the citie is a place called Mycenica, where they agreed to meet and commune together. Quintius came to the place, accompanied with his brother & certaine colonels. Attalus was guarded with his princely and roiall traine. Nicofratus the Pretour of the Achæans repaired thither, attended with some few auxiliarie souldiours: and there they found the tyrant expecting their comming with all his forces. And armed as he was, with his guard likewise armed, he advanced himselfe into the middest (well nere) of the plaine that lay betwene. Quintius unarmed, came forward with his brother and two colonels. King Attalus likewise betwene the Pretour of the Achæans of the one hand, and a courteour of his on the other, both unarmed. The tyrant began the speech with an excuse, That being in armes and attended with a guard of armed men, he presented himselfe to a parle, seeing the Generall of the Romans and king Attalus unarmed: and said, that he stood not in feare of them, but of certaine exiled persons of the Argives. After this, when they came to treat as touching the conditions and covenants for the contract of an amitie, Quintius the Generall demanded two things: the one, That Nabis would make an end of warring with the Achæi: the other, That he would send with him certain aids against Philip. And verily to send succour he granted: and in lieu of peace hee was content there should be a truce, untill the warre with Philip was dispatched. Also about Argos king Attalus began to enter into some question, saying: That having the citie treacherously betrayed unto him by Philocles, hee now held it by force of armes: but hee answered againe, That hee was sent for by the Argives themselves, for to protect them. Then the king required that the Argives might be assembled together, that he might know the truth. The tyrant made no denial thereof. The king replied againe, that the assembly should be free, and at their libertie to speake, and to that effect the garrisons were to be removed out of the city, & no Lacedemonians intermingled among them; to the end that the Argives might frankly speake their mind. But the tyrant flatly denied to withdraw from thence the guards. So this arguing came to no conclusion, and the conference brake up, after that the tyrant had given the Romane Generall sixe hundred Candiores, and a truce made for the tearme of foure moneths, betwene Nicofratus Pretour of the Achæans, & Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians. From thence Quintius departed to Corinth, and approached the gate with a regiment of Cretensians, that it might appeare to Philocles the kings captain there, that the tyrant was revolted from Philip. Philocles also entred into a parle with the Romane Generall, and when hee was exhorted by him to depart out of hand and yeeld the citie, he returned such an answer unto him, that hee seemed rather to deferre, than to denie the thing. From Corinth Quintius crossed the sea to Anticyra, from whence he sent his brother to sound the nation of the Acarnanians. And Atta- lus departed directly from Argos to Sicyone. Where the citie not onely encreased the auncient G honours of the king, with the addition of new: but also the king over and besides that hee had purchased for them in time past, the sacred land of Apollo, with a great summe of money; because hee would not seeme now also to passe by this friend citie allied unto him, without some roiall bountie and munificence, he gave freely unto them sixe talents of silver, and ten thousand Medimnes of corne: and so returned to his ships at Cenchreæ. Nabis also having strengthened the garison in Argi, returned to Lacedæmon: and after himselfe had robbed the men of their monie and goods, hee sent his wife thither to doe the like by the women. VWho sending for the honourable and worshipfull dames of the citie, inviting them one by one to her house, & otherwhiles many together at once, such as were of kin one to another, by flattering and by threatening gat from them not only all the gold that they had, but in the end stript off their apparell also, and all the jewels and ornaments that they ware. THE XXXIII. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIVS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the three and thirtieth Booke.

Iteus Quintius Flamininus the Proconsull, ended the warre with Philip, after hee had vanquished him in a pight field neere Cynocephale in Thessalie. L. Quintius Flamininus, brother to the said Proconsull, having forced Leucas the head citie of Acarnania, received the Acarnanians upon their submission and surrender. C. Sempronius Tuditanus the Pretor was slaine, and his armie defeated by the Celtiberians. Attalus being fallen suddainly sicke, was removed from Thebes to Pergamus, and there departed this life. Peace was granted to Philip upon his suite, and libertie restored to Greece. L. Furius and C. Claudius Marcellus, the two Consuls, subdued the Boians and Insubrians in Gaul, Marcellus triumphed. Annibal having intruded in Affricke to raise war, but to no effect, was thereupon accused unto the Romanes, by letters sent from the principall of the adverse faction: but for feare of the Romanes, who had dispatched their embassadors to the Carthaginian Senate about him, he fled unto Antiochus king of Syria, who also prepared then to make warre upon the Romanes. L

adjoining in those quarters to Acarnania. There was a streight passe or gullet there, halfe a mile almost in length, but not halfe a mile in breadth: at the end of this streight standeth the citie Leucas planted against an hill that turneth to the East, & looketh toward Acarnania. The base town is built upon a plain, reaching along the sea that divideth Leucadia from Acarnania. Whereupon the citie, as well on the land side as by sea is easie to be forced. For the foulds of the water resemble a standing lake rather than a sea, and the whole soile is a light earth, minable and easie to be wrought into, so that in many places at once the wals either undermined or shaken with the ram, came tumbling down. But as the town it selfe was assailable, so the hearts of the townsmen were invincible. For night and day they gave not over, to repaire the cracks of the shaken wal, to fill up the open breaches and ruines, to make head lustily, and skirmish with the enemy, and rather to defend the wals by force of armes, than to save themselves by strength of their wals. And surely a longer

A longer siege they would have made of it than the Romanes hoped, but that certaine banished persons, Italians borne, dwelling in Leucas, let in and received armed soldiors on the castle side. Howbeit, the Leucadians embattelling themselves in their market place, encountered them as they ran downe from the higher ground with a great cry and noise, and maintained battell with them for a long time. In this meane while, the wals in diverse places were scaled with ladders, and the enemies mounting over the heapes of stones that lay at the breaches, entred the towne. And now by this time the lieutenant in person, with many companies environed them as they fought: some were slaine in the midst, others flung away their weapons, and yielded to the conquest. After few daies, upon the newes of the field fought at Cynocephala, all the States of Acarnania came in, and submitted themselves to the lieutenant.

B At the same time, whiles fortune turned thus about, and bare downe a side all at once; the Rhodians also sent out Pausistratus their Pretor, with eight hundred footmen of Achaia, and about 1900 souldiours well armed, gathered out of all sorts of auxiliaries, to regaine and reconquer from Philip the country of Peræa, lying in the maine and firme land, which had been held sometime, and possessed by their aunceltours. And these aids were compounded and mixed of French, Nisietes, Pisietes, Tanians, and Areens of Affricke, and Laodiceans of Asia. With these forces Pausistratus encamped in the territorie of Stratonicea, and there hee seized of a commodious place, and very good for his purpose, unwares to the kings companie that had holden the same. Thither came also to aid them in very good time, a regiment of a thousand foot and a hundred horse of Achaens, levied for that purpose, and were commaunded by Theoxenus. Dinocrates a captaine under the king, willing to recover the said hold againe, first pitched his tents, hard against the enemies campe. But afterwards hee removed to another fort in the territorie likewise of Stratonicea, which they call Astragon: and having rallied together all the garisons, dispersed asunder in divers places, and sent for the auxiliarie bands also of Thessalians, even from Stratonicea, he took his way and marched toward Alabanda, where the enemies were. The Rhodians likewise for their part were readie for battell, and after they were encamped of both sides neere together, immediately they entred into the field to fight it out. Dinocrates placed in the right point five hundred Macedonians, and the Agrians he put in the left, in the maine battell he bestowed all those that hee had gathered together out of the garisons belonging to the forts abovesaid, who for the most part were Carians, the points he flanked round about with his D corners of horse. The Rhodian cohort was marshalled in this manner: The auxiliaries of the Candidotes and Thracians kept the right point, the hired souldiours (and they were a power of cleet footmen) stood in the left, in the midst were the aids (a medley of many nations:) the Cavallerie and all the light armed souldiours that were, compassed the corners like wings. All that day the two armies stood only upon the banke of a brooke which ran between them with a small and shallow water: and after some loose shot discharged, they retired into their tents. The next day they were raunged in like order, and stricke a battaile exceeding the proportion of their number; for on each side there were not above three thousand foot, and upon a hundred horse: but they were even matched not in number only and armour, but also in equall courage and hope alike. The Achaens first passed over the said brooke, and charged upon the Agrians: afterwards the whole armie ran as one would say, over the river. The fight continued long doubtfull. The Achaens being of themselves in number a thousand, disordred some four hundred of the other, and forced them to recule, and afterwards the entier right point of the battaile began to shrink and geve ground. As for the Macedonians, so long as their battailon called Phalanx, kept their array and stood close together, could not possibly be stirred or removed; but after their left side was laid naked, and they began to reach out on all hands their long pikes against the enemy, charging them acrosse upon the flanke, they were presently troubled: and first they put themselves in disaray, afterwards they turned their backs, and last of all flung their weapons from them, and ran away for life, untill they were come to Bargilia. Thither also was Dinocrates fled. The Rhodians having followed the chase as long as they had any day to see, F setted into their camp. And for certeine it is knowne, if in this traine of victorie they had presently made speede to Stratonicea, they might have bene maisters of the towne, and never drawne sword for it: but whiles they spent time in recovering the burrough townes and forts of Peræa, they let this opportunitie slip out of their hands, and lost it for ever. For in the meane space, they that lay in garison and held Stratonicea, were encouraged, and tooke better heart.

Dinocrates

Dinocrates also anon with those forces of his that remained, put himselfe within the walls. Then G was the towre besieged and assailed, all in vaine, neither could it be forced and woon but by Antiochus, a certeine time after. Thus went the affaires in Theffalie, in Achaza, and in Asia, much about one and the selfsame time.

Philip being advertised that the Dardanians were entred within the confines of his realme, and wasted the high countrie of Macedonie, albeit he saw that almost in all parts of the world unhappie fortune still followed and cousted both him and his wherefoever they were: yet esteeming it more grievous and heavey than death it selfe to be disseized of the possession of Macedonie also, he made a levie in great hast out of all his cities of fixe thousand foote, and 500 horse; with which power of Macedonians, he sodainly surprised the enemy (unprovided and not ware of his coming) about Stobi in *Pelagonia. Great numbers of men were slaine in conflict, but more in the fields, such as were disbanded, and raunged abroad for greedinesse of bootie and pillage. But as many as could make meanes to flie more readily and easily away, never stood out the triall of a battaile, but returned home into their owne countrey. Having thus put life as it were againe into his men by this one expedition and exploit (a matter of no consequence to the totall adventure of his whole estate) he retired himselfe to Theffalonica.

The Punick warre was not atchieved and brought to an end so happily and in so good a time for the Romanes (who otherwise should have warred at once both against the Carthaginians and Philip) but it fel out as well and in as fit a season, that Philip was now vanquished; just against the time that Antiochus in Syria prepared to levie warre against them. For besides that the service was much more easily managed against them single and apart, than it would have bene if they had banded both at once, and brought their forces together, it chaunced also that Spaine about the very same instant brake out to a tumultuous insurrection.

Antiochus being returned to Antioch there to winter, after he had the summer before brought under his subjection all the cities belonging to Ptolomæus, within the country of *Coele-Syria, was yet never the more at quiet, & mindfull of peace afterwards. For when he had assembled a puissant power both of land and also of sea-forces, and purposed to employ the whole strength of his realme, he sent afore by land in the beginning of the spring, his two sonnes Arades and Mithridates with a mightie armie, commanding them to attend him at Sardis: himselfe in person set forth a voyage by sea, with a flecte of a hundred saile of couvert ships with decks and hatches, besides two hundred lighter vessels, as Galions and Brigantines, purposing at one time to assaie all the cities in *Cilicia & Caria, coasting along the sea side, which were within the dominion of Ptolomæus: and withall to aid Philip as well with shipping as souldiours, for as yet Philip was not utterly subdued, nor the warre with him brought to a finall end. Many brave and worthie exploits enterprised the Rhodians both by sea and land, in their loyaltie and faithfulness to the Romanes, and for the safegard and defence of all the Greekish nation. But no one thing shewed their magnificence more than this, that being nothing terrified at that time with such a world of warres threatned against them, they sent ambassadors to the king, to let him understand, that if he sailed forward and stayed not his Armada, they would encounter him at the Bay of Nephelis (which is a promontorie or cape of Cilicia, renowned for the auncient league of the Atheniens.) And this they did, not upon any hatred they bare to his person, but to impeach him only for comming to joine with Philip, thereby to hinder the Romanes in their good course of setting Greece at libertie. At the same time Antiochus was busied in the siege and assault of Coraceium, against which he had placed all ordinance and engines of batterie: for he was alreadye master of the cities of *Zephyrium, Soli, *Aphrodisias and *Corycus, and having doubled the point of *Anemurium (a cape or forland also of Cilicia) he had woon likewise the citie of *Selinus. All these, and many other forts of that coast being yielded unto him by composition, either for feare or willingly, without any assault, only Coraceium shut their gates against him, and staid his progresse beyond his expectation. There the embassadours of the Rhodians had audience. And albeit that embassie was such as might have set a king into a fit of choler and chafed his bloud, yet he tempered his anger, and made answer that he would send his embassadours to Rhodes, and give them in charge to renew the auncient rights and privileges as well of his owne as of his auncestours with that citie and State, and to will them not to stand in feare of the kings comming, for that neither they nor any allies of theirs should susteine harme or damage by him. For it was no part of his meaning to infringe and breake the amitie which he had

A with the Romanes, as it may appeere as well by his late embassie sent unto them, as also by the honorable decrees and answers made by the Senate and sent unto him. For it fortunied that even then the embassadours of king Antiochus were returned from Rome, having had a friendly audience there, and a gracious dispatch, according as the time required: for as yet the issue of the warre against Philip was uncerteine. Whiles the kings embassadours delivered these points in the assemblie of the Rhodians, there arrived a post with newes, that the warre was ended by meanes of a victorie atchieved by the Romanes against Philip at Cynosephale. These tidings being once heard, the Rhodians past all feare now of Philip were of advise to meet Antiochus at sea with their navie. For they had a second care besides which they neglected not, to maintaine the libertie of those allied cities pertaining to king Ptolome, against which, warre was menaced from Antiochus. Some they succoured with sending aid unto them, and others by fore-cast and geving them warning of the designements and enterprises of their enemies: whereby they were a cause, that the Caunij, Myndij, they of Halicarnassus and Samos enjoyed still their entier freedome. But needlesse it is for me, to prosecute all the occurrents and affaires that passed in these parts, considering how I shall have enough to do, and hardly be able to set downe and go through with those that properly concerne the Romanes warre. At the same time also king Attalus was brought sick from Thebes to Pergamus, and there departed this world in the 71 yeere of his age, when he had reigned 44. This man was beholden to fortune for nothing els but riches, that might commend him to the hope of a kingdome. He employed the same with such wisdom and magnificence, that first in his owne conceipt, and afterwards in the judgement of others, he was not thought unworthie to be a king. Afterwards when he had vanquished in one battaile the Gaules (a nation at that time newly arrived in Asia, and therefore the more dread and terrible) he tooke upon him to be titled king, and ever after caried a mind answerable to the grandeur and majestie of that name. His owne subjects he governed with singular justice. To his allies he shewed himselfe most fast and faithfull. His friends he used with all kindnes and bountie. A wife and foure children he had living when himselfe died: and left his kingdome so sure and well settled, that the possession thereof continued firme to the third discent and generation after him.

Whiles things stood thus in Asia, Greece and Macedonie, and the warre with Philip scarcely ended, or at leastwise, peace not fully concluded, there arose a mightie warre in the province of Spaine beyond the river Iberus. M. Helvius at that time was governour there, who by his letters advertised the Senate, That Colcas and Lusinus, two princes in those parts, were gone out, and had taken armes; that with Colcas there banded seventene townes, and with Lusinus the strong and puissant cities Cardo and Bardo; that the whole sea-coast, which hitherto by open revolt shewed not their rebellious heart, would doublelesse upon the commotion of those their neighbours, make likewise an insurrection together with them. After these letters were red by M. Sergius the Pretour, who had the jurisdiction betwene citizens and aliens, the LL. of the Senate ordeined, that after the election of new Pretours was past, he to whose lot the government of Spaine fell, should propose unto the Senate in all convenient speede as touching the warre in Spaine.

E About that very time the Consuls repaired to Rome, (from their provinces) who held an assembly of the Senate in the temple of Bellona: and when they demanded triumph in consideration of their good service, and happy exploits in warre atchieved: C. Atinius Labeo and C. Virginius, Tribunes of the Commons required, That the Consuls should speake severally by themselves concerning triumph: for suffer them they would not jointly to propound that thing in the house, to the end, that equall and semblable honour should not be conferred upon persons of unlike qualitie, worth, and desert. And when Minutius interred againe and said, That the province of Italie fell unto them both in one commission, and Cornelius seconded him withall, averring, That hee and his companion in government had managed all their affaires with one mind by common counsell and advise; that the Boians who passed over the river Po against him for to succour the Insubrians and Cænomans, were forced to turne backe againe to defend their owne, by reason that the other Consull his colleague made such wast and pillage in their fields and villages. The Tribunes confessed, that Cornelius indeed had atchieved so worthy exploits in warre, that there was no more doubt to be made of his triumph, than of rendring praise and thanks to the immortall gods: but neither hee nor any other citizen stood ever at any time in such grace, favour and credit, that having obtained the honour of a triumph for himselfe, hee should impart that glorie unto his colleague and fellow, if hee were so shamelesse as to crave it. As for Q. Minutius (say they) he made some sleight skirmishes with the Ligurians not worth the talking of: many in Fraunce he lost a good number of his souldiers. And with that they named T. Iuvenius and Cn. Catus the brother of Labeo, two colonels or Tribunes of the campe, who were slaine in an unfortunate battaile, with many a brave and hardie man besides, as well citizens as allies. And to conclude, there were some few towns and villages colourably yeelded and rendered up for the time, without any assurance and securitie. These janglings and debates betweene the Consuls and the Tribunes continued for two daies: but in the end, the Consuls being overcome with the importunitie of the Tribunes, were content to propose the matter distinctly by themselves. And with the generall voice and accord of all, a triumph was decreed for Cn. Cornelius. The Placentines also and men of Cremona, were a great cause that this Consul found more favour; by reason that they gave him thanks, and reported on his behalfe, that they were delivered by his good meanes from the siege, yea and most of them recovered from servitude out of the hands of their enemies. Q. Minutius having only cast a proffer and made an assay of proposing his cause to the Senate, seeing them wholly banded and set against him, said aloud, That in maintenance of Consular authoritie, and by vertue of that place, yea and according to the good example of divers noble and renowned personages, he would triumph, and aske them no leave, in the mount Albane. But Cn. Cornelius while he was still in office, triumphed over the Insubrians and Cænomanes. He carried in pompe before him a number of militarie ensignes: he caused great store of French spoile and pillage to passe in a pageant upon charriots taken from the enemies. Many noble men of Fraunce were led in a shew before his owne triumphant chariot: among whom (as some write) was Amilcar Generall of the Carthaginians. But above all others, the goodliest sight was, a number of coloners & inhabitants of Cremona and Placentia, who with * bonets or caps of liberie on their heads, followed his chariot. Hee bare in triumph 237500 Sesterces, 79000 Bigates of silver coine. He divided among his footmen severie Asces apeece, to every horsman he gave double, and to ech Centurian triple so much. Q. Minutius likewise triumphed in mount Albane over the Ligurians and the Boians in Gaule. The honor of this triumph as it was lesse, in regard of the place, and of the name that went of his actes, as also because all men knew full well, that the charges went not out of the common chest or chamber of the citie: so for number of ensignes, of chariots and spoiles gained from the enemies, it was in manner equall and comparable to the other. And of money hee brought well nere as much as Cornelius: for of brasse coine hee had in shew 254000 Asces, of silver coine in bigate pieces 3200. To common souldiours or footmen, to Centurians and horsmen, he gave as much as his colleague. After this triumph, there was a generall assembly held for the election of magistrates: wherein were created Consuls; L. Furius Purpurio, and M. Claudius Marcellus. The next day after, these Pretours were chosen, Q. Fabius Buteo, T. Sempronius Longus, Q. Minutius Thermus, M. Acilius Glabrio, L. Apustius Fullo, and C. Lelius.

In the end of that former yeere, letters came from T. Quintius with this intelligence, That he had fought in battaile raunged with king Philip within Theffalie, where the armie of the enemies was defeated and put to rout. These letters were first read in the Senate by Sergius the Pretour, and then by order from the LL. in the publicke assembly of the people. For this happie successe, it was ordained, That there should be solemne processions for five daies. Shordy after, there arrived embassadours both from T. Quintius and also from the king. The Macedonian embassadours were brought without the citie to the place or hamlet called Villa publica, where they were appointed their lodging, rich presents were given them, & allowed they were the charges for themselves and their traine. In the temple of Bellona the Senate was assembled; where there passed not many words by reason that the Macedonians promised, That the king should performe whatsoever the Senate would set downe: So (according to the aunient custome and manner) there were appointed ten Committees or Delegates, by whose advise and counsell T. Quintius the General, was to present and tender unto Philip, articles and conditions of peace: provided, that in the said number of Delegates, P. Sulpitius and P. Valerius should be comprised by name; who when they were Consuls governed the province of Macedonie. The same day, the Cossanes demanded and made suite, That the number of their coloners or inhabitants might be augmented: wherupon an order was graunted, That there should be a thousand new enrolled

A enrolled to the former: with this proviso, that in this number none of them should be matriculated, who after the Consulship of P. Sulpitius and P. Villius had bene enemies to the people of Rome. The Roimane games and plaies were that yeer exhibited, as well in the Circus as upon the stage in the Theatre, by the Ædiles Curule L. Cornelius Scipio, & Cn. Manlius Volso: which, as they were set out with more state and magnificence than ever before, so they were beheld with more joy, contentment, and pleasure, in regard that all things fell out so fortunately in the warres: and they were renewed and represented all thrice over. As for the plaies called Plæbeij, they were set forth no lesse than seven times one after another. Acilius Glabrio and C. Lelius exhibited those pastimes: who also of their silver that arose of fines and forfeitures, caused three cast images of brasse to be made, and erected them to the honour of Ceres, Liber, and * Libera. * Venus.

B Now when L. Furius and M. Claudius Marcellus were entred into their magistracie, and after question made concerning their provinces, the Senate passed a decree, That both of them jointly should governe Italie; they requested that they might cast lots for Macedonie and Italie together. Marcellus more desirous of the twaine of the province of Macedonie, alleadged, that the peace was not found, but counterfeit, pretended, and deceitfull; and that the king would take arms and war againe, in case the armie were withdrawne from thence: by which words he put the LL. of the Senate into a deepe studie and suspence, what to doe; or to thinke of it. And haply the Consuls had obtained their request, but that Q. Martius Rex, and C. Atinius Labeo, two Tribunes of the Commons, protested, that they would oppose themselves and crosse it by their negative voice, unless they might first propose unto the people to know, Whether C their will and pleasure was to entertaine peace with king Philip, or no? This bill being preferred and read in the Capitoll before the people, was graunted, and all the tribes or wards, even five and thirtie, every one gave their affirmative voice, Ut rogatis [i. So bee it as yee demand.] And to the end, that all men might have more cause to reioice that peace was confirmed with Macedonie, there came heavie newes out of Spaine, and letters were divulged abroad, containing thus much, That C. Sempronius Tuditanus the Viz-pretour in the hither province of Spaine, was vanquished in battell, that his armie was discomfited and put to flight, and diyers men of name and marke slaine. That Tuditanus himselfe was carried forth of the medley greivously wounded; and soone after died. The province Italie was assigned for both the Consuls with those two legions which the former Consuls had in charge, and order graunted; that they should levie and enroll foure new legions, whereof two should bee sent whether it pleased the Senate to appoint. D And T. Quintius Flamininus was commaunded to rule his province still with the same armie, and his commission of longer government was renewed. After this, the Pretours cast lots for the parting of their provinces. L. Apustius Fullo obtained the jurisdiction of the citizens of Rome, and M. Acilius Glabrio was lord cheefe justice betweene citizens and forrainers. Q. Fabius Buteo had the government of the base or farther Spaine, and Q. Minutius Thermus of the higher or hither Spaine. To C. Lelius fell Sicilie, and Sardinia to T. Sempronius Longus. And ordained it was, that unto Q. Fabius Buteo, and Q. Minutius, to whom the rule of the provinces in Spaine befall, the Consuls should out of those foure legions which they had enrolled, deliver one legion apeece, which they thought good, and of allies and of the Latin nation, foure thousand footmen E besides, and three hundred horsmen to either of them. And these Pretours were enjoined to go to their charges with all speed possible.

The warre in Spaine began afresh, in the fift after that the former together with the Punicke war was ended. But before that these Pretours went forth to this warre (which may be counted as it were new; in regard that the Spaniards now first, and never before, warred in their own proper name, without either leader or armie of Carthage) and before that the Consuls themselves departed out of the citie, order was given, that according to the old custome, they should provide for the prodigious tokens that were reported; L. Iulius as he rode on horsebacke into the Sabines countrie, was both himselfe and his horse under him stricken dead with lightning. The temple of Feronia in the territorie of Capena; was likewise smitten and blasted from heaven. At the temple of Minerva, the yron heads of two speares were scene to burie on a light fire. A Wolfe happened to enter into the citie at the gate Esquilina, and ran through the most populous part thereof as farre as unto the market place, and so forward to the Tuscan street, and from thence through the Melium; and passed forth againe at the gate Capena untouched, and in manner without taking any harme.

These

These prodigious signes were purged by the sacrifices of greater beasts. At the same time Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, who had governed the province of high Spaine before Tuditanus, entered the citie by order from the Senate in a kind of triumph, and carried before him in pompe 1515 pound weight of gold: of silver likewise in bullion 20000 pound weight: and in coine, 34550 deniers. L. Stertinus from the nether Spaine, brought into the treasure 50000 pound weight of silver, and never pretended any hope that he had to obtaine a triumph. Moreover, of the prizes and spoiles woon from the enemies, he caused two arches to bee erected in the beast market, even before the temple of Fortune, and the goddesse Matula: and one besides in the grand Cirque or shew place. And upon these arches he set up gilded Statues. These were all the affairs, to speake of, that passed this winter season.

There wintered at that time in Athens, Quintius. And among many other suiters that came unto him with their petitions, the Boeotians exhibited a request, and obtained the same, to wit, that as many of their nation as had served in the warres under Philip, might bee restored and sent home againe unto them: which was easily graunted by Quintius, not so much, for that hee thought them worthe of that favour, but because hee was to win the love and affections of the States in Greece unto the Romane name, now especially that he had some doubt of king Antiochus. They were not delivered so soone, but seene it was, how little the Boeotians would, bee beholden to him for it. For they sent presently unto Philip, and gave him thanks for the rendering of those men, as if they had, beene delivered by him, and not by Quintius and the Romanes. And in their next assembly generall for their solemne election, they chose one Barcillus for their Boeotarches, or lord governour of Boeotia; for no other reason, but because hee had beene the Colonell of those Boeotians that bare armes for the king: but they passed by Zeusippus, Pisistratus, and others, that had perswaded to make a league with the Romanes. This wrought discontentment in these persons for the present, and feare for the time to come. For thus they reasoned with themselves, If they would doe thus whiles the Romane armie lay encamped nere to their gates, what should become of them when the Romanes were departed into Italie, and whiles Philip was so nere at hand to assist those that sided with him, and to annoy those of the adverse part and faction? Therefore they conspired and concluded in the end to make away Barcillus, the head of the kings bend, whiles the Romane forces were at hand. And so chusing a convenient and fit opportunitie for their purpose, at what time as he returned homeward drunk from a publicke solemne feast, accompanied with certaine pleasant and effeminate persons, who to make sport and mirth had been at that great feast, he was forsaied and beset with sixe armed men, whereof three were Italians, and three Aetolians, and so murdered. His traine that attended him ran away, and raised hui and crye, and called for helpe. Much trouble & hurlyburly there was through out the citie, much running to and fro with torch-light. But they that did the deed, were escaped out at the next gate. In the morning betimes the people in great number assembled in the Theater, being called together by the voice of the common bedle, as if the murderers had beene detected. Openly it was in every mans mouth, that he was killed by his owne retinue, even those filthie wanton persons that he had about him: but secretly in their minds they deemed Zeusippus the author of the murder. For the present, it was thought good to apprehend them that were in his traine, and that they should be examined. While search was made for them, Zeusippus came forth into the assembly, with the like intent to avert all suspicion of crime from himselfe, saying, that men were much deceived to thinke, that so horrible and straunge a murder was committed by such weaklings and persons as they were. This hee argued and discoursed by many likelihoods and probabilities to the same effect: by which meanes some were verily perswaded, that if himselfe had beene guiltie of the fact, hee would never have offered and presented himselfe in the face of the assembly, or broched any words at all of the murder: especially when no man urged him thereto. Others there were againe, who made no doubt, but by this impudent face, his drift was to prevent an accusation, and to turne away all suspicion from himselfe. The innocent and guiltlesse creatures within a while after, being examined upon the racke and tortured, knowing what was the generall opinion and conceit of men, made their best of the same for to bolt out and reveale the fact; and so they named Zeusippus and Pisistratus for the principals; without any presumption or light given how they should seeme to come to the knowledge of anything. Howbeit Zeusippus (accompanied with one Stratonicus) fled by night to Tanagra, fearing the remorse and pricke of his owne conscience more than the apprehending and information

A information of those persons who neither were partie nor privie to any thing. But Pisistratus making no regard of these accusers, remained still at Thebes. Now had Zeusippus one bondslave, (whose hand was in all this action, and had beene a courriour betweene) whome Pisistratus feared that he would bewray him, and by that very feare caused him to open and declare the whole matter. He dispatched therefore his letters unto Zeusippus, advising him to rid that slave out of the way, who was privie to their dealing; advertising him, that in his conceit he was not so meet to conceale the thing now done, as he was a fit instrument at the time to execute the same. The bearer of these letters hee straightly charged to deliver them unto Zeusippus immediately with all speed. But he because he could not spie a convenient time to meet with him himselfe, gave the letters to the verie same slave, whom he supposed to be most fast and trustie to his master: adding moreover and saying, That they came from Pisistratus unto Zeusippus, and imported matter of great consequence. The bondslave promised to deliver them incontinently, but being touched in conscience, hee was so bold as to breake them open; and when hee had read them through, he fled backe in great feare to Thebes (where he bewrayed Pisistratus). Zeusippus troubled in spirit for the flight of his bondman, retired himselfe to Athens, supposing it a place of more securitie to live in, as a banished man. As for Pisistratus, after he had beene divers times examined upon the racke, was put to death in the end. This murder wonderfully estranged the Thebans and Boeotians, and set their hearts against the Romanes; in so much as they hated and detested them to death, taking great indignation that Zeusippus (a principall & chiefe personage of their nation) had committed so foule and heinous a fact. To rebell in open tearmes, they had neither force sufficient to maintain them, nor a principall head to direct and lead them. Whereupon they fell to that which is next cousin to plaine warre, even to theeving and robbing by the high waies side, in such sort, as they surprised as well some souldiours who lodged nere unto them, and were their guests, as others that wandred and ranged abroad from the garisons in winter time, and travailed about their affaires, who otherwhiles were caught up by the way, and came short home. Some passengers were killed in the port-rode-waies, by those that lay in wait for them in notorious theevish corners: others were trained, and led deceitfully through by-lanes into desert places, there to take up their innes and lodging, and then were murdered. At length they played these pranks, not only of malice unto them, but also for greedie desire of bootie and spoile, by reason that commonly these waifaring men went about their trade & merchandise, and therefore had some charge about them, and caried silver in their belts. Now when as at first there were some out of the way, and every day more than other many men missing, and no man knew what was become of them, all Boeotia began to have an ill name, and the souldiers were more afraid to travaile there, than in the enemies country. Then Quintius sent certaine embassadors to all the cities for to make complaint of these robberies and enormities. Many footmen there were found dead about the meere or lake Copais, where their carkasses were raked forth of the mud and mire, and drawne out of the standing water, tied and fastened as they were to heave stones or some great vessels, that by their poise they might be plunged, and sinke to the bottome. Many such like outrages were found to have beene committed at Acrepheia and Coronea. Quintius at the first demanded to have the offenders delivered unto him, and for five hundred souldiours (for so many were caught up by the way and murdered) he enjoined the Boeotians to make payment of five hundred talents of silver. But the cities would doe neither the one nor the other: onely they paid them with bare words, and excused themselves in that nothing had beene done by publicke warrant or counsell from the State. Whereupon the embassadors were sent to Athens, and into Achæa, to make protestation unto their allies, that they would pursue the Boeotians with open warre, upon good ground and just cause offered. And so after hee had given commaundement unto P. Claudius to goe unto Acrepheia with one part of his forces, himselfe with the other for him down about Coronea, & planted siege unto it. But first the territorie was laid waste all the way as the two armies marched from Elatia in divers quarters. The Boeotians plagued with these losses and calamities, seeing nothing but feare and flight in every place, sent their embassadors unto him: but when they could not be admitted into the campe, the Achæans and the Athenians were faine to come with them. The Achæans were of greater credite, to entreat in their behalfe: for unlesse they might obtaine pardon and peace for the Boeotians, they determined also to enter into the quarrel, and to make war themselves. By whose mediation the Boeotians had accessse unto the Romane generall, and audience ence graunted. Who after they were enjoined to deliver up the offenders and malefactors to G Iustice, and to pay thirtie talents for amends and satisfaction, obtained peace: and so the siege was raised.

After some few dayes, the ten Delegates or Committees from Rome were arrived, by whose advise and counsell peace was articulated and capitulated with king Philip, upon these conditions: Imprimis, That all the Greeke cities, as well in Europe as in Asia, should enjoy their libertie, and live under their owne lawes. Item, That Philip should withdraw his garisons out of as many of them as had bin in subjection under him. Item, That he do the like by those which were in Asia, to wit, Euromos, Pedasie, Bargyllæ, Iassus, Myrina, Abydus, Thassus, and Perinthus: all which, the Romanes required to be free. As concerning the libertie and freedom of the Cyani, it was covenanted, That Quintius should write his letters to Pratiæ the king of the Bithynians, giving H him to understand the advise and pleasure of the Senate, and the ten Delegates aforesaid. Item, That Philip render all the prisoners and fugitive traitours, to the Romanes, and yeeld up all the covered ships with hatches: and over and besides, one huge roiall Galiee, or Argosy, which by reason of the exceeding bignesse was unweldie and of little use, and was directed with 16 banks of ores on a side. Item, That he should not have above five hundred men in armes, nor one Elephant at all. Item, That he should not waite (but by leave and permission of the Senate) without the marches of Macedonie. Item, That he pay unto the people of Rome a thousand talents, the one halfe in hand, and the other at ten payments, within the terme of ten yeeres. Valerius An- tias writeth moreover, that there was imposed upon him a tribute of foure thousand pound weight of silver yeerely, for ten yeeres: and besides, twentie thousand pound weight presently. I The same author saith, that expressly it was capitulated, that Philip should not warre at all with Eumenes the sonne of Attalus, who was newly come to the crowne. For the assurance of these covenants, there were received hostages, and amongst them Demetrius king Philip his sonne.
Valerius Antias hath written moreover, that the Iland Ægina, and certein Elephants were given in pure gift to Attalus in his absence: and that upon the Rhodians was bestowed Stratonice, a citie in Caria, with other cities also which Philip had possessed. To conclude, that the Athenians received of free gift these Iles following, to wit, Paros, Imbros, Delos, and Scyros.

When all the States of Greece approved and thought well of this peace; only the Ætolians secretly muttered and found fault with this order set downe by the ten Delegates aforesaid: giving out, that they were but bare letters, and vaine words, shadowed with a counterfet appa- K reance of libertie. For to what end, say they, should some cities be delivered to the Romanes, and thosenot named? others againe be named, and yet order taken, that the without deliverie should be free? but only for this purpose, that those cities which are in Asia should be free, because they beare off and therefore in more safetie; but those that are in Greece, being not precisely named, should be seized upon by them, to wit, Corinth, Chalcis, and Oreum, with Eretrias and Demetrias. And to say a truth, this finding fault of theirs was not altogether frivolous, and without occasion given for some doubt there was of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias: because in the order and act of the Senate, by vertue whereof those ten Delegates aforesaid were sent from the citie, all other cities of Asia and of Greece were doubtlesse in plain termes freed: but as touching these three before named, the Delegates had in commission to take or- L der, as they should see it stand with the good of the Common-wealth; according to their owne judgement and discretion, and the trust that was committed unto them. For well they wist that king Antiochus would passe over into Europe, so soone as ever he could bring his affaires about to his mind, and unwilling they were on any hand, that these cities so commodious for his designes, should lye open and readie to his hand for to seize upon at his pleasure. So Quintius together with the ten Delegates, sailed from Elatia to Anticyra, and from thence to Corinth, where they held their counsaile and consulted of their affaires. Quintius would chuse to say unto them, That all Greece might be delivered and set at libertie, if they could reduce the tongues of the Ætolians: if they were willing that their good affection should be deemed sincere, and the majestie of the Roman name maintained among all: finally, if they would pretend M and make it knowne abroad, that they were passed the seas to set Greece free, and not alter they had shaken off the feignorie of Philip, to translate it unto themselves. The other againe, condicted nothing as touching the libertie of those cities: howbeit, they made remonstrance, that it was the safer course for them, to remaine awhile under the protection and safeguard of the Romanes,

A Romanes, than that in steed of Philip they should receive Antiochus for their Lord. In conclusion decreed it was, That Corinth should be rendred to the Achæans, but yet so, that there should be a Roman garison in the highest quarter of the citie called Acrocorinthus. Item, That Chalcis and Demetrias should be retained still, untill such time as they were no more in feare and doubt of Antiochus.

Now approached the ordinarie solemnitie of the Isthmian games, unto which at all times usually there was great recourse of people, as well in regard of the naturall disposition of that nation (desirous to see such sports and pastimes, wherein was represented the triall of maistries in all kind of arts, in all feates either of cleane strength, or of agilitie and nimbleness of the bodie) as also in respect of the commodious seate of the place: whereunto from all parts of Greece they repaired thither by two divers and sundrie seas. But being amused in expectation to know B what the estate of Greece, and what their owne particular condition would be hereafter, divers men not only devised secretly with themselves, but also gave out and whispered in their speech and talke. Well, the Romanes were set to behold this solemnitie: and the publick Crier with a trumpeter went forth into the mids of the Cirque or shew place, from whence the manner was to proclaime the sports and games aforesaid in a solemne set forme of words: and after he had by found of trumpet made silence, he pronounced with a loud voice in this maner, Be it knowne C unto all men, that the Senate of Rome, and T. Quintius the Generall of their armie, having vanquished king Philip and the Macedonians, do ordeine, that the Corinthians, the Phocensians, and the Locrenians, be all free, and delivered from all taxes whatsoever, and to live according to their owne lawes. Item, That the Iles Euboea, the Magnesians, the Thessalians, the Perthæbians, the cheans, and Phthiotes do enjoy the like freedom and immunitie. And consequently he reherfed all the nations which had bene in subjection to Philip. Vpon this proclamation of the beadle, there was such joy, that men were notable to conceive and comprehend it. Every man could hardly believe that he had heard the thing which he so wished and desired afore to heare: one looked upon another wondering at the matter as if it had ben a vain vision or illusion of some dreme: and well they trusted not their own eares in hearing that which particularly concerned everyone, but enquired of them that stood next unto them. The crier was called back againe: such a desire had each one not only to heare the glad tidings, but also to behold the happie messenger of this their libertie: and no remedie there was, but once againe he must publish & pro-nomce the same. Now when their joy was once confirmed, they set up such a shout, & followed it so with clapping of hands, redoubling the same so often, as evidently it appeared, how there is no earthly good in the world more pleasing and welcome unto a multitude, than is libertie.
After this, the games were performed in such hast, that neither the mind of any man was bent to intend, nor the eye busied to behold the sight thereof, so wholly had that one joy possessed them and forestalled the sence of all other pleasures and delights. But when the pastimes were once ended, they all in manner ran apace to the Roman Generall, in such sort, that his person was in some daunger of the multitude, crowding so hard upon him alone, for desire they had to come unto him, to touch his right hand, and to cast garlands of flowers and labels of sundrie colours upon him: but being a man fast upon three and thirtie yeeres of age, both the vigour of youth, and also the joy that he took for the accomplishment of so glorious an act, afforded him strength enough to abide the prease of the people. This gladnes of all men, shewed it selfe not onely for the present, but continued also for many daies space, entertained not onely in thankful minds, but expressed also in joyfull discourses: namely, That there was one nation yet in the world, which at their proper cost and charges, with their owne paine and perill, made warre for the freedom of others: who afforded this favour and pleasure not to neighbours and borders onely, or to those that were joyned neere to them in the continent and firme land, but passed over the seas to the end, that throughout the whole world, there should be no unjust and tyrannicall government, but in all places, right, reason, and law, might prevaile most and carry the greatest sway. Lo, how by the onely voice of one Beadle all the cities of Greece and Asia are set free: To conceive and enterprife so great a thing, proceedeth from a brave mind and noble heart: but to effect the same, is a singular vertue and rare felicitie.

This done, Quintius and the ten Delegates gave audience to the embassages of divers kings and princes, nations and states. And first of all others were the embassadours of king Antiochus called in: who used the same speech in manner that they had at Rome, vaunting great words

without any ground and substance of credit. But answer was returned unto them, not covertly G by way of circumstance as aforetime (when Philip was on foot and things stood doubtfull) but openly in plaine tearmes. Inprimis, That Antiochus must quit and abandon all the cities of Asia, which belonged at any time either to king Philip or king Ptolomæus. Item, That he medle not with any free citie or state, and especially with those of Greece: but above all, warned he was and forbidden, either to passe over himselfe, or to send any forces into Europe. After the kings embassadours were licensed to depart, all the nations and states had a generall session and meeting together, which was the sooner dispatched, for that in the decrees of the ten Delegates all the cities and states were pronounced by name. Vnto the Orestians (a people in Macedonie) for that they revolted first from the king, their own lands and privileges were restored. The Magne- H nesiens, the Perræbians and Dolopians were likewise declared free. Vnto the people of Thessalie over and above the graunt of their libertie, the Phthiotian Achæans were annexed, excepting the citie of Thebes in Phthia and Pharsalus. As for the Ætolians who required, that according to covenant Pharsalus and Leucas should be rendred unto them, they were put over unto the Senat. But they awarded them the Phocenses and Locrenses, with other appertinances adjoined before by vertue of the decree. Corinth, Triphylia, and Herea (which also is a citie of Peloponnesus) were rendred unto the Achæans. Moreover, these ten Delegates gave Oreum and Eretria unto Eumenes the sonne of Attalus, but by reason that Quintius would not agree thereto, the matter was referred over to the Senat for to be decided: and the Senate graunted freedome unto these cities, together with Caristus. Vnto Pleuratus were freely given Lingus and Parthenius, which were two nations in * Illyricum, and had beene hoth subject to Philip. It was ordain- I ed also, that Aminander should hold those castles stil, which during the warres he had won from Philip. When the assembly was dissolved, the ten Delegates having divided betwene themselves their severall charges, departed every man to set free the cities of their particular regions and quarters. P. Lentulus to Bargyllæ, L. Stertinus to Hephæstra, Thassus, and other cities of Thracia; P. Villius & L. Terentius toward king Antiochus; and Cn. Cornelius toward Philip. Vnto whom, after Cornelius had declared his commission concerning some smaller matters, and withall demanded of him, Whether he could with patience abide to heare counsell not onely profitable unto himselfe, but also necessarie? The king made answer againe and said, That he would not onely give him the hearing, but also yeeld him, thanks besides, in case he would deliver ought unto him for his good. Whereupon hee perswaded him earnestly, that for asmuch K as he had obtained peace already, he should send his embassadours to Rome, to crave league also and amitie: to the end, that if Antiochus began to stirre, he might not be thought to have attended and waited for some occasions and opportunities to make warre. [This conference and communication with Philip was at Tempe in Thessalie.] And when he answered, That he would immediately dispatch his embassadours, Cornelius came to Thermopylæ, where a solempne Diet and assembly of all Greece is wont to be held upon certaine set daies, and thither resort great numbers of people. Which meeting is called Pylaicum: where hee advised the Ætolians especially to persevere constant and faithfull in the amitie of the people of Rome. Some of the principall Ætolians seemed to complaine betwene whiles, that the Romanes were not so well affected to their nation after victorie, as they were in time of the warre: but others, more sharply L blamed and reproched them, yea and upbraided them with this, That Philip could not have beene vanquished, no nor the Romanes ever able so much as to passe over into Greece, without the helpe of the Ætolians. Cornelius forbore to make answer againe to those points, for feare of farther wrangling and altercation; and promised, that if they sent to Rome they should obtaine any thing that was reason. Whereupon by his advice and approbation, there were deputed Embassadours. This was the issue and end of the warre with Philip.

Whiles these affaires thus passed in Greece, Macedonie, and Asia, all Tuscanie in manner was gon out & risen up in arms, by occasion of a conspiracie of bondslaves. For to inquire into these troubles and to repress the same, there was sent M. Agilius a Pretour (who had the civill jurisdiction betwene citizens and aliens) with one of the two legions of Romaine citizens. Some of them, who were already assembled together and grown to an head, he overcame in fight: of whom, many were slaine, and many taken prisoners. Others he scourged and roundly trussed up, hanging them on gybbets, even as many as were the principall and chiefe of the conspiracie: and others there were whome he sent home againe to their masters.

A Now the Consuls were gone into their provinces. Marcellus so soone as he was entred into the marches of the Boij, and had over-wearied his souldiers with marching all day long, sate him downe upon a certaine rising of a hill, and there as he was incamping himselfe and his men, Corolamus a prince or great L. of the Boij, with a mightie power assailed and charged him, and slew upon three thousand of his men. In which sodaine and tumultuarie skirmish, certaine brave men of marke were slaine; among whome were T. Sempronius Gracchus, and M. Iunius Syllanus two Colonels of the allies: also A. Ogulnius and P. Claudius two knight marshals or Tribunes of the second legion. Howbeit the Romans strongly fortified their tents and defended them valiantly, which the enemies upon their fortunate victorie had long assailed to no effect. And in the same standing campe he continued certaine daies, whiles he cured his souldjors of their wounds, and recovered their hearts after so great a fright. The Boij (as they are a nation that of all things can B not endure any tedious delay of time) disperfed themselves into their townes and forts. Then Marcellus presently crossed the Po, and led his armie into the territorie of Comum, where the Insubrians lay incamped after they had sollicitied and caused those of * Comum to take armes. The legions made no more adoe, but gave them battaile in the verie way: and at the first encounter the enemies charged them so hotely, that they forced the forefront of the battaile to recule. Which when Marcellus perceived, fearing least beeing once disordered they should be repulled and discomfited, he made out a cohort of Marsians to make head; and at once set forth all the troupes of the Latine Cavallerie against them. Their first and second charge both, mightily impeached and quailed the enemy, advancing forward lustily and preasing upon them C in great furie: whereby the rest of the Romaine armie taking heart againe and being encouraged, at the first received them manfully and made resistance only, but afterwards followed fiercely upon them: in so much as the Gaules were able no longer to abide their violence, but turned their backe, tooke them to their heeles, and ran away by heapes. Valerius Antias writeth, that in this battaile there were 40000 men slaine and above, 507 militarie ensignes taken, with 432 chariots: besides many chaines of gold, whereof Claudius presented one (verie massie above the rest and of great weight) unto Jupiter, which was hung up within the temple in the Capitoll, as he writeth. The same day was the campe of the Gaules forced and ranfack, and the towne of Comum also within few daies taken by assault. Vpon this there were eight and twentie boroughs or forts, that fell away and revolted to the Consull. But the Historiographers agree not upon D this, Whether the Consull led his forces against the Insubrians first, or the Boians; and whether heras out the dishonour of a former foile and defeature by a fortunate victorie in this battell: or contrariwise, after a prosperous fight achieved before Comum, hee blotted and defaced the same with a shamefull overthrow received at the Boians hand.

During this variable and alternative fortune, L. Purpurio the other Consull, marched into the Boians countrie through the tribe Sappinia. And when hee was approached neere to a castle called * Mutilum, he feared least he should be enclosed and intercepted by the Boians and Ligurians: wherupon he retired with his forces the same way that he came, and fetching a great compass about through the open countrie in safetie & securitie, he came at length to his colleague.

Who having joined both their powers together, first raunged over the Boians territories, waiting and spoiling until they came as farre as * Felsina. This towne with other strong burroughes and forts, and in a manner all the Boians yeelded themselves, save onely their youth, who were up in armes to pill and spoile, and were at that time retired unto the Forrests and glins out of the way. After this the armie marched toward the Ligurians. The Boians making full account to assault the Romaine armie at unwares, which marched without good regard of themselves, and not close together (for that their enemies seemed to bee farre off) followed after through the blind and covert Forrests. But when they saw that they could not overtake them, they suddainly all at once passed over the Po in small bothomes and punts, and after they had spoiled and pilld the Levians and Libuans, as they returned from thence with a bootie raised out of the countrie, they chanced in the utmost frontiers of Liguria, to light upon the armie of the Romanes in their E march. Sooner and with more eagernesse fell they to fight, than if they had appointed both time and place, and been prepared aforehand to strike a battell. There it well appeared, of what force anger is to prick on and sharpen mens spirits to conflict. For the Romanes more greedie of murder and bloodhead, than of victorie, fought so, as they scarce left the enemies one messenger to carie the newes of their unhappie overthrow. In regard of these exploits, upon the Consuls letters ters brought to Rome, ordained it was, that there should be a solemne procession and thanksgiving to the gods for three daies. Shortly after Marcellus came to Rome, unto whom was granted a triumph with great consent of the LL. of the Senat; and whiles hee was in his magnificence he triumphed over the Insulubrians and Comians, leaving for his Colleague good hope likewise of a triumph, because himselfe (to say a truth) in that nation fought but unfortunately, whereas his colleague sped well enough, and had a luckie hand. Much spoile of the enemies was caried in a pompe, upon the chariots that were taken and won from them. Many ensignes and banners were borne in a shew, besides in monie, to the value of 320000 asses of brasse coine; and 234000 bigate peeces of silver. The footmen had 800 asses given them apeece, every horseman and centurion had thrice as much.

The same yeare king Antiochus, whiles he kept his winter at Ephesus, assaied to reduce all the cities and States of Asia unto the auncient forme of government and subjection, assuring himselfe, that the rest would not be hard to be subdued and brought under, because the townes were either situate upon plaines, or nothing well fortified with walls, and not furnished with men and munition. As for Smyrna and Lampacus, they stood upon their freedom, and challenged it. Doubted it was, and great daunger, that if he should let them goe cleere away so, some cities in Æolis and Ionia would take after Smyrna, and others in Hellepontus follow the example of Lampacus. Therefore both himselfe sent from Ephesus to lay siege unto Smyrna, and gave commandement, That the forces which were at Abydus (leaving only a small garison behind) should be led to the siege and assault of Lampacus. And yet hee threatened and terrified them not so much with forces and violence, but assaied them rather by faire meanes, sending to them his embassadours, so as, partly by flattering and gentle words wherewith he entertained them, and partly by mild reproofe for their rashnesse and obstinacie, hee endeavoured to put them in some hope, that shortly they should have whatsoever they desired: & then, both they themselves, and all others should evidently see, that they had obtained their libertie by the especiall grace and favour of the king, and not usurped and gained it by occasion of some advantage and opportunitie. To this they answered againe, That Antiochus ought neither to marvell, nor be offended and displeased at them, if they could not well endure the hope which they had of freedom, thus to be deferred from time to time. Then he departing from Ephesus in the beginning of the spring sailed unto Hellepontus with his fleet. His land forces he transported over to Madytos a city in Chersonesus, & joined them to his strength by sea. And because they shut the gates upon him he environned the towne with armed men, and when hee was at the point to give the assault, and to bend his engines of batterie against the walls, it was surrendered into his hands. Upon the like feare the inhabitants also of other cities in Chersonesus yielded themselves. After this hee came to Lyfimachia, with his whole power, as well of land-soldiours as sea-servitours. And finding it abandoned, ruinate, and lying (as it were) along, (for but few yeeres before the Thracians had forced, sacked, and burnt it) he had a great desire to reare and set upright againe that noble and famous citie, seated in so good and commodious a place. And therefore he took great care, and employed all his endeavour to re-edifie the walls, to re-build the edifices, to redeem and ransom some the Lyfimachians that were in slavery, to seeke out all those that were dispersed over Hellepontus and Chersonesus, and gather them together, yea, and to enroll new inhabitants upon hope of gaine and profit, and by all meanes possible to store and people the cittie againe. And withall, because he would ease them of the feare they had of the Thracians, hee went in person with the one halfe of his land forces to wast and spoile the confines of Thrace; the other part with all the sea-souldiours and mariners he left hard at worke about the repairing of the citie.

About this time as L. Cornelius (being sent by the Senate to compose the controversies and variance betwene the two kings, Antiochus and Ptolomeus) abode at Selymbria; so of the ten Commissioners abovesaid, P. Lentulus departed from Bargyllæ, P. Villius and L. Terecius from Thassus, and arrived all three at Lyfimachia: where L. Cornelius likewise met them from Selymbria; and a few daies after king Antiochus, being newly returned out of Thracia. The first meeting and salutation betwene him and the Commissioners was friendly and courteous, yea, and there passed to and fro afterwards divers amiable kindneses and loving entertainements mutually. But when they entred once to parle of their commission that they had in charge, and of the present State of Asia, then there was frowning, and their bloud up. The Romane agents stucke not to tell him to his face, that all that he had done, since he tocke the sea, and departed with his fleet

A fleet out of Syria, was displeased unto the Senate, saying, That they thought it meet, that all the cities should bee restored unto king Ptolomeus, which had been under his dominion. For as touching those townes, which sometime Philip had been possessed of, and which Antiochus had surprised and seized upon, taking his time and vantage, when Philip was employed another way in the Romane warres, it was no reason, nor a thing tollerable, that the Romanes should for so many yeeres space, by land and sea endure so great toile, and hazard such perils, and suffer Antiochus in the end to goe away with the fruit & reward of all the service. But for the ease, that the Romanes would take no knowledge of his coming into Asia, as a matter impertinent unto them; can they dissimule also, that now he is come over into Europe with all his forces both for land & sea, and little wanteth of making open warre upon the Romanes? Marie, as for him, he will not let to denie, that he levieth any warre, although he were arrived and landed in Italie. To these challenges the king made answer and said, That he saw well ynough and knew before, that the Romanes were inquisitive and curious ynough to search what king Antiochus ought to doe, but they never once thought of their own selves, how far forth they should by right proceed, as well by land as by sea. As for Asia, it pertained not at all to the people of Rome, neither had they more reason to enquire what Antiochus did in Asia, than Antiochus to search into the actions of the people of Rome in Italie. As concerning Ptolomeus, from whom they complaine, that he had taken certain cities, he did them to understand, that there was amitie betwene him and Ptolomeus, and they were now in tearmes of knitting themselves shortly in neerer bonds of alliance & affinitie. Neither sought hee the spoile of Philip, and to enrich himselfe by his adversitie and misfortune: or passed over into Europe against the Romanes. But when he was vanquished once, all that ever he had, by right and law of warre, became the possessions of Seleucus, and so consequently (as he tooke it) appertained unto him. And during the time, that his progenitors and predecessors, were busied and troubled with other affaires, first Ptolomeus caught at some things, and Philip after at other, & so between them they usurped & seized upon other mens possessions, and namely, of certain places neere and hard by in Thracia, which without all controversy belonged unto Lyfimachus. For to reduce which into their auncient State, hee was thither come, and now was in hand to reedifie Lyfimachia anew, lately destroyed by the violence of the Thracians, to the end, that Seleucus his sonne might hold it as the roiall seat of his kingdom. Thus as they continued arguing and debating for certain daies, there ran a rumour, but without any certaine author, that king Ptolomeus was dead: whereupon they could grow to no conclusion of all their parties: yet they made semblance on both sides, that they heard nothing thereof. And as well L. Cornelius, who was sent in embassage to both the kings, Antiochus and Ptolomeus, requested respite of some small time to conferre with Ptolomeus, to the end that himselfe might be arrived in Ægypt, before any alteration were made in the new possession of that kingdom: as also Antiochus made reckning, that Ægypt would be his, if this good occasion then were presented unto him. Therefore having dismissed the Romanes, and left his sonne Seleucus behind him with all the land forces, for to finish the building againe of Lyfimachia which he had begun, himselfe with all his fleet sailed to Ephesus: and having sent his embassadours to Quintus, to treat soberly about a league and amitie, he coasted along Asia, and so arrived in Lycia. And when he heard for certain at Pataræ that Ptolomeus was yet living, he gave over his purpose of sailing into Ægypt: yet nevertheless he shaped his course and set saile for Cyprus: and when he had doubled the point of Chelidonium, he stayed awhile in Pamphylia about the river Eury-medon, by occasion of a mutinie among the mariners and oremen. From thence he weighed anchor, and when he was sailed as farre as a place called [The heads of the river Sarus] there arose a goust and fearefull tempest, wherein he had like to have bene cast away and drowned with all his fleet. Many of his ships were run aground, & many of them swallowed up of the sea, so as there escaped not one of them by swimming to land. A number of men there perished, not of base mariners only, and unknowne common soldiers, but also of his neere and especiall friends. Having rallied the dispersed reliques of this shipwrack, seeing he had no meanes and was not able to reach and gaine Cyprus, he returned againe to Seleucia, with an armie nothing so puissant nor so well furnished, as when he set out in his voyage. There he commanded his ships to be haled a land, and laid up in their docks (for winter now approached) and himselfe tooke his journey to Antiochea, there to lye all that winter time. And in these termes stood the affaires of the kings.

At Rome, there were first instituted in this yeere three Triumvirs called Epulones, to wit, G C. Lucius Lucullus, T. Romuleus (who was the man that put up the bill for their creation) and P. Porcius Lecca. And by a law in that behalfe ordeined, these Triumvirs were allowed as well as a Bishop, the long embroidered robe of purple. But in this yeere great debate and variance there was betwene the Questors or Treasurers of the citie Q. Fabius Labeo, and L. Aurelius of the one side, and all the Priests on the other side. These Treasurers were at some fault for money, because they were minded and appointed to make the last payment unto certein private persons, for the loane silver which they had disbursed for the warres: these monies the Treasurers demanded of the Augurs and Bishops, to furnish out the said payment; for that during the warres, they only had not bene contributors in any levie. The Priests appealed to the Tribunes, and called for their lawfull favour: but all was in vaine, and so they were forced to satisfie all the arrears for the H yeeres past, wherein they had paid nothing. This yeere there died two Bishops, and new were entailed in their roumes. M. Marcellus the Consull entred in place of T. Sempronius Tuditanus, who deceased Pretour in Spaine; and L. Valerius in steed of M. Cornelius Cethegus. Q. Fabius Maximus also an Augur died a very yong man, before he had borne any office of State: but for that yeere there was not substituted a new Augur in his roume.

After this, M. Marcellus the Consull held the solemne assembly for the election of Consuls. And Consuls were created L. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Porcius Cato. Then were the Pretors chosen, namely, C. Fabius Luscinus, Cn. Atinius Labeo, C. Manlius Volsus, Ap. Claudius Nero, P. Manlius, and P. Porcius Lecca. The Aediles of the chaire M. Fulvius Nobilior and C. Flaminius divided among the people 1000000 Modij of wheate, at two asses a modius. This store of come I had the Sicilians brought to Rome, for the honor of C. Flaminius and his father. And Flaminius was content that his companion in office should reape a full part of the thanks for this gratuite.
The games called Romain were exhibited in most sumptuous manner, and thrice represented all over againe. The Aediles of the Commons Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus, and C. Sempronius, who also was the high parish Priest, and Super-intendent, called Curio Max. called in question many of the citie bailiffs that gathered their rents for pastures, judicially to answer upon their ac-countments before the people. Three of them were condemned, and of their silver raised upon their fines, they built the temple of Faunus in the Island. The Plebeian plaies were renewed for two dayes, and a solemne publick feast was celebrated in regard of them.

The same day that L. Valerius Flaccus and M. Porcius entred their office, they proposed unto K the Senate concerning the government of the provinces. And order was given by the LL. of the Counsell, that foras much as the warre increased so in Spaine, as required not only a Consular armie, but a Consull also for the leader; the Consuls should either agree betwene themselves for the government of the two provinces, to wit, the hither Spaine, and Italie, or els to cast lots therefore: that he whose hap it was to rule Spaine, should have with him two legions, five thousand Latin allies, and five hundred horse; and likewise to have the conduct of a flecte of twenty gallies of warre: that the other Consull should levie and enroll two legions; which were thought sufficient to defend and keepe Fraunce in obedience, considering the courages of the Insulians and Boij, were well cooled and abated the last yeere. Cato by lot had the charge of L Spaine, and Valerius of Italie. Then the Pretours cast lots for their provinces. To C. Fabius Luscinus fell the jurisdiction over the citizens of Rome: to C. Atinius Labeo over the strangers.
C. Manlius Volsus governed Sicilie, and Ap. Claudius Nero the farther Spaine. M. Porcius Lecca was assigned to rule * Pise, to the end he might be upon the back of the Ligurians, and P. Man- lius was appointed as an assistant and coadjutor to the Consull in the higher Spaine. As for T. Quintius, his commission was renewed for one yeere longer, in regard that not only Antio- chus and the Aetolians, but also Nabis the Lacedemonian Tyrant, were doubted and suspected not to stand sound to the Romans: & for him were set out two legions: and if need were of any supply to make up the companies thereof, the Consuls were enjoined to enroll new souldiers; and to send them over into Macedonie. Also Appius Claudius had a warrant to take up 2000 foote and two hundred horse, over and above that legion which Q. Fabius had. The like number of fresh horse and foote was appointed for P. Manlius to be sent into the hither Spaine: and the same legion was granted unto him, which was commaunded by Minucius the Pretor. Moreover P. Porcius Lecca was to have the leading of two hundred footmen, and fiftie horse, drawne out of the Gaules armie, for to lye in Hetruria about Pise. Last of all in Sardinia P. Sempronius Longus continued

A continued still in place of commaund. Thus the provinces being distributed, the Consuls before they departed out of the citie, by advice and counsell of the Bishops, performed the solemnite of the sacred Spring which was vowed before by the Pretour C. Cornelius Mammula, according to the mind of the Senat and the good liking of the people, in the yeere when Cn. Servilius and C. Flaminius were Consuls: and so it was celebrated one and twentie yeeres after it was first vowed. Much about this time was C. Claudius Pulcher the sonne of Appius, elected Augur, & invested in that Sacerdotal dignitie, in the place of Q. Fabius Maximus, who died the yeere before.

When as men began now to mervaile that there was so little accompt made of the warre begun already in Spaine, there were letters brought from Q. Minutius with newes, That he had fought a fortunate field before the towne of Turba, with Budares and Besafides, two Spanish Generals and great commanders: that he had slaine twelve thousand enemies, taken Budares the generall himselfe prisoner, and that the rest were discomfited and put to flight. Upon the reading of these letters, lesse feare there was of Spaine, from whence they looked for great warres.

After the returne of the ten Delegates or Commissioners abovesaid, all the care was, and no talke els but about Antiochus and his affaires. These men, after they had declared first how their proceedings went with king Philip, and upon what conditions they had granted peace, enformed and gave them to understand, That there was as great a warre behind from Antiochus: C that he had passed over the seas into Europe with a mightie Armada, and as puissant an armie for land service; and had he not bene averted another way by a vaine hope to invade and seize upon Egypt, which he conceived of a vainer bruit and rumor of Ptolome his death, all Greece C would have bene anon on a light fire, and up in armes. For the very Aetolians themselves, a nation naturally of an unquiet spirit, and incensed besides against the Romans, would not have C sist still and bene in rest. Moreover, there was another maladie and mischief as dangerous, setled C as it were within the ribs and in the very heart of Greece: to wit Nabis, the Tyrant at this present C of the Lacedemonians only, but shortly, if he may be let alone, of all Greece; who for avarice C and crueltie is equall to all the famous and noted tyrants that ever were: and if he be suffered to C possesse himselfe of Argos, and to hold it as a fortresse to commaund all Peloponnesus, when the C Romane armies shall be once transported home againe into Italie, in faith, Greece may make C small boast of being delivered from Philip: for this they shall be sure of at least, if of nothing els, C to have a neere neighbour tyrant, in steed of a king far off, for to be their lord and imperiously to C commaund them. The auncient Senators, hearing these intelligences from grave persons of C good qualitie, and who made report of all things, not by hearefay, but upon their owne knowledge, were of advice and resolved to have a good eye and regard with all speed unto Antiochus, considering the king was passed already into Syria, whatsoever the occasion was. But as touching the Tyrant, after they had disputed and debated the matter long time, Whether they had sufficient cause already to determine upon some finall conclusion, or should referre unto the wisdom & judgement of T. Quintius the managing of those affaires, therein to proceed and do according as he should deeme it good & expedient for the Common-wealth; in fine, they permitted him to use his owne discretion concerning the Lacedemonian Tyrant: supposing that the matter was not of such weight and consequence as to concerne the maine state of the weale publick so materially, whether it were hastened or protracted; but rather it behoved them to be advised & consider well, what Anniball and the Carthaginians would do, if happily the war with Antiochus were begun and once afoot. They [at Carthage] that sided with the adverse faction of Anniball, had sent divers & sundry letters unto the principal LL. at Rome, every one privately to his friends to this effect, That there passed messengers & letters from Anniball to Antiochus, and that there were embassadors againe that secretly came from the king to him. And like as there be some beasts so wild & savage as never can be tamed; so the courage & spirit of that man was such, as might not possibly be dulced or appeased. For he daily complained that the citie languished and grew feeble with idleness, and by sitting still & doing nothing, was overgrown as it were with moss, and impossible it was to raise & stir it up but with sound of armor and weapons. These advertisements carried likelihood of truth and good credit with them, in regard of the late warre so fresh in memorie, which he alone began first, and managed to the last. Over and besides, he had provoked by a late act of his, many great and mightie personages, who set their hearts against him. The order and degree of Iudges at that time bare chiefe sway and soveraigne authoritie in Carthage: in this respect principally, for that the same Iudges were perpetuall. The goods, Cccc iij the

the honour and reputation, yea and the life of every man lay in their hands. Hee that displeased one of that bench, was sure to have all the rest his enemies and to be upon him: and there never wanted one promoter or other to carrie tales and give information to these judges against a man, if they saw them ill affected once and bent against one. During the time of this emperious and tyrannicall rule of theirs, (for as their power was exceeding all measure, so they bare themselves therein as outrageously beyond the limits of civillie) it was Anniball's hap to be Pretour; and by vertue of his place he sent for one of the treasurers to come before him: but he made no reckning of his authoritie, and refused to obey: for the said treasurer was one of the contrarie side; and because from the degree of those treasurers they mounted presently into the highest order of the judges, therefore he carried with him an haucie mind already, in regard of the high rounge that he was shortly to step into. Anniball you may be sure, tooke this as a great disgrace and indignitie to his person, and therefore hee sent a pursevant or sargeant to attach the bodie of the Treasurer aforesaid: and presently calling the people to a generall assembly, he commaunded him there to be presented: where he accused and blamed the partie himselfe, no more than the whole order and degree of the judges: through whose insolent pride and excessive power, both lawes and magistrates were nothing regarded but troden under foot. And perceiving that these words of his tickled the itching eares of the people, considering also that their proud demeanor prejudiced the libertie of the meanest persons: immediatly he published a law, and gate it enacted, That those judges should be chosen every yeare, and that from thenceforth one and the same man might not be a judge two yeares together. But looke how much thanke he had at the commons hands for this act, so much he offended many of the great men and principals of the citie. Another thing besides he did, whereby hee purchased to himselfe the ill will of some privat persons, in tending the common good of the weale publick. The finances and revenues of the State, partly through negligence went to decay, and partly were shared out in dividends, betweene some certaine of the head citizens and magistrates: and more than that, the mony which by way of tribute was to be paid yeerely unto the Romans, was too short and not to be found: and it appeared, that a fore levie would be imposed upon privat persons shortly, to make those payments out of their owne purses. Anniball, after he had cast up the bookes, and made an estimate and just abstrack how much the rents and revenues of the citie amounted unto, as well from customes by sea as land, and to what uses they were employed; and perceiving thereby, what was defrayed in the ordinarie charges of the State, & what went a wrong way, and was avorted by these theeves to their owne selves, he pronounced aloud in open audience of the whole assembly, That the arrearages should be gathered up & brought into the common chest: and so privat persons might be discharged and eased of their impositions of tribute, and the common wealth would be rich enough and able to perforce and furnish out the monies due to the people of Rome. And as he thus said, so he was as good as his word, and executed it accordingly. Then these caterpillers, who for certaine yeeres lived by robbrie of the common treasure, and sed upon the fruits of the citie, fared spitefully against Anniball, as if he had done them great wrong in taking their owne goods from them; and not proceeded in justice to wrest out of their hands their stolen substance: and in great malice and bitterneffe ceased not to provoke against Anniball the Romanes, who were ready enough of themselves to picke some quarrell to him, to seeke occasion of hatred, and to find an hole in his coat. Scipio Africanus for a long time gave the deafe eare unto them, and misliked the course: for he supposed it was not for the honour and majestie of the people of Rome to subscribe unto those imputations charged upon Anniball, to entertaine the spight and hatred of men, and to interesse and insert publicke authoritie within the privat factions of the Carthaginians; and not to be content to have vanquished Anniball in war, unless they also took upon them the persons of accusers, and preferred a slanderous libel & bill of inditement, & sware thereto Billa vera. But at length they wrought and brought about, that embassadours should be sent to Carthage, who in the Senate there might charge Anniball categorically, with plotting and practising with Antiochus for to wage warre against them. And these three were addressed to this embassie, C. Servilius, M. C. Marcellus, and Q. Terentius Culleo; who being arrived there, caused it to be given out to as many as should demand the cause of their comming, (and all by instruction from the adversaries of Anniball) that their errand was to compose and end the debates betweene Masaniissa king of the Numidians, and the Carthaginians. This was commonly divulged and beleaved for truth.

But

- A But Anniball found them streight and sinelt this juggling, and was not ignorant that he was the onely man that the Romanes shor at, and howsoever peace was graunted to the Carthaginians, yet they continued an endlesse and inexpressible warre with him alone still. Whereupon hee resolved to frame himselfe to give place to the time and yeeld unto fortune. And beeing furnished aforehand with all things requisite to take his flight, when hee had of purpose all the day long shewed himselfe in the publicke place of assembly verie formally, to turne by all suspition of his intended resolution, so soone as it began to be darke night, in his citizens gowne as he went all day, and attended in the hall, he gate him soorth straight to the citie gate, accompanied onely with two persons, and those not privie at all to his purpose and designment. And having found his horses readie in the place appointed, hee mounted and rode apace that night untill hee was come to a certaine quarter of the territorie of Voca: and by the next morning, hee passed betweene Acylla and Thapsus, and recovered a towre or fort of his owne; where he was imbarcked in a ship readie rigged and appointed with saile and ore to take sea and away. Thus departed Anniball out of Africke, lamenting more often the hard hap and calamitie of his countrey, than of his owne friends and kinsfolke. And the same day he fell with the yland Cercina: where the Carthaginians found in the rode certaine hulks charged with marchandise: and when at his comming a shore out of his ship, there came many running toward him for to salute & welcom him thither, hee charged his owne companie, that if any asked concerning him, they should make answer, That he went upon an embassage to Tyrus: but fearing least any of their barkes should disanker that night, and make report at Thapsus or Acylla, that he was seene in Cercina: he caused a beaft to be killed for sacrifice, and invited the masters of the ships and all the marchants to supper; and therewith commaunded all the sailes and crossie saile-yards to be had out of the vessels, to make thereof a large pavillion, that they might sit in the shade at their supper: for that, as it fell out, it was then midsummer. And as the time and such provision as they had, would give leave, he set out a feast and banquet; he spared for no wine, and continued the merriment farre within night. Then Anniball, so soone as he could espie his time for to deceive those that were in the harborough, weighed ancre. The rest were fast asleepe; and when the next day they awoke and roused themselves, with their drunken and drouisie nols (and far forth day it was and late ere they arose) they were faine to spend some houres in siting their ores againe in their right places, and the tackling of the ships in good order.
- D In this while, at Carthage the ordinarie multitude that used to frequent the house of Anniball, repaired as their manner was to his gate-house: and when it was voiced abroad, that he was not to be found, all the companie gathered together in the market place, seeking and enquiring for the principall and chiefe personage of their citie. Some gave out (as the truth was) that he was fled: other said plainly, that he was murdered and made away through the falshood and villanie of the Romanes; and this they sticked not to avouch. There might a man have seene sundrie and divers countenances (as it fareth commonly in cities where there is siding and parts taking) as each one is affected to his owne bend and faction. At last, newes came that he was seene at Cercina. The Roman Embassadours having upon audience given, declared in the Senat of Carthage, that the LL. of their Senate had certaine intelligence, that both aforetime, king Philip was by Anniball especially sollicitated and set on to, make warre with the people of Rome; and also now there had bene letters and messengers with credence sent from him to king Antiochus; and that he would never rest untill he had set all the world together in arms: and therefore if the Carthaginians were desirous to content and satisfie the Romanes, they should not suffer these parts of his to escape unpunished: then the Carthaginians made answer and said, That nothing of all this passed by publicke councill or consent and allowance of the State, howbeit they would be willing to doe whatsoever the Romanes thought to be reason.
- Anniball* this while had a boone voyage, and with a merrie gale of wind arrived at Tyrus, where he was received of the Tyrians, the first founders of Carthage, as if he had been in another countrey of his owne: received he was, I say, and entertained with all kind of honor, becoming a man so famous and renowned. After he had sojourned there some few daies, he sailed to Antioche: where understanding that the king himselfe was already departed from thence, hee repaired to his sonne, and conferred with him, as he was setting out an yeerely solemnitie of games & plaies neere Daphne, and being courteously also by him intreated, he made no stay, but to ship-board and sea againe. And at Ephesus overtooke the king, whom hee found floating and wavering still.

still in his mind, and unresolved what to doe as touching the Romane warre. But this coming of Anniball, was no small poise to turne the ballance, and to move him to enter into the enterprise thereof. The Aetolians likewise at the same time were estranged and alienated in affection from the Romane league and societie, whose embassadors demanding to have Pharfallum and Leucas againe, with other cities, according to the tenure and form of the first league, the Senate turned over and referred to Quintius.

THE XXXIII. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the foure and thirtieth Booke.

The law Oppia, propounded and enacted by C. Oppius a Tribune of the Commons, in the time of the Punicke warre, for the abridging and restraint of the excess in womens apparell, was after much variance and debate repealed, notwithstanding that Porcius Cato laboured to the contrary, that it might not be abolished. This Cato made a voyage into Spaine, and by force of armes (beginning first to warre at Emporia) brought the hisber province of Spaine on this side Iberus to quietnesse. T. Quintius Flaminius levied warre against the Lacedemonians and Nabis their tyrant, in which he sped fortunately, and so prevailed, that he made an end thereof, granted them peace to his own good liking and pleasure, delivered Argos, and set it free, which was before in subjection to the tyrant. The Senate then, and never before, beheld the publick games and pastimes by themselves, apart from the rest of the people: Which to bring about, Sex. Aelius Papius, and L. Cornelius Cethegus the Consuls, set in foot and intermeddled themselves, to the great indignation and discontentment of the Commons. More colonies were planted with Romane citizens. M. Porcius Cato triumphed over Spaine. The warres also which fortunately were achieved against the Boij and the French Insulres are here recorded. T. Quintius Flaminius, who had vanquished Philip king of the Macedonians, and Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians, yea, and freed all Greece from their oppression, for these many and noble exploits rode in triumph three daies together. The Carthaginian embassadors brought word, that Anniball who was fled unto Antiochus, banded with him, and combined to make warre. Anniball had besides assisted by means of one Aristo a Tyrian (sent as a cower with credence onely and no letters, to Carthage) for to move and sollicite the Carthaginians to rebellion.

Betweene the troublesome cares of great warres, which either were not fully ended, or at hand readie to begin, there happened an occurrence, which in it selfe being but a small matter to speake of, and of little regard; considering the sides and part-taking about it, grew to a mightie head and contention in the end. M. Fundanius and L. Valerius Tribunes of the Commons, preferred a bill unto the people touching the abrogation of the law Oppia. For C. Oppius aforetime, even when the Punicke warre was at the hottest, and whiles Q. Fabius and T. Sempronius were Consuls, had promulged a Statute, by vertue whereof, No woman of what degree soever, might either have in ornaments and jewels above halfe an ounce weight of gold, nor weare any habiliments wrought of sundrie colours, ne yet ride in coach within the cittie of Rome, or any other towne, nor neerer than a mile from thence, unless it were upon occasion of some solemne feast or publicke sacrifice. Now M. Iunius Bruns, and P. Iunius Bruns, both Tribunes

A bunes likewise of the Commons, stood in defence and mainenance of the said law Oppia, and affirmed plainly they would not suffer it to bee annulled. Many a nobleman was seene in this quarrell: some spake for the law, and others gaine said it. The Capitoll was full of people, either taking part and favouring the cause, or els opposing themselves, and urging the contrarie. The very dames of the citie themselves, could neither by persuation, and advice, nor by any reverent and womanly regard, ne yet by the expresse and absolute commaundment of their husbands be kept within dores; but doe what they could, they bespread all the streets of the citie, beset and kept all the waies into the common place, beseeching and entreating their husbands as they passed by and went downe thither, to permit and give their consent, That seeing the good estate of the Commonweale now flourished, and the private wealth of every man encreased daily, their wives also and matrones might bee allowed to have their auncient ornaments and gay attire againe. The number of these women grew every day more than other, for now they flocked also out of the townes, villages, and other places of resort in the countrie, and shewed themselves at Rome. In so much, as they tooke heart at length, and were so bold as to encounter the Consuls, the Pretours, and other magistrats, requesting and beseeching their favour, to stand with them, and forward the cause. But as for one of the Consuls, Marcus Porcius Cato by name, they could not with all their prayers entreat him to encline unto their suite: who in the maintenance of the said law, and that it might not bee revoked, spake in the frequent assemblee of the people to this effect. My maisters and citizens of Rome, If every one of us had fully resolved and purposed with himselfe to hold his owne, and keepe the rightfull authority and preheminence that hee hath over his owne wife, lesse adoe and trouble wee should have had with them all together at this day. Now having given them the head at home so much, that the curtnesse and shrewdnesse of women hath conquered our libertie and freehold, there behold, here also in publicke place it is troden downe and trampled under foot: and because wee were not able everie man to rule his owne in severall, now wee stand in feare and dread them all in generall. Certes, I my selfe thought ever untill now, that it was but a seined fable and devised tale that went of a certaine Island, wherein by a conspiracie of women, all the men were murdered every one, and that sexe utterly made away and rooted out. But well I see now, bee as they creatures never so weake, so sicke and feeble, let them once have their meetings, their conferences and secret conferences, they will worke mischeefe in the highest degree, and be as dangerous as any other. And surely for mine owne part, I cannot resolve in mine owne conscience and determine, whether of the twaine be worse; the thing I meane in it selfe, or the precedent example & consequence thereof, considering the manner how it is handled. Of which two, the one toucheth us that are Consuls and the rest of the magistrats, the other concerneth you rather my maisters and citizens of Rome. As for the matter in question, and propofed unto you, whether it be good and expedient for the weale publicke or no, that resteth in you to determine & judge, who are to give your voices and suffrages. But this seditious insurrection here, of women, be it of themselves, or procured by your motion and instigation, M. Fundanius and L. Valerius, no doubt it argueth and emplieth a great default in the magistrats, and I wot not whether it will bee a fouler blot and dishonour to you that are Tribunes, than to us Consuls. Yours will the blame bee, if yee have brought women now to raise and stirre up tribunitious seditions; and ours the shame, if we needs must admit & accept of laws, whether we will or no, for fear of a commotion & seperation of our women, as sometimes we were forced to do by the departure & insurrection of our Commons. I assure you for mine owne selfe, when I passed erewhile into this common-place through the prease and throng of these women, I was abashed and could not chuse but blush. And had I not bene more respective of the reputation, the honour and reverence of some in particular, than of them all together, because it should not be thought and said, that they had beene checked and taken up by the Consul; I would have said unto them, What new fashion is this, good wives, to run gadding abroad into the open streets, to beset the passages, and so affront, yea and hang upon other womens husbands as ye do? What could ye not every one at home have dealt with your owne good-men in the cause, and craved their helpe? or can ye speake faire and flatter better, can yee bee more pleasant and affable abroad in the towne, than within your houses? or make love to other men, rather than to your owne husbands? And yet so speake uprightly, if wives were of that modestie and womanly carriage, as to keepe themselves within the compasse and bounds of their owne libertie, and passe no farther; it were not besitting you ywis, so much as

at home to trouble your selves about our lawes heere, nor to busie your braines, to know either what new Statutes passed, or what old were called. Our auncestours in old time would not, that women in any wise should dispose so much as of their own privat matters without the advice and direction of a governor and overseer: and therefore in great wisdom they ordeined, that they should be ordred and ruled, by their parents, by their brethren, by their husbands. But wee (and God will) can abide them to intermeddle in state-matters, to governe the weale publick, to converse with us in the common place, in publick assemblies and courts of parliament. For what els do they now in the streets, in the crosse waies and Quarrefours, but, some of them geve their voyces that the bills of the Tribunes may passe, and others advise and be of opinion, that the law Oppia may be repealed? Let this outrageous & unreasonable nature of theirs have the head; let these unruly creatures & untamed animals have their will, and bridle them not; see then how of themselves they will keepe a meane and measure in their licentiousnes, unlesse you curb them and hold them in. Tuff, this is the least matter of all that displeaseth these women: there are a thousand things besides that they thinke hardly of, and are discontented to be held unto by old customes and positive lawes. Libertie in all things; nay to speake more truly, a loofe and dislute licentiousnes, is the very thing they long after and desire. For, go they away cleere with this once, what is it that they will not attempt and give the venture for? Do but runne through and count the lawes provided in this behalfe for women, whereby our forefathers and predecessours have kept downe and restrained their disorderly appetites, and with which they have sought to subject them to their husbands: yet, hardly can ye with the help of them all, keepe them in awe and tied fast, but breake out they will, and have their own waies. What then? how and if ye suffer them to catch this and that, and tother thing to it: if I say, ye let them wrest from you one thing after another, untill at length they be check-mates with their husbands, thinke ye that every you shall be able to support and endure them? Begin they once to be equals, they will soone be superious: make them your fellows, and streightwaies they will be your maisters. But, alas, wee lay to hardly to their charge. The thing that they stand upon is no more but this, That no new Act and statute passe against them: for no equall and reasonable thing do they refuse: their desire and prayer is only that they might not be wronged. No, no, it is cleane contrary: That law which ye have received and admitted, that which by your suffrages you first granted, that which by the practise and experience of so many yeeres you have allowed and approved, they would have you to revoke and abolish: which is as much to say, as by annulling that one, to infringe, impair, and diminish the authoritie and vertue of the rest. No law is there so well devised, that is good, commodious and agreeable unto all. This only is intended principally to be considered, that it may be profitable to the most part, and serve in generall. For if as each person shall find an act prejudiciall, hurtfull, and offensive to himselfe, he may be allowed by and by to undo and demolish the same: to what end should all the people assemble together to the making of those statutes, which they anon against whom they were enacted, may abolish and overthrow?
 But gladly would I know the great occasion and cause, for which our dames in such trouble and uprore run out into the streets, and have much ado to forbear the common place, and to mount up into the Rostra to make an oration to this audience? Is it for this, to redeeme out of the hands of Anniball, their fathers, their husbands, their children & brethren, whom he keepeth prisoners? Nay, that calamitie is farre enough off at this day, and farre may it ever be I pray God from our citie and Common-weale. And yet when the time was of that hard fortune and cala-mitie, you would not hearken to their piteous and kind prayers in that behalfe. But it may well be, that it is neither naturall love and kind affection, nor carefull regard of their deere friends, but meere touch of conscience and sense of religion that hath brought them thus together in a congregation. And readie they are, it may be, to receive and intertaine dame Cybele or Ida, coming from Pelcinus out of Phrygia. What honest colour & shew, so much as in word only can be pretended to beare out and cover this mutinous sedition of women? Mary this (say they) that we may glitter in our golden jewels, and shine in purple robes to be seene a farre off: that as well on work daies as holidayes, we may be set up and ride in our coaches and chariots through the citie, as it were in triumph, for the conquest and victorie of a law by us repealed and disanulled: for winning from you, and wringing out of your hands, maugre your beards, the libertie of your voyces and suffrages: to the end that we might not be stinted and gaged in our excessive expenses, in our dissolute profusion, in costly vanities and superfluities. Many a time yee have heard

A heard me complaine of the wastfull and sumptuous bravery of women: and as often have you knowne me to invey against the lavish spending of men, not privat persons only, but magistrates also in higher place: and how this citie of ours is sick as it were at one time of two contrary diseases & maladies, to wit, pinching avarice, and superfluous prodigalitie, two plagues I say, that have bene the bane and overthrow of all great monarchies and flourishing empires. These peblen: mischiefs I dread so much the more, as our state and common-weale encreaseth to the better; groweth welthy every day more than other; & as our dominion extendeth still farther & farther.
 And now that we are gotten over into Greece and Asia, provinces full of all enticing pleasures and alluring delights of the world, now that we are come to finger and handle the rich treasures of mightie Monarches, I feare me that even these things have rather captivated us, than wee them. The goodly images, statues and pictures that came from Syracuse, are (trust me truly) dangerous to this citie, and threaten no lesse than so many ensignes of the field displayed against it. And I heare say alreadie, that there are many, and too too many, that praise and have in admiration the beautifull ornaments of Corinth & Athens, and begin to make a skorne & game of the images of the Roman gods made of potters earth only, laughing a good at them, where they see them standing forth of the walls. Well, for my part I had rather have these gods so propice and favorable to us as they be, than such as those: and so I hope they will ever be, if we can suffer them to abide still in their usual shrines & places accustomed. No longer ago than in our fathers daies, king Pyrrhus sent his embassador Cyneas of purpose and assaied by rich & goodly gifts, to tempt the minds not only of our men, but also of our women. There was no law Oppia as then in force, to bridle and keepe downe the costly pomp and bravery of women: and yet not one of them all received ought at his hands. And what thinke ye was the cause? even the same and no other, for which our auncestours in times past, never so much as thought upon the providing of any such law. There was no pride then, nor riotous superstitie to restraine. And like as the skill and knowledge of diseases, must precede and go afore their cures and remedies: even so evil desires and enormous lusts had neede to bud forth and spring before the lawes, which should repress and cut them downe. What caused the law Licinia to be made, Concerning five hundred acres of ground, forbidding that no man should possesse above; but the exceeding cove-tousnes of men, encroching still and laying land to land? What brought in the law Cincia as touching gifts and presents, but this, that the Commons began alreadie to be vasailes as it were and tributaries to the Senat. No mervaille therefore it is, nor strange may it seeme, that neither the law Oppia, nor any other providing for the cutting off the unmeasurable expences of women, was required and thought needfull in those dayes; when gold, when purple freely tended and offered unto them was refused. If now at this day Cyneas were come, and went with such gifts round about in the citie, he should find receivers enough of women, standing in every streete readie for him. And verily, with all the wit I have, I can not devise what the cause & reason should be of many lustfull desires and appetites that reigne in this age. For say, that if one of you were kept short and debarred of that, which another might lawfully have: peradventure there might rise in your hearts (through infirmities) some shame & abashment in nature, or els displeasure & discontentment in reason: so being all as ye are brought within one compasse of sur-nature and apparell, and no ods at all between you, what need any one of you to feare, least she should be looked into, marked or observed, more than another. I must needs say, the shame that followeth & attendeth either upon nigardise or povertie, is worst of all others: but the law quitteth & freeth you of both, when you want but that only which by law ye may not have, & no man wil reproch you therefore. Yes mary, quoth some rich and welthy dame, this same equalitie & no distinction at all among us, of all things I can not abide. Why may not I according to my calling, be seene araied in purple, & adorned with gold? And why is not the poore estate of others known, but lieth hidden under this pretext and cloke of a law: so as they may be thought yet (were it not for the law) that such & such things they would have; where as indeed they are not able to maintaine and beare it out? Would ye (in faith) my maisters and citizens of Rome, have your wives to strive thus, that the richer sort might deserve to have that, which no other can reach unto: and the poore againe because by that meanes they would not be despised, over-streine themselves to go above their calling & abilitie? Certes I dare avow, if they begin once to shame at that which is not shame-worthy, they will not bask at any thing, be it never so shamefull. Have it she will out of her owne, so long as it lasteth: and when all is gone, to her husbands purse she will go. Alas poore

The question of the law is not the law itself.

poore man and wo begun is that husband, as well he that is intreated by his wife, to stretch his purse strings, as he that is not, when he shal see another man to give her that, which he would not allow himself. And even now yee see how openly in the street (unhamefaced as they be) they are in hand with other womens husbands, yea and that which more is, they keepe an intreating for to casse the law, and for the favour of their voices only. For of some they have got the good will no doubt already, whiles themselves wil not be intreated, but draw miserie upon thee, upon thy state, and upon thy children. Wel, let the law once cease to set down a gage & proportion of thy wives expences, and never thinke to have remedie, and to staie the same of thy selfe with all thou canst do. Be not deceived sirs, to thinke that the world will be ever againe at the same passe, as it was before this law took place. And as it is a safer course and lesse dangerous to let a naughtie and obnoxious person alone, that he be not called into question at all; than after he is once accused to suffer him to be quit and goe away unpunished: even so this excessive superfluitie, would have bene more tollerable, if it had not bene medled and tempered withall, than it will be now upon the very binding and curbing thereof: much like a wild and savage beast let loose after it hath bene tyed up a time, and so made more fell and angrie. To conclude therefore, of this opinion am I, that of no hand the law Oppia be repealed: and so I pray all the gods to vouchsafe for to blesse and turne to good, whatsoever you doe or go about. VVhen he had thus said, those Tribunes also of the Commons, who openly promised and protested to oppose themselves, and to crosse the repealing of the law, made some brieve speeches to the same effect. Then L. Valerius rose up to maintaine the bill by him proposed for the revoking of that law, and spake as followeth.

If privat men had stepped forth and advanced forward either to approve and perswade, or to reject and dissuade, that which by us is proposed, I my selfe also without opening my mouth would have attended your will & expected the deliverie of your suffrages, as thinking it had bene sufficiently debated & discoursed already, whatsoever might be said for both parties. But now sith that the Consull M. Porcius Cato, a man of so great reputation and gravitie, not only by his countenance and authoritie, (which alone without any word at all spoken had been important enough and effectually) but also in a long premeditate Oration framed with much studie and forethinking, hath impugned and inveighed against our proposed ordinance, I must of necessity answer him againe as briefly as I can. VVho nevertheless hath spent more words in reproving and chastising the matrons and dames of the citie, than he hath bestowed reason to the purpose in dissuading our new law: and all verily for this intent, that he might leave it doubtful, whether the women had done that which he blamed them for, as induced by their own motives, or seduced by us and our suggestions. As for me, the protection directly of the cause I will take in hand, and not busie and trouble my head in defence of our persons, against whome the Consull hath rather glaunced and girded at, by way of big words, than charged indeed by sound reasons. It hath pleased him to call this, An assembly and mutinous meeting: yea and otherwhiles he tearemeth it, An insurrection and secession of women: because the wives in open place intreated you to repeale that law, now in time of peace, in the flourishing and blessed state of the Commonweale, which during those troublesome daies of war, had bene enacted against them. I wrote full well, that both these words and other besides are verie significant, sought out, and picked for the nones, to enforce and aggravate the matter. And we all know, that M. Cato is an Oratour not onely grave and earnest, but otherwhiles also fell, sharpe, and bitter, how ever otherwise by natural disposition he be of a mild spirit and courteous enough. But to the point. VVhat new and strange thing is this that our wives have done, in comming abroad and assembling themselves in companies, about a matter that so much concerneth and importeth themselves? VVhat? were they never seene before now, abroad in open street? I will take the paines, o Cato, to turne over your own booke of Originals against your selfe. Listen and marke how often they have done the semblable, and alwaies truly for the common good and benefit of the State. And first and foremost, in the verie beginning and infancie of this citie, even in the reigne of king Romulus, when the Capitoll-keepe was taken and held by the Sabines; when in the midst of the Common place, they were raunged in battell array and readie to fight a bloudiefield, was not the quarrell ended and the conflict stayed by the dames and wives that ran in, and put themselves betweene the two armies? After the KK were driven out and expelled, VVhat happened then? VVhen as the legions of the Volsciens under the conduct of Coriolanus Martius incamped within five miles of Rome, were they not the matrones of the citie that turned backe this armie, which which doubtlesse would have forced our citie and put it to ranfacke? And is not this likewise as true, that when the Gaules were possessed of Rome and masters thereof, the dames of the citie and none but they, even by the consent of all men, came forth into the open streets, made a contribution, and laid downe that gold which paid for the ranfome and redemption of the citie? No longer since than in the last Punicke warre (because I will not stand so much upon antiquities) was it not thus, that not onely when the citie was at a fault for money, the widowes stockes supplied the want of the common treasure? but also at what time as we were driven to seeke for new gods, and to send for them as farre off to succor us in our extremities; all the wives and matrons of the citie went to the sea side for to receive the goddesse Mother Ides? The occasions (quothe he) are different, and the case is not alike. Neither is it my purpose or any part of my meaning to compare causes, and to proove they are all one. This onely I stand upon, and take it sufficient to excuse and cleere the women, for bringing up no strange noveltie, in that they shewed themselves in open place. To proceed therefore: seeing that no man made any wonder then, of that which women did in undertaking the affaires that concerned all alike as well men as women: marvaile we now that they doe the semblable, in a cause that properly and peculiarly pertaineth to themselves? And what great thing was it they did? Now in good faith wee are too coy and squeamish of our hearing, and our eares over nice and delicate, if when masters disdaine not to heare the praiers of their servants and slaves, we come to give eare to the requests of ladies and dames of honor. But now I come to the matter in question, in regard whereof the Consull his Oration consisted in two points. For first, hee took it verie ill, that any law at all once enacted should be revoked: and secondly he stood upon this, that above all others the law devised and made for repressing the superfluous ornaments and attire of women, should remaine in force for ever. So it should seeme, that the first part (a common defence as it were, of all the lawes) was a speech besitting the place and person of a Consull: but the other against the exceeding pompe of women, more properly became a man (as himselfe) of most severe life and precise carriage. And therefore it is great doubt and to be feared, least wee should seduce you into some errour, if we lay not downe and shew plainly the vanitie and defect both in the one & in the other. For as I confesse, that of those lawes which are devised and established not for a time and by occasion of some particular occurrence, but for ever and to the perpetual good of a citie, none ought to be abolished; unlesse it be so that by use and experience the same be checked and found hurtfull, or by some change of the State become needlesse and superfluous: so I see evidently, that those statutes and ordinances which are brought in to fit and serve some seasons, are mortall (if I may so say) and mutable with the times. And oftentimes wee see, that warre disclaimeth those lawes which peace proclaimeth; and peace pulleth downe that which warre set up: like as in the government and rule of a ship, one thing is requisite in faire weather and calme sea; another in foule and troublesome tempests. These things thus being in nature divers and distinct, let us consider I pray you, of whether sort is this law that now we are in hand to revoke. VVhat? is it one of the auncient and royall lawes made by the kings, and equall in time with the foundation of our citie? or (that which is the next in time and authoritie) was it set downe and writen in the twelve tables by the Decemvirs, created for purpose to devise and make lawes? Is it of that nature without the which as our ancestors were of opinion, that the honestie and honour of matrons could not be preserved: so we are to feare likewise, least by the repealing thereof, wee overthrow the modestie, chastitie, and integritie of married women? VVhy? who knoweth not that this is a new law of twentie yeeres standing and continuance and no more, made whiles Q. Fabius and Titus Sempronius were Consuls? And seeing that without it, wives lived so many yeeres before in good name and fame and in passing good order: tell me what danger can ensue, and why wee need to feare least if it bee annulled, they should break out to all looseness and disorder. Mary, if this law had bene made at first, to gage the wantonnesse of women; beleeeve me then it were greatly to be doubted, that the putting downe thereof, would stirre them up againe to their former outrage. But to what end it was devised, the time it selfe is able to shew and testifie. Anniball: being in Italie, had woon a victorie at Cannae: he was now master of Tarentum, lord of Arpi, and possessed of Capua: every houre men looked when hee would march forward and advance his ensignes against Rome: our allies were revolted and gone: souldiours wee had no more of our owne to supply and make up the decayed bands: no mariners and sea servitours could we find for the maintenance of our Ar-

made: all our treasure in the citie chamber was spent and consumed. Driven we were to this exigent, as to take up bondslaves for to serve in warres, and to buy them of their maisters for day, yea, and to make payment of their price after the warre was ended. For want of money al- so the Publicanes and Farmours of our domaine and publicke profites, undertooke to serve the armie with corne, and to furnish us with all things needfull for warre at a certaine price, and gave us the like day and time of payment. The gally slaves that served at the oare we found and maintained with our own proper & privat charges; & a rate and proportion was set down according to our revenues and worth in the subsidie booke, what number every one should bee charged with. All the gold and silver that wee had in private we brought forth in commune, and the Senators themselves led the way first, and gave good ensample. The widdowes and orphane children brought in their stockes of money to the citie chamber. Streight order was given, that wee should not have in our houses either of gold or silver, wrought in plate or otherwise above so much, nor of silver and brasse in coine and currant money beyond a certaine proportion limited. At such a time, our dames (belike) were set all upon their braveries, pruning, trimming, and tricking themselves, in such sort, as the law Oppia must needs be devised, there was no other remedie to keepe downe their excessive pride and superfluous expence in their attire and ornaments: even then, I say, when by occasion that the solemne feast and sacrifice of Ceres was discontinued, by reason of the generall mourning and heave cheare of all the wives of the citie, the Senate was faine to take order, that they should finish and end their forrowfull mourning within thirtie daies. Who is so blind that seeth not, how in regard onely of the povertie and extreme calamitie of the citie, and because all the monies of private persons should bee converted into a common stocke, and for a publicke use, this law was first framed, drawne, and set down, so long onely to stand in strength and vertue, as the cause of penning and writing it should endure and continue? For otherwise, if those acts and decrees of the Senat, if those orders and ordinances of the Commons, respective unto that present time, should bee in force, and observed for ever; Why make we payment of the loane money unto private men? Why doe wee let and to term let our commodities, our customes and revenues of the citie, unto farmers for readie rent? Why put we forth our publick works for present money paid downe upon the naile? Wherefore buy we not slaves to serve in our warres? Lastly why are we not put to find mariners and oarmen, at our owne proper charges, as then we did? All other estates and degrees, all men els, of what calling soever, feele a great change in the state of the citie, from woe to weale, from adversitie to prosperitie; and shall our wives onely misse the good thereof, and not once tast nor enjoy the fruits of peace, and publick repose and tranquillitie? Shall we that are men, be in purple & scarlet? Shall we wear our embrodered gowns and robes when we are magistrats? Shall we put on our rich amyces and copes, when we exercise the function and ministerie of the high priests? Shall our children goe in their side garments, purfuled afore with purple? Shall wee permit and privileged the head officers and magistrats in our Colonies and Burrough townes? nay, shall we suffer here at Rome the maisters and constables of every parish, the meaneft and basest officers of all other to weare embrodered gowns, and studded with purple? and not only so, for to grace and credit themselves, with these goodly ornaments and badges of worship and honour during their life, but also after their death, the same to bee burhed and buried with them? And shall wee debarre and forbid our women onely to use purple and skarlet in their apparell? And when you the husband may have purple and skarlet, carpets, counterpointes, and footclothes, what reason is there to denie your wife, the mistresse of the house, a gowne or mantle of the same? And shall your horse bee attrapped and barbed more richly, and better set out with his capparison, than your wife attired in her apparrell? But in truth, for purple and scarlet, which are the worse for the wearing, and waxeth bare, me thinks I see some reason, such as it is (although it be very hard) of sparing and restraint: marie for gold, wherein little or nothing is lost but the fashion and workmanship, what niggardise, what miserie is this, to make spare of it, and to denie it them: Nay, I dare avow and abide by it, there is great benefit and use thereof in time of extremitie: and it may helpe at a pinch both in publick affairs, and in private occasions, as ye have found by good experience. But Cato said moreover, There would bee no emulation and envie betwene this good wife and that, if neither one nor other were allowed that libertie of apparell and ornaments. True it is, but in steed thereof they all are mightily discontented and grieved at the heart in the meane while, disdaining to see the wives of our allies of the Latine name and

A nation, permitted to weare those ornaments which they are forbidden to have, to see them, I say, all gorgeously set out with spangles and jewels of gold, clad in their purple and skarlet clothes, riding in their coaches all over their cities, whiles they at Rome take pains to go afoot on their ten toes, as if the State of the Empire were seated in their townes, and not in this their owne citie of Rome. This indignitie were ynough to wound the hearts of men, & make them bleed; what hurt doth it then, thinke you, to sille women, whome small matters, God wor, are wont to trouble? Alas poore soules: no magistracie and place of government in State, no sacerdotal dignities in the church, no triumphes, no ornaments and titles of honour, are they capable of, no gifts, no spoiles and prizes gotten in warres, can fall to their shares. Neatnesse and finenesse, gay garments, trim attire, and gorgeous habiliments, are the honour and ornaments of women: in it they take delight, on it they set their hearts, of it they make their joy. And therefore well have our ancestors called all furniture for the decking of women [Mundus Muliebris]. What lay they off in time of forrow & mourning, but their gold & purple? what put they on & resume again, when their mourning is past, but their gold & purple? what hang they on them besides in time of publick joy and solemne processions, but their better apparell, their richest attire & most costly ornaments? But peradventure, after ye have once repealed the law Oppia, it will not be in your power to overrule them, if happily you should forbid them to wear any thing, that now the law restraineth them of. And perhaps some shal have more ado with their daughters, their wives, & sisters, & find them lesse tractable and pliable unto their minds, than now they are. Never fear that women cannot shake off their obedience, so long as their governours (be they fathers, husbands, or brethren) are alive; nay, of all other things they abhor & cannot brook to be at their own libertie, when it commeth by the death either of husbands or parents: Widdows state and Orphans life, they may not abide. Be sure therefore, they had leifer have their ornaments and attire to be at the disposition of your selves, than of the law. And therefore, to speake a truth, you must in equity and reason protect and defend them in kindnesse, and not oppresse them with hardnesse and bondage: delight ye must to be called their fathers and husbands, rather than their lords and masters. It pleased the Consull erewhile to give them hard words and odious tearmes, calling this their meeting, A mutinie of women, and a very insurrection and departure of theirs: and daunger there is, no doubt, least being up once, they will seize upon the mount Sacer, as sometimes the Commons did in their furious anger, or els possesse themselves of the Aventine, and there encampe and keepe an hold. Well, this weake and feeble sexe, borne to beare, must suffer and endure whatsoever ye shall ordain & set down against them. But take this withall at the loose for a final conclusion, that the greater power & authoritie ye have over them, the more discretion and moderation ye ought to use in that soveraintie of yours. After debate of words passed in this wise, in favor and disfavor of the law, the day following the women flocked in greater multitudes into the open streets, and banding themselves together, as it were, in one troupe, they beset the dores and houses of the Bruti, who by interposing themselves, had hindered and crossed the bill presented by their fellow Tribunes: and never gave they over to keepe this stur, untill those Tribunes flaked in their opposition, for to inhibit the same. Which done, there was no doubt then, but all the tribes with one voice would abrogate and abolish that law. Thus twentie yeeres after the enacting thereof, it was repealed and annulled.

M. Percius Cato after the abrogation of the law Oppia, presently departed with a fleet of five and twentie gallies, whereof five were set out by Allies, and arrived in the port of * Luna, to which place hee commaunded his forces to assemble: and after by vertue of an edict sent out along the sea coast, he had gathered together vessels of all sorts as he closed from Luna; and proclaimed that they should all follow after him to the port of Pyreneus, from whence hee purposed to set forth against the enemie, with an Armada of many saile, and well appointed. Who having passed beyond the mountaines of Liguria and the gulfes of Gaule, arrived and met all together, at the day and place appointed. From thence they came against * Rhoda, where they expelled the Spanish garrison that held the fortresse. From Rhoda with a good gale of wind, they sailed to Emporiae, Where, all the whole armie, excepting the mariners, were set a land. At the same time Emporiae were two townes, seperate one from the other by a wall. The one of them was inhabited by Greekes, who came from Phocæa, from whence the Massilians also are descended: the other was possessed by Spaniards. But the Greeke towne lieth out into the sea, so as the whole compass of the wall is not halfe a mile about: but the Spanish towne seated farther into the land, and devided from the sea, is defended with a wall three miles G in circuit. A third sort of Romane inhabitants were joynd unto them by * Cæsar the Emperour of famous memorie, after he had vanquished Pompey: children. And at this day, they are confu-ted and medled one with another, and become one entier bodie, by reason that first the Span-yards, and afterward the Greekes, were made free denizens of the cite of Rome. A man might well meruaile, seeing how open they lye of the one side to the maine sea, how exposed they are on the other side to the danger of the Spaniards, a nation so fierce and warlike, what thing it was that garded and protected them? Discipline it was and good government, and nothing els, which maintained and preserved them in that weakenes of theirs; discipline I say, which is ever best interteined of them, who live in feare of the mightier that are round about them. One quarter of the wall looking to the fields, is passing strong and exceeding well fortified, having but H one gate in all that side; which ordinarily is alwayes warded by one of the Magistrates. In the night, one third part usually of the citizens kept watch upon the walls. And this watch they maintained not for custome and fashion, nor by vertue of any law: but they performed it with as great care, yea and went the round and saw to the sentinels with as much diligence, as if the enemies were hard at gates. A Spaniard came not within the cite; neither went they forth themselves, unlesse it were upon just occasion. But on the sea side the issue was open for any man at his pleasure. By that gate which turneth toward the Spanish towne, they never used to go forth but in great number, even a third part welneere of the townesmen, and those who the night before had watched upon the walls. And this cause induced them to go abroad, for that the Spaniards being no men at sea, gladly would traffike and trade with them: willingly buying of I them their strange merchandise from forein parts brought in by ships: and venting unto them again their land commodities and fruits arising of the maine. The desire of this mutuall commerce and necessarie intercoure was the cause, that the Spanish towne was open to the Greekes.

And in greater safetie and securitie they were also, by reason that they were shadowed under the wing of the Romane amitie, which they interteined with as great loyaltie as the Massilians, although they were nothing so mightie and puissant. And even at this time they received the Consull and his armie with great courtesie and liberalitie. Cato sojourned there some few daies, whiles he was advertised by his espials where his enemies abode, and what their forces were: and because he would not be idle whiles he stayed there, he bestowed all that time in training and exercising his souldiours. It hapned to be that season of the yeere, when the Spaniards had K their corne within their granges readie for the thrashing floore, whereupon he forbade the come-purveours to provide graine, and sent them home to Rome. Warre, saith he, I shall feede and mainteine it selfe. Being departed from * Emporia, he wasted and burnt the territorie of the enemies, forced them to run away in every place where he came, and put them in exceeding fright.

At the same time, as M. Helvius departed out of the farther province of Spaine with 6000 garison souldiours delivered unto him by the Pretour, he was encountered by a great armie of the Celtiberians, before the towne Illiturgum. Valerius writeth, that they were twentiethousand strong: that twelve thousand of them were slaine, the towne Illiturgum woon againe, and all above fourteene yeeres of age put to the sword. From thence Helvius marched to the camp of L Cato: and because the country was cleere from enemies, he sent back the garison into the nether Spaine, and took his journey to Rome, where he entred the cite Ouant in pety triumph, for the happie successe atchieved in his affaires. He brought into the treasure, of silver in bullion or Ingots, 14732 pound weight: of silver coine 17023 bigate peeces: and of Oscan silver 12038 pound weight. The cause why the Senate denied him full triumph, was this; for that he warred under the conduct and name of another, and not in his owne province. But it was two yeeres before he returned, by reason that the yeere betwene he was stayed there, lying sick of a long and grievous disease, and put over his government to Qu. Minutius his successor.
Whereupon Helvius likewise entred the cite of Rome in that manner of triumph, two moneths only before his successor Qu. Minutius triumphed. He likewise brought into the chamber of the cite 34800 pound weight of silver in masse: of bigates in coine 78000: of Oscan silver M 278000 pound.

All this while the Consull lay encamped in Spaine not farre from Emporia. Thither repaired unto him from Bithages a prince of the Ilergetes, three embassadors, whereof his sonne was one: complaining that their forts were assailed by force of armes, and they had no other hope

A hope to make resistance, unlesse they might have a gard of Romane souldiours to defend them, and 5000 say they will be sufficient: for never would the enemies abide by it if such a power came against them. The Consull answered them and said, that he had a feeling and compassion of the perill or feare (whether it was) wherein they stood: howbeit, he was not at that time furnished with such forces, that he might safely spare so many out of his maine armie, thereby to dis-member the same and to empaire his strength, considering a mightie hoart of his enemies was not far off, with whom he looked every day, and he knew not how soone, to joyne battaile in open field with banner displaid. The embassadors hearing this, fell downe prostrate at the Consuls feete, and shed teares, humbly beseeching him not to forsake them in this piteous plight. For whither (say they) shal we go, if we be repulsd from the Romanes? No allies we have besides, nor other hope in all the world. This danger we might have avoided well enough, if we would have bene false and disloyall; if we would have banded and rebelled with other Spaniards: but no menaces, no terrors presented unto us, could drive us to renounce our fealtie, hoping alwaies that we should have help and succour enough from the Romanes: but now if no meede, if no re-liefe come from thence; if we be denied at the Consuls hand, heaven and earth we call to witnes, that we must be forced, full against our wills and upon meere necessitie, to revolt from the Ro-manes, for feare we drinke of the same cup that the Saguntines have done afore us: and choose we wil to dye with the rest of the Spaniards for companie, rather than perish alone by our selves.
So for that day they were dismissed without other answer. But all the night following, the Consull was much distracted in mind, and carefull in both respects. Unwilling he was to cast off his allies C and see them destitute; and as unwilling again to breake his armie: considering that in so doing, he might either delay the opportunitee of giving battaile, or endanger himselfe in the very instant of conflict. But at length he resolved, in no wise to diminish his owne forces; doubting least in the meane while he should receive some dishonor at the enemies hand. As for his associates, he thought it best to interteine them with good hopes, for want of better helps; considering that oftentimes and especially in war, outward semblances and vaine shewes, are held and taken for truth and substance, and serve the turne well enough: and when a man is thoroughly perswaded that he hath aid and succour, the very trust and confidence thereof hath ministered hart to give the venture of some exploit, and preserved him as well as the thing it selfe. The next morrow he delivered this answer unto the embassadors, That albeir he feared to abate his own strength, in serving other mens turne with any part of his forces, yet he had at this present more regard of their D occasions and dangerous estate than of his own. Whereupon he gave commandement, that a third part of all his bands and companies should have warning to bake and dresse viands with all speed, for to bestow & lay in the ships; and streightly he charged, that they should be rigged and ready appointed against the third day: and willed withall, two of the embassadors to report so much to Bithages and the Ilergetes. As for the yong prince his sonne, he detained stil with him, used him graciously, and bestowed favours & rich gifts upon him bounteously. The embassadors tooke not their leave nor departed, before they saw the souldiers embarked: and thus by making relaion hereof, as a thing assured and past all peradventure, they filled the heads not of their own friends only, but also of the enemies, with the bruit of Romane aids comming neere at hand.
E The Consull now, when hee had set this countenance of the matter, and made sufficient semblance to serve his purpose, gave order that the souldiers should be disbarked again & set a land: and himselfe seeing now that the time of the yeere approached commodious for action and execution of martiall affaires, dislodged and remooved his standing winter campe within a mile of Emporia. From whence (as any occasions and opportunities were presented) he led forth his souldiers a foraging and boothaling into the enemies land, sometime one way and sometime another, leaving alwaies a competent guard to defend the campe. Ordinarily their manner was to steale out by night, to the intent, that both they might go on still farther from their leage, and also surprise the enemies at unawares and unprovided: by which meanes not onely his new and raw souldiers were exercised, but also many of his enemies were caught up and came short home: F whereupon they durst no more peepe out of their forts and holds of defence. Now after he had made sufficient proove of the hearts as well of his owne men as of his enemies, he commanded all the marshals, colonels, horsemen, and centurions, to assemble before him: and unto them he made this speech. The time (quoth he) is now come, that you so often have wished for; in which you may shew at full your vertue and valour. Your service hitherto hath beene more like the manner of forraiers than warriours: but now shall ye come to a maine battaile, and as enemies, fight hand to hand with professed enemies. From henceforth you may if you will, not waste their fields onely and spoile their territorie, but ranfacke the pillage of rich and wealthie cities. Our fathers before us and auncestours in times past, when as in Spaine there were both Generals and armies of Carthaginians, having themselves no leaders and commanders, no soldiers and forces there, yet would they needs have this article among others capitulated in the accord and composition with the Spaniards, That the river of Iberus should limit their feignorie and dominion. Now at this day, when two Pretours and a Consull, when three entire Romanie armies have the government and charge of Spaine; now, I say, after ten yeeres space almost, wherein no Carthaginians have set foot and been seene in all these quarters of both provinces, we have lost our feignorie on this side Iberus. This must yee recover and win againe by force of armes, by manhood and valiancie: yee must I say, compell this nation, morerash and inconsiderate in rebelling, than constant and resolute in maintaining warre, for to receive once more the yoke of subjection, which they have shaken from off their neckes. Having exhorted and encouraged them in this manner, he gave them to understand, that he would set forward in the night and lead against the enemies campe. And so he let them depart to refresh their bodies. At midnight, after he had devoutly taken with him the signes and approbations of the birds for his better speed, he put himselfe in his journey: & because he might be seized of some place to his liking before the enemies should descrie him, hee set a compassse in his march, and led his souldiours cleane beyond their campe. And having by day light set his companies in battell array, he sent out three cohorts, even close to the rampier and trench of the enemye. The barbarous people wondering to see the Romans shew themselves behind at their backe, ran too and fro to take armes. Meane while, the Consull held his men with these and such like speeches: My souldiours (quoth he) there is no other hope now left, but in cleane strength and valour, and I of verie purpose have wrought it so. Betweene us and our campe the enemies are encamped all: behind at our backe we have our enemies land. The bravest courses are ever safest, namely, to build and ground our hope surely upon vertue. And herewithall hee gave order, that the cohorts aforesaid should retire of purpose to traine forth the barbarous people, by making semblance of retreat and flight. And so fell it out in verie deed as he thought and supposed: for they imagining that the Romanes for verie feare were retired, issued forth by heapes out of the gate, and bespred with armed men all the ground, that lay betweene their owne campe and the enemies battell. And whiles they made great hast to embattell themselves, the Consull who was already arranged in battell ray, & in all respects well appointed, charged upon them before they were marshalled and set in order. First he put forth the cornets and wings of horsemen from both points and flanks of the battaile: but they of the right side were straightwaies repulsed, and by their hastie and fearefull reculing, caused the footmen also to be mightily affraid. Which the Consull perceiving, he commaunded two elect cohorts of footmen to wheele about the right flanke of the enemies, and to shew themselves at their backes before the other companies of foot encountered and charged one another. This sodaine terror affrighted the enemies, but set all upright again and recovered the battaile of the Romans, which through the feare of the Cavalierie began to shrink and goe downe. Howbeit the horsemen and footmen both of the right point, were so troubled and so farre out of order, that the Consull was forced to plucke some of them backe with his owne hand, and turnethem with their faces affront the enemye. Thus all the while that the shot lasted, the skirmish was doubtfull: so as now the Romanes in the medley, had much ado to make head and stand to it in the right side, whereas the fright and flight first began. But on the left and all affront, the barbarous had the worst, and with great horror they looked behind and saw their enemies how they played upon their backs & rested not. After they had done with flinging their iron darts and launcing their fierie javelins, they drew their swords; and herewith began the conflict afresh. They were not wounded now from a farre off by blind chaunce and hap-hazard, they knew not from whence; but foot to foot they stood, and hand to hand they coped and let drive one at another: no hope at all was now but to trust in pure strength and maine force. The Consull seeing his men wearied, encouraged and refreshed them by sending for to relieve and maintaine the fight, certain cohorts out of the rereward. This new battaillon well in heart, and with fresh weapons, charged the enemies toiled and tired: and being raunged in pointed wise like a quoin or wedge, at the first hot onfet brake their arraies: and

A being once disordered, they put them to flight, and in scattering wise they ranne as fast as their legges would carrie them, to their campe. Cato seeing them flie on all hands, mounted on horsebacke and rode himselfe to the second legion which was in the arrereward for supply, and commaunded to advance the standards and ensignes before him, to march apace, and to approach the camp of the enemies for to give an assault. If he espied any one to step out of his rank, he would ride before and rap him with his light javelin that he had in his hand; commaunding the marshals and captaines to chastise him for it. Now was the enemies campe at the point to be assaulted, and the Romanes were with stones, pikes, perches, and all kind of weapons set back and driven from the trench. But when this fresh legion approached neere, then both the assailants were more encouraged, and also the enemies fought more lustily in defence of their rampier. The Consull cast his eye all about him, to spie how to breake in at some place or other where least resistance might be made: and seeing the guard thin about the left gate, thither he conducted the Principals and the Hastati of the second legion: but the corps de guard which warded that gate, was not able to endure their violent charge. The rest on the other side, seeing the enemies within the rampier, abandoned the campe, and flang away their ensignes and weapons. The souldiours of the second legion followed the chase and killed them as they ran away, whiles the other ranfacked and rifled their tents. Valerius Antias writeth, that there were 60000 fell that day upon the edge of the sword. Cato himselfe (that never loved to make the least of his owne praise-worthie acts) saith, there were many slaine; but setteth not downe what number. He is thought to have performed that day three peeces of service worthy of great praise and commendation: first, in that he set a compassse with his armie far from his ships, farre from his campe, and gave battaile in the midst of the enemies, where his men could repose no hope at all but in their owne vertue and valour: secondly, for sending those cohorts behind the enemies to charge upon their backes: and thirdly, for that he caused the second legion to march a great pace under their colours displaid, raunged as they were and ordered in battaile array, for to approach and assaile the gates of the enemies campe, whiles all the rest were disbanded and spred all abroad to pursue the enemye in chase.

After this victorie achieved, he sat not still in rest and repose, but having sounded the retreat and brought his owne souldiours laden with pillage into the campe, he allowed them some few houres for their night sleepe, and led them forth into the territorie of the enemye to forrage and spoile: which was as effectuell to enforce the Spaniard Emporitanes and all their neighbour borderers to yeeld subjection, as the unhappie battell fought the day before. Many also of other cities, which were retired to Emporiae for refuge, rendered themselves to his devotion: whom he entertained all with gracious words, and when he had made them good cheere, bestowing wine and cares plentifully upon them, he sent them home to their owne houses. Then immediately he dislodged and removed his campe. And all the way as he marched with his armie, there resorted embassadours from divers States that yeelded themselves unto him. By that time that hee was come as far as Taracon, all Spaine on this side Iberus, was wholly subdued: and the barbarous people brought in as presents unto the Consull, all the captives and prisoners, as well Romanes as Allies, and namely Latines, who by many and sundrie chaunces had been taken in Spain. The bruit went commonly abroad, that the Consull would lead his power into Turdetania. There was a false alarme likewise given, and spoken it was, That he would visit the mountaineres that lay out of the way. Upon this vaine and headlesse rumour, there were seven forts belonging to the State of the Bergistanes that revolted from him: but the Consull led his armie against them, and without any memorable battell reduced them under obedience. And the Consull his back was no sooner turned, and he gone to Taracon, but they rebelled againe, even before hee was departed from thence in any other expedition. Subdued they were the second time, but they found not the like favour as before, to have pardon: for they were all sold like slaves in ouvert market, under the garland, because they should not thus every while trouble the peace.

In this meane time P. Manlius the Pretour, after he had received the old armie at the hands of Q. Mutius whom he succeeded, and joined thereto the other armie of old souldiours belonging to Appius Claudius, and which were come out of the farther Spaine, he made an expedition into Turdetania. Now these Turdetanes of all other Spaniards are counted to be the worst souldiours, howbeit, in confidence of their great numbers and multitudes, they came forward and encountered the Romane forces. But the men of armes had no sooner charged them, but presently they they were disarmed. As for the footmen, they fought in manner not at all. The old approved soldiers, who knew the enemies very well, and were experienced in feats of armes, made a quick dispatch of this skirmish, and soone put all past peradventure. Howbeit, the warre was not so ended, nor determined in one battell. The Turdetanes levied and waged ten thousand Celtiberians, and so maintained war afresh with forraigne mercenarie forces.

The Consull being stung alreadie with the rebellion of the Turdetanes, and supposing that other cities would doe the like, upon any good occasion and opportunitie, disarmed all the Spaniards on this side Iberus of their armor and munition. Which they took for such an indignitie, that many of them for very melancholie killed themselves: a martial and warlike nation, that thought they were as good be out of the world, as turned out of their armes; and reckoned no life, without their weapons. The Consull having intelligence hercof, commaunded the Senatours of all those cities to repaire unto him: and when they were assembled together, he used this speech unto them. It concerneth you (quoth he) no lesse than us, to give over this rebelling and warring. For never yet to this day have ye entred into the action, but with more losse and damage of Spaniards, than toyle and travell of the Romane armie. To prevent this mischeefe that it should not happen, I suppose one good way it is, to contrive and worke so, that yee might not possibly be able to rebell. Effect this I would faine, by the easiest meane and course of all other. Assist me I pray you herein with your good counsell: I assure you I will not be directed by any advise more willingly, than by that which you your selves shall give mee. When they held their tongues, and would not speake a word, he said unto them againe, that he was content they should pause upon the matter, and consult thereof a few daies. When they were called againe, and kept silence in this second meeting and conference as well as in the former, he made no more adoe, but in one day rased the walls of all their cities: which done, hee went forward against those that hitherto were not come in, nor yielded obedience: and into what quarters soever he came, he received all the States one after another, there bordering and adjoining, into his protection; save onely Segellica, a wealthie citie and of importance, the which he forced with mantelets and rolling pavises, and such like fabrickes. More difficultie in subduing these enemies hee found, than others afore him who first came into Spaine: in this regard, for that in times past the Spaniards at the beginning revolted unto them, as being wearie of the tedious yoke of subjection under the lordly government and tyrannie of the Carthaginians. But Cato had more ado with them now, in that out of libertie and freedome, which they had usurped and beene used to, hee was to vouch them (as it were) bond, and to bring them againe to servitude. Besides, hee found all out of frame and order, whiles some of them were up in armes, others were forced by siege to revolt, as notable to have held out long, unless they had beene rescued and succoured in time. But of this nature and courageous mind was the Consull, that he would himselfe in person be present and manage all affaires, as well those of smallest moment, as also those of greatest weight and consequence: and not onely devise and give direction what was best to be done, but would himselfe set to his hand, and execute most of the exploits and effect them fully. There was not one amongst them all, that he commaunded with more severitie and rigour, than his owne selfe. In living neerely, in spare feeding, in much watching, in painefull travell, he strived to surpass and outgoe the meanest common souldiours. And no priviledge challenged he, no advantage sought he to himselfe in his whole armie above others, but onely honour and soveraigne command.

The Pretor P. Manlius had the more trouble in his war-service, by reason of the Celtiberians, whom (as it hath ben said before) the enemies had levied & hired with their monie. And therefore the Consull being sent unto by the Pretor his letters, led his legions also thither. Being there arrived, (now the Celtiberians and Turdetanes were severally encamped apart one from the other) the Romanes fell presently to maintaine light skirmishes with the Turditanes, and estoones charged their corps de guard: and how rashly and inconsiderately soever they began the game, yet they ever went away winners. As for the Celtiberians, the Consull sent certaine Tribunes or knight marshalls unto them to emparle, giving them in charge to make them an offer and tender unto them the choice of three conditions. First, if they could be content to arraigne themselves to serve under the Romanes, and to receive at their hands double wages to that they bargained for with the Turditanes. Secondly, whether they would be willing to go their waies home under safe conduct and publicke securitie, besides that their siding with the Romane enemies should not be laid to their charge, nor bring them within the compasse of any daunger. Thirdly, ly, if they had more mind to warre, then, that they should set downe sometime and place, when and where they might come to an issue, and trie it out in a set battaile. The Celtiberians required to take a day for to consider better upon these points. So they assembled together in counsell, with great trouble and confusion, by reason that some Turdetanes were thrust in among them; upon which occasion, they might worse grow to any conclusion. Now albeit uncertein it was, whether there would be any warre or peace with the Celtiberians, yet the Romanes gathered their provision out of the territorie and borroughes of their enemies, like as in time of peace: yea and more than that, they entred oftentimes within their fortifications and defences as if there had bene some common traffike and commerce agreed betweene them, by way of private tithes. The Consull seeing he could not draw the enemy to a battaile, first led certaine companies lightly appointed with banners displayed, to raise booties in one quarter of the countrie, which as yet was free, & had not tasted of the wars: but afterwards hearing that all the bag and baggage and other cariage of the Celtiberians was left at Saguntia*, he set forward thither to give an assault to the towne. But seeing that nothing would move and stir them, he paid not onely his owne souldiours their wages, but also the Pretours armie their due, and leaving the maine host in the Pretour his campe, himselfe returned to the river Ebre, accompanied onely with seven cohorts. With these forces, as small as they were, he woon certain towns, and there revolted unto him the Sedetanians, Ausetanians, and Suesetanians. The Lacetanians (a nation living out of the way after a savage manner within the wilds and woods) kept still in armes, not only upon a naturall and inbred wildnesse, but also upon a guiltie conscience, in that whiles the Consull and his armie was employed in the Turdulois warre, they had made suddaine rodes and incursions into the lands of their Allies; and pitifully wasted the same. And therefore the Consull advanced forward to assault their towne, and led against it not onely his owne cohorts and bands, but also the youth of his Allies; who had good cause to be angrie, and to oppose themselves unto them. The towne which they inhabited, lay out in length, but was nothing so wide and large in breadth: and within one halfe mile or lesse, hee pitched downe his ensignes, and planted himselfe. There hee left behind a guard of choise companies, and streightly charged them not to stirre out of that place, before hee came unto them himselfe. The rest of his forces hee led about unto the farther side beyond the towne. Of all the aid-souldiours that he had about him, the greatest number were the youth of the Suesetanians, and those hee commaunded to approach the wall for to give the assault. The Lacetanians, when they took knowledge of their armor & colours, calling to mind how often they had overrun them at their pleasure, & wasted their lands without checke or empeachment, how many and sundrie times they had in raunged battell discomfited and put them to flight, all at once set open the gate, and sallied out upon them. The Suesetanians were so little able to sustaine the forcible charge of their onset, that they hardly could abide their very shout & first crye. The Consull seeing now, that come to passe indeede which he suspected would be so, rode a gallop upon the spur to those said cohorts of his owne that were left on the other side under the towne, and taking them with him in great haist, whiles all the townesmen were spread abroad in following the chase after the Suesetanians, he led them into the towne at a place where there was no noise, no stirring, and not a man to be seene; and made himselfe maister of all; before the Lacetanians were returned backe: but within a while hee received them to mercie upon their submission: who, poore men, had nothing to yeeld and loose but their bare armor and weapons. Immediately he followed the traine of this victorie, and led his forces against the hold or strong towne of Vergium. This was a receptacle and place of safe receipt for certaine rovers and thieves, who from thence used to make many rodes into the peaceable parts of that province. The principal and cheefe person of Vergium quit the place, and betook himselfe unto the Consull, and began to excuse as well himselfe as the townesmen, saying, that the government of the towne and the state thereof lay not in their hands. For why? these robbers after they were once received in among them, seized themselves wholly of that strength, and had all at their command. The Consull willed him to goe home againe, and to devise and forge some likely & probable cause why he had been absent and out of the way, with this charge & direction, that when he saw him approach under the walls, and the robbers aforesaid wholly amused and occupied in defence thereof, then hee should remember to joine with the rest of his part and faction, and be possessed of the forresse and keepe of the towne. This put he in practise and execution accordingly. So whiles the Romanes of one side scaled the walls, and they on the other side had taken the forresse, these barbarians were sodainly at once surprised with a two-fold feare before and behind. The Consull when he had gotten the place into his owne hands, gave order, that all those who were gotten into the castle and held it, should remaine free, themselves and all their kinned, and likewise enjoy their goods. The rest of the Vergetanes he commaunded the Treasurer to sell and make money of them. As for the Rovers, they suffred according to their deserts. After he had set the province in quiet, he laid great tributes and imposts upon the mines of yron and silver: which being once ordeined and established, the whole province grew in wek and riches, every day more than other. For these his exploits atchieved in Spaine, the LL. of the Senat decreed, that there should be a solemne proceffion at Rome, to endure for three dayes.

The same winter, L. Valerius Flaccus the other Consull, fought in Fraunce a set field with the power of the Boians, neere the forest of Litanie, and wan the victorie. And by report, there were eight thousand Gaules there slaine: the rest abandoned the warre, and slippe every one into their owne wickes and villages. The rest of the winter the Consull kept his armie at Placentia and Cremona about the Po, and repaired in these cities whatsoever had bene decayed and demolished during the warres.

The affaires in Italie and Spaine standing in these termes: when T. Quintius had so passed the winter in Greece, that setting aside the Ætoliens (who neither had bene recompensed according to the hope that they conceived of the victorie, nor yet could long time like of repose) all Greece throughout in generall enjoying the blessing of peace and libertie, flourished and maintained their state exceeding well, admiring no lesse the temperance, justice, and moderation of the Romane Generall after victorie, than his valour and prowess in warre: there was an Act of the Senat of Rome brought & presented unto him, importing thus much, That wane was determined against Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians. Which when Quintius had read, he published and proclaimed a generall Diet or Counsell at Corinth against a certein day, when and where all the States associates should assemble by their delegates and ambassadors. Now when there was met together from all parts a frequent number of princes and great personages, in such sort, that the very Ætoliens also were not absent, Quintius used unto them this or the like speech. The Romanes and Greekes have warred against king Philip as yee well know; and as with one mind and common counsell they have so done, so either of them had severall quarrels unto him, and private causes and occasions by themselves to take armes. For Philip had broken the league and amitie with us Romanes, one while by sending aid and maintenance to the Carthaginians our enemies: otherwhiles by assailing our allies in these parts: and to you wards he hath so demeaned himselfe, that albeit we could forget and put up all the wrongs that he hath done unto us, the very injuries that yee have received at his hands, minister sufficient cause unto us to warre against him for your sake. As for this dayes consultation, it respecteth wholly in your selves. For this I propound unto you, Whether your wil is to suffer Argos (which as yee know your selves Nabis the tyrant holdeth) to remaine still under him in obedience: or whether you thinke it meete and reason, that a most noble and auncient citie as it is, seated in the very hart of Greece, should be reduced unto libertie, to enjoy the same condition and state wherein other cities of Peloponnesus and Greece do stand. This consultation I say, as you well see, entierly toucheth you and your good, and concerneth us Romanes no farther than thus, that by the servitude of that one onely citie, wee can not have the full and entier glorie of setting Greece wholly in libertie. But if you regard not the state of that citie, and are not moved with the example thereof and the danger, for feare the contagion of this mischief spread farther: we for our parts are content, and take all in godd worth, and will not set you downe and teach you what to do. Only I require your advise in this point, minding to resolve upon that, which the major part of you shall carry by voyces. After the Romane Generall had ended his speech, all the rest began to deliver their opinions. And when the deputed delegate or agent for the Atheniens had magnified and extolled as highly as possibly he could, the good demerits of the Romanes toward Greece, yeelding them great thanks, that upon their request they had granted their aid against Philip, and without any petition at all, offered their help and succour against Nabis the tyrant; and seemed therewith to be offended and displeased at some, who nevertheless in their talke and speeches found fault and carped at these so great favours and deserts: yea and spake badly of future events, whereas it behoved them rather to acknowledge and confesse how much they were bound and beholden already to the Romanes for good turnes past: it well appeared

A appeared that he pointed out directly the Ætoliens, & girded at them. Whereupon Alexander, a principall and chiefe man of their nation, inveighed first against the Atheniens, who having bene in times past the head captaines and maintainers of freedome, betrayed now the common cause, for love of their owne private flatteries. Moreover he complained that the Achæans, who first served Philip in his warres, and at the last (when they saw him downe the wind and fortune to strowne upon him) fell away like disloyall traitours, and possessed themselves of Corinth to their owne behoofe, practising also to compassse and gaine unto them the citie of Argos. As for the Ætoliens, the first and principall enemies of Philip, and alwayes allies and friends to the Romanes, howsoever they had expressly and precisely covenanted in the league, to enjoy their townes and territories, after Philip was vanquished, were notwithstanding put besides Echinum and Pharsalus. He charged the Romanes with fraud and faiterie, who pretending an outward shew, a vaine title and colour of libertie, held the cities of Chalcis and Demetrias with strong garisons: and yet when Philip made some stay and hasting to withdraw and void from thence his armed guards, they were ever wont to object and say, that Greece would never be in freedom, so long as Chalcis, Demetrias and Corinth were in his hand: and finally he alleadged against them, that under pretense of Argos and Nabis, they sought occasion to remaine still in Greece and keepe their armies there. Let them (quoth he) transport their legions once into Italie, the Ætoliens would then undertake and promise, that Nabis should remove his garison out of Argos, upon composition & with good will, or else they would compell him by force and armes, to be over-ruled by the puissance of all Greece united together in one generall consent.

C By this vaine bable of his, he roused Aristenus first, the Pretor of the Achæans, who spake in this wise. Never will Iupiter Opt. Max. quoth he, and Queene Iuno the patronesse of Argos, suffer that citie to be the recompence or prize betwene the Lacedemonian Tyrant, and these pilling and theiving Ætoliens: to be brought to this hard point and these termes of extremity, as to susteine more miserie and calamity when it is recovered by us, than when it was woun and taken by him. O Quintius, it is not the sea lying between us & them that can defend us from these robbers. What will then become of us, in case they should make themselves a fort and cattle of strength in the mids of Peloponnesus? Nought have they of the Greekes but their language, like as they carie nothing of men but their shape and visage. For looke into their manners, their fashions and behaviour, they are more rude and cruell than any barbarians, nay they are more savage than the most wild and ravenous beasts that be. We beseech you therefore O Romanes, both to recover Argos out of the hands of Nabis, and also to establish the State of Greece in such sort, that ye leave these parts also safe & secure enough from the robberies & theiving hostility of these Ætoliens. The Romane Generall Quintius, seeing them of all sides to blame and rebuke the Ætoliens, said that he would have answered them himselfe, but that he perceived them all so hatefully bent against them, that more needfull it was that they were to be appeased, than farther provoked. And therefore holding himselfe satisfied and contented with that opinion which was conceived of the Romanes and Ætoliens, he said, that he would demand what their pleasure was to advise, concerning the warre against Nabis, unless he rendered Argos to the Achæans? And when they all were of one mind to make warre, he exhorted them to send aids proportionably to the power and strength of each state and citie. To the Ætoliens he sent an embassadour, more to discover and lay open their intention (as it fell out accordingly) than upon any hope he had to obtaine ought at their hands. Unto the Provost Marshalls of the camp, he gave commandement to send for the armie from Elatia.

About this time, when the Embassadours of king Antiochus came unto him to treat about alliance and a league, he answered, That hee could say nothing to them nor determine of that point in the absence of those Delegates above said; and therefore they were to repaire unto the Senat of Rome. Then, himselfe in person prepared to make an expedition and voyage against Argos, with those forces which were brought from Elatia. And when hee was about Cleonæ, Aristenus the Pretor, with 10000 foot of Achæans and 1000 horse met him in the way: and not farre from thence, they joyned both their forces and encamped together. The next day after, they came downe into the plaine of Argos, and chose a place to fortifie and lie in leaguer about foure miles from Argos. Now was Pythagoras the capitaine of the Lacedemonian garison, who had both married the tyrant his daughter, and was his wives brother besides. This Pythagoras against the coming of the Romanes, had fortified with strong guards both the castles castles (for two there are within Argos) and other places, which either had easie access or were suspected. But as he was employed in these provisions and preparations, he could not dissimule and hide the feare which this arrivall and approach of the Romanes strake into him: and beside this forraire terror from without, there happened also an intestine mutinie within. There was one Damocles an Argive, (a young gentleman of more spirit and courage than wisdom and discretion) who at the first by interposing a mutuall and reciprocall oath, had conferred with certaine persons of good sufficiency, about expelling the garrison: but while he studied to strengthen the conspiracie and his owne side, hee was not well assured of their fidelitie, and could not judge which of them were true and which not. As he talked upon a time with his complices, the captaine of the garrison sent for him by one of his guard; whereupon hee perceived, that his complot was revealed: hee exhorted therefore the conspirators that were in the way, to take H armes with him, rather than to die by torture upon the racke: and so with some few about him he marched forward into the market place, crying eisfoones aloud, That as many as loved the safetie of the common-weale should follow him as their head and maintainer of their libertie: but no man moved he with his speech to go after him and take his part; for no hope saw they of any succour at all neere at hand: so farre off were they from making good account of a sure guard of defence. And as hee spake those words, the Lacedemonians were come round about him, and killed both him and his fellowes. After this, were others also apprehended; the more part of them were slaine, and some few cast into prison. A great number the night following, slid downe the wall by ropes, and fled to the Romanes. These assured the Romanes, that if their armie had bene neare the gares, the commotion and conspiracie aforesaid would have taken effect: and in case their campe approached nearer, the Argives would not be in quiet, but make some insurrection: whereupon Quintius sent out the footmen lightly appointed, together with the horsemen; who skirmished with the Lacedemonians about Cylarabis (a publicke schoole and place of exercise about a quarter of a mile out of the citie) who were sallied out at the gate, and without any great difficultie chased them within the towne: and in that verie place where the conflict was, the Romane Generall encamped. One day he spent in escouting an espiall, whether any new trouble and uprore arose among them within the citie. But when hee perceived once that they were all amott for feare, he assembled a counsell to take advise, Whether he were best to give the assault upon Argos, or no? All the heads of Greece (except Aristanus) agreed with one accord, that since there was no other cause of war elsewhere, it should begin there especially. Quintius in no case would like of that course, but willingly he gave eare with evident approbation unto Aristanus, as hee discoursed and reasoned against the general opinion and consent of them all: and over and besides added this of himselfe, That considering the warre was enterprised and taken in hand in the behalfe of the Argives against the tyrant, there was nothing lesse becoming and more without sence, than to leave the enemy himselfe, and to assaile and batter the poore citie of Argos. For his part hee would fight at the head, even against the Lacedemonians and their tyrant, the principall cause of this warre. Then having dissolved the counsell, he sent certaine cohorts lightly appointed to purvey store of graine. As much as could be found ripe in those parts was cut, mowed, & reaped down immediately & laid up: al that was green they trampled under foot and spoiled, that the enemies soon after might have no good thereof. So hee dislodged and remooved from thence, and having passed over the mountaine Parthenius, at three daies end he encamped in the territorie of Carye neare to Tegea. In which place he expected the aids of his allies before hee would invade the territorie of the enemies. From Philip there came a thousand and five hundred Macedonians, and of Thebaisians, fortie horse. The Romane Generall staied not now for succours of men (whereof hee had sufficient and plentie) but for his provision of victuals, which he had commaunded the townes bordering neare hand to furnish him withall. Besides, there came great forces by sea, and met him there: for by this time was Lucius Quintius arrived with fortie saile from Leucas: also eightheene covered ships of Rhodes. And now also was Eumenes the king, about the ylands Cyclades, with ten close hatched and decked ships, thirtie gallions, with other smaller vessels among of sundrie sorts. Likewise M of Lacedemonians that were exiled and banished persons, there were verie many; who, chased and driven out by the oppression and wrongfull dealing of their tyrants, repaired now into the Romane campe, in hope to recover their native country againe. Now a great many had bene expulsed in divers and sundrie ages, since time that the tyrants first usurped rule, and were posses-

A sed of Lacedæmon. The chiefe of these exiled persons was one Agispolis, a man to whome by right of descent and lineage, the inheritance of the kingdome of Lacedæmon appertained. Hee whiles howas but an infant, happened to be expelled by Lycurgus after the death of Cleomenes, who was the first tyrant at Lacedæmon.

The tyrant bestir thus round about with warres threatening both from sea and land, and destitute in manner of all hope, (considering the proportion of his forces to the power of his enemies;) yet nevertheless neglected not to wage war, but levied out of Creta one thousand more (even the chosen flower of all their youth) to the other thousand that he had from thence already. He had besides of mercenarie souldiours three thousand in armes: also ten thousand of his owne subjects and citizens of Lacedæmon, together with those that hee had taken out of the B boroughs and villages in the country. Moreover, he fortified the citie with trench and mure. And that there might arise no trouble and sturre within the towne, he held the spirits of men in awe with feare of sharp and rigoros punishments. And for as much as he could not hope nor imagine that they desired and wished his good and safetie, for that he held some citizens in suspicion and jealousie: after he had brought forth all his forces into the plaine, which they call * Dromos, he commaunded the Lacedemonians to assemble together without any armour and weapons, to an audience; and when they were assembled, hee environed them with his armed guard. And after some few remonstrances by way of a short preamble, Why they ought to hold him excused at such a time, if he feared every thing, and made all sure as well as he could: considering withall, it was expedient even for them also (as many as the present state of the world C might bring in suspicion) to be kept short for being able to execute any attempt, rather than be surprised in the mids of their practises and complots, and so be punished accordingly: even for this cause (quoth hee) I will have certaine persons in safe custodie and durance, untill such time as the tempest be overblown which now is comming. And when the enemies be once repulsed, (from whome lesse daunger there will be, in case domestical treasons may be prevented) then incontinently will I enlarge them and set them at liberty. This said, he commanded the names to be called of fourescore or therabout of the principall of the youth; and as every one of them answered to his name, he clapt him up fast in prison: and the next night following, murdered them every one. After this, certaine flotes (these were they who ever of old time were the Burghers & Villagers, a kind of peasants and country kerns) were acuelled to have intended D to sie unto the enemy and to band with him: who likewise were whipped and scourged throughout all the streets, and then put to death. By the fearefull example of this crueltye, the courages of the common sort were well cooled and abated, yea and so astonied, that they durst not once quetch nor give attempt of any new designments tending to change and alteration. His forces he kept within his strength and places of defence, for neither thought hee himselfe strong enough to enter the field and fight a set battaile, nor durst abandon the citie, seeing the minds of men so wavering, and their affections so unconstant.

Quintius having made his provision and set all things in good order, departed from his standing camp, and the second day came to Sellasia upon the river Oenus: in which very place Antigonus sometime king of the Macedonians, stricke a battell (men say) with Cleomenes the tyrant of the Lacedemonians. And there, having intelligence, that from thence he was to mount up an hard ascent and narrow passage, he set a short compasse through the mountains, having sent before certaine men to levell the ground and make the way even, and so gat into a large and broad port-gate, untill he came to the river Eurotas, which runneth in manner hard under the walls of the citie of Sparta: where, as the Romanes were pitching their tents; even as Quintius himselfe with the horsemen and light vaunt-couriers gone before, the aid-souldiours of the tyrant charged upon them: who looking for nothing lesse, because no man had encountered them al the way as they marched, but passed on in their journey as in a peaceable country, were much troubled and affrighted herewith. This feare of theirs continued a good time, while the horsemen called E unto the footmen, and they againe unto the horsemen; and both the one sort and the other trusted in themselves but little or nothing at all. At length the standards of the legions with their ensignes came forward; and were within sight, and so soon as the companies of the vaanguard advanced forth to fight, they who crewhile terrified others, were driven in fearefull haft themselves into the citie. The Romanes being retired so far from the wall, as that they were without darthot, stood a while raunged in battell array. But after that they saw none of the enemies

came abroad against them, returned to their leaguer. The next day after Quintius took his way G an he marched with his armie in order of battell along the towne side, neere unto the river, hard at the foot of the hill Manalus. The companies of the legionarie footmen led the march in the vanguard, the light footmen and the horsemen followed in the reeward, and flanked the rest.
Nabis kept within the walls his mercenarie souldiours (in whom he reposed greatest confidence) arraunged under their ensignes, and in readinesse to fight, purposing to charge the backe of his enemies. And the arrierguard of the Romanes was not so soone passed by, but they sallied out of the towne at sundrie places at once, with as tumultuous a noise as they made the day before. Ap-pianus Clautus had the leading of the reeward, who having prepared beforehand the hearts of his souldiours, and advertised them to be prest and readie for what occurrent soever might happen, presently turned the ensignes, and set a compasse with the whole armie to make head against H the enemies. Whereupon there ensued a hotte fight which endured a good time, as if two armies had directly encountred one another. In the end, the souldiours of Nabis began to recule and flee: in which flight of theirs they had made lesse halt, and better saved themselves, but that the Achæans who were acquainted well with the ground, and knew the coasts of the countrey, hotely followed the chaie: these made a foule carnage and butcherie among them; and the most part, such as were disperfed here and there in their flight, they disarmed. Then Quintius encamped neere unto Amycla, and having harried and wasted all the territorie round about the cite (which places were well peopled and very pleasant:) when he saw no enemies issue out at the citie gates, he removed his campe hard to the river Eurotas. From whence he made excursions, wasted all the vale lying under the hill Taigetis, and the lands butting and adjoining close I to the sea.

Much about the same time L. Quintius made himselfe maister of the townes, situate on the sea side: some yeelded willingly, others for feare or perforce. And being afterwards advertised, that the towne Gythium served for a place of safe retreat and refuge unto the Lacedæmonians in all their exploits and service at sea, and that the Romanes lay encamped not far from the sea side; hee resolved to assaile it with all forcible meanes. This towne at that time was very strong, well peopled with citizens and other inhabitants, and sufficiently furnished with all warlike provision and munition. And in very good time it fell out, that as Quintius was entred unto this difficult enterprise, king Eumenes and the Rhodian fleet arrived. A mightie number of mariners and sea-servitours, gathered out of three Armadaes, within few daies made and finished all engines and fabrickes, which were to assault a citie so well fortified both by sea and land. Now was K the towne wall broken downe with the undermining of the tortures, now was the wall shaken by the push of the ram, and withall there was one tower that by continuall batterie was overthrowne, and with the fall thereof, all the wall that stood of each side, came tumbling downe & lay along.
 And the Romanes endeavoured at one time to enter the towne, both from the haven (where the passage was more plaine and easie) to the end, that the enemies might abandon the defence of the more open place; and also at the breach made in the wall: and they missed but very little of entrance there where they intended, but the hope they conceived of yeelding the citie, which anone was crossed againe, and turned to nothing, staid their violence and heat of assault. Dexa-gorida and Gorgopas governed the towne then, in equall authoritie. Dexagoridas had dispa- L tched a courtier to the Roman lieutenant, to signifie that hee would betray the towne: and when the time and place of execution of this designement was agreed upon between them, the traitour was killed by Gorgopas: by occasion whereof, the citie was the better defended with more careful heed by him alone; yea, and the assault thereof had been more difficult, but that Timus Quintius came to succour and helpe with foure thousand chosen souldiours. Hee was no sooner discovered with an armie arraunged in battell array from the brow and top of the hill that is not farre distant from the towne; whiles L. Quintius withall from another side followed the assault with his ordinance and artillerie both by sea and land, but Gorgopas then began himselfe to despaire in very deed, and was driven perforce to take that very course, which in another he had punished by death: and upon composition that he might depart and have away with him those fol- M diors which he had in garison, he delivered up the citie to Quintius.

Before that Gythium was rendered, Pythagoras left as capitaine at Argos, leaving the guard and defence of the citie unto the charge of Timocrates of Pellenæ, came with a thousand waged souldiours, and two thousand Argives unto Nabis at Lacedæmon. And Nabis like as at the first arrivall

A arrivall of the Roman fleet, and the surrender withall of the townes standing by the sea side, was much affrighted, so hee had recovered againe some little hope and was well quieted in mind, so long as Gythium held out still, and his garison within the towne kept their owne. But after he heard once, that it also was yeelded unto the Romanes, and lost; seeing no hope left by land side, which was wholly possessed by the enemies, and that he was altogether shut up from the sea, hee thought it best to yeeld unto fortune. And first hee sent an herault into the campe, to know whether the enemies would permit and suffer him to send his ambassadors unto them. Which being granted, Pythagoras repaired unto the Generall with no other charge and commission, but only to request, that the tyrant might parle with the Roman Generall. Hereupon the Councell was assembled: and generally opined it was, that there should be granted unto him a conference; insomuch, as both time and place was agreed upon and appointed. Now when they were come to the hills standing in the midst of that quarter, with some small companies of souldiours attending on either side upon them; they left their cohorts behind them, standing in guard, within the open view and sight of both parts: and then Nabis came downe with a certain chosen guard for his bodie; and Quintius accompanied with his brother, Eumenes the king, Sabellus the Rhodian, and Arifthenus the Pretor of the Achæans, with some few knight marshals and Colonels. And then the tyrant being put to his choise, whether he would speake first, or heare another, began his speech in this wise.

If I could have bethought my selfe (O Quintius, and you all that are here present) and imagined The Oration of what the cause should be, that you either proclaimed or made warre first against me, I would have attended the issue of my fortune with silence. But now I could not have that mastery and C commaund of my selfe to forbear, but that before I perish, I would needs know the reason and cause of my ruine and overthrow. Certes, if ye were such men as the Carthaginians are reported to be (with whom there is no regard of truth, no trust and securitie in covenants of societie and alliance) I would not then marvell at all, if you made small reckoning, and cared but little what measure ye offered unto me. But now, when I behold and advise you well, I see you are Ro-manes, whose manner is to entertaine most duly and precisely the observation of holy rites and divine religion, and the faithfull keeping of humane league and alliance. When I consider and D looke into my selfe, I hope & think verily that I am one, with whom in generall, as well as with the rest of the Lacedæmonians ye are linked by vertue of a most auncient league: and in particular regard of my selfe, a private amitie and societie hath been lately renewed by the warre with Philip.
 But peradventure some man will say, That I have broken and overthrowne the same first, in that I hold the citie of the Argives. And how shall I be able to answer this, and excuse my selfe?
 Shall I plead to the substance of the matter, or to the circumstance of the time? The thing itselfe E presenth unto me a two-fold plea for my defence. For being called by the inhabitants themselves of the citie, who offered the towne unto me, I received it at their hands, and in no wise seized upon it by force: I received it, I say, when it sided and took part with Philip, before it was committed within your league. As for the time, it justifieth and cleareth me also and my doings. For even then when as I was possessed of Argos, I was allied and associate with you in good accord: and in our covenants, we articulated and capitulated to send aids unto you for your warres, and F not to withdraw the garison from Argos. And verily, in this difference and question about Argos, I have the vantage, as well in regard of the equitie of the fact (in that I received a citie not of yours but of your enemies, received it I say, not surprisid by force, but offered and delivered willingly) as also by your owne confession, for that in the conditions of the association agreed be-twene us, ye left Argos free unto me. But it may be that the name of Tyrant hurte me: and some of mine actions condemne me much, and namely, that I set slaves free, and devide lands to the poore commons. As for the name, thus much I am able to answer: that, such as I am, better or worse, still I am the very same man, and no other than I was when you, even you O Quintus entred alliance with me: then, I remember well, I was called King among you: and now I see I am termed a Tyrant. And therefore if I my selfe had changed the title and stile of my dignitie and government, I must have yeelded a reason and account of my levitie and inconstancie: but seeing you have altered it, ye ought to answer for your vanitie. Now as concerning the multitude, so augmented by the enfranchising of slaves; as touching the land also, parted and distributed among the poore and needie; I can mainteine and justifie my doings herein, and protect me under the defence and priviledge of the very time. For all these things, be they as they be, Eccc ij may, may, I had done already, when ye made a league and covenant with me, and received aid at G my hand in the warre against Philip. But in case I had done so at this very present, I stand not upon this, whether I either had offended you or broken your amitie, but thus much I averre, that done I had according to the custome and fashion of our auncestours. And ye must not thinke to square and trie the practise of Lacedæmon according to the rule and squire of your lawes and ordinances. For, to let passe many other things (and needlesse it is to compare particulars:) yee choole your gentlemen or men of armes according to their revenue: according to revenue ye choole likewise the footmen. Your will is that some few should excell in welth and power, and the commons be subject and vassals unto them. Our Law-giver thought not good that the Common-wealth should be ruled by a few, whom you call a Senate; nor that one or two States should excell and have preeminence in the citie; but he thought that in the equalitie of welth H and worship, there would be many more to beare armes for their countrey. I have made a longer discourse I confesse, than the ordinarie and naturall * brevite of our speech in these parts will beare. And I might have knit all up in one word and said, that I had done nothing after I was entred into amitie with you, wherewith you needed to have taken any offence and bene displeased. Then the Romane Generall made answer to these points in this manner. No friendship nor association at all have we made with you, but with Pelops the true and lawfull king of the La-cedæmonians: whereof, I must needs say that the tyrants also who afterwards held the seignorie and soveraigntie of Lacedæmon, have usurped the right, and enjoyed the benefit during the time that we were otherwise employed, and wholly busied, one while in the Punick warres, another while in the Gauls, and evermore in one or other: like as you also have done in this last I Macedonian warre. For what was lesse unfitting and more absurd, than for us who waged warre against Philip for the libertie of Greece, to conclude amitie with a tyrant? and such a tyrant, as of all others that ever have bene is most cruell, most violent and outrageous with his owne subjects? And considering that we were entred into the course and traine of setting all Greece at libertie, albeit you had not possessed your selfe of Argos by covin, nor held the same by force, yet it behooved us to restore Lacedæmon also to her aunient libertie, and to settle her in her owne lawes, whereof erewhile you would seeme to make mention, as if you had followed the steps of Lycurgus. Shall we make care and take the paines to void the garisons of Philip out of Iassus and K Bargilla: and when we have so done, leave to be troden under your feete, Argos and Lacedæ-mon, two most noble cities, the two lights as it were in times past of all Greece; which remaining still in servitude and slavery, might deface the rest of our glorie, and marre the title that we aime at, of Saviours and Deliverers of Greece? But you say, that the Argives friended Philip and tooke his part. We are content well enough, that you should not trouble your selfe, and be angry for our sake. For we know for certain, that this was the fault of two or three persons at most, and not of the whole citie: and we know as well, that it was not agreed in any publick counsell, that you and your garison were sent for and received into the Castle. As for the Thessalians, the Phœceans & Locrians, they sided with Philip, we wor right well, by a generall consent of all: and yet when we enfranchised all Greece besides, we also set them at libertie. What think you then should we do in regard of the Argives, who are innocent for any publick counsell intended against us? You said that you were blamed and charged fore for setting bondslaves free. L No small objections these are, I assure you, nor of little importance. But what are they in comparison of other bad parts and heinous facts, committed by you and your followers day by day, one in the head of another? Graunt but libertie of an Assembly Generall either at Argos or La-cedæmon, wherein the people may speake their minds freely, and what they know by you without empachment: if you would learne the truth indeede, and heare the particulars of a most proud and unsupportable dominion and tyrannie. And to let all old matters go by. What a bloudie massacre committed this sonne in law of yours Pythagoras, even almost within my very sight in Argos? nay, what a carnage and butchery made you your selfe, even when I was welcome within the marches of Lacedæmon? But come on: those persons whom in a generall assembly you caused to be attached, and promised in the presence of all the citizens to keepe them safe M and sure in ward: come on, I say, commaund them to be brought forth now bound as they be; that their poore fathers and mothers may understand they are alive, whom they have mourned for so much, without cause, as if they had bene dead. But you will say, Set case all this be true, what is that to you Romans? Dare you in deede speake out and say so much to those that deliver Greece

The purpose of this chapter.

A Greece and set it free? to those I say, that for the freedome thereof have passed the seas, have warred both by land and sea? And yet all this while (say you) I have not directly and truly wronged you, nor properly infringed and broken your friendship and amitie. No have you? How often would you have me to convince you of the contrary? But I will not use many words and much circumstance, but come to the very catch and point of the matter. What be the things I pray you, wherewith friendship is commonly broken? I take it they are these two especially, namely, if you take my friends for your foes; and joyne your selfe to my enemies. You have done both the one and the other: for you have taken by force and armes Messena, a citie received into our societie and alliance by the very same conditions and covenants that Lacedæmon was; you say our allies, have forced a citie allied unto us. Againe with Philip our enemy, you have not only concluded amitie, but (God save all) contracted alliance and affinity by means of B Philocles a Colonell and commaunder of his: and making warre against us, you have kept the seas all about Malea with your men of warre and rovers: and I thinke I may lately say, you have taken prisoners, and killed more Romane citizens than Philip himselfe. And the whole sea coast of Macedonie hath lesse infested our ships that use to bring provision unto our armies, and bene more safe for passage than the promontorie & cape of Malea. Do you forbeare therefore to make such vaunt of fidelitie: spare you, of all other, to speak of the rights of alliance; and laying off the maske of popular language & civile speech, talke as a tyrant and enemy as you are. Vpon this, C Aristenus dealt with Nabis, one while admonishing & advertising him, another while requesting and intreating him, now that the opportunity was offered, to provide for himselfe and his whole estate: he began to discourse unto him of the Tyrants of all the states confining thereabout one after another by name, who when they had resigned up & laid down their absolute soveraigntie of command, and restored libertie to their subjects, passed their old age among their citizens, not only in repose & securitie, but also in great honor and reputation. These words uttered and heard between them too and fro, the night drew on apace & parted the conference. The morrow after Nabis promised, seeing the Romanes would have it so, to quit the citie Argos, to withdraw his garison from thence, and to deliver again all the captives & fugitive traitors that were under his hands: and if they demanded any more of him, he requested that they would set it downe in writing, that he might consult thereof with his friends. So, both the Tyrant had respit and time graunted to take advise, and also Quintius fate in counsell with the principall heads of D his allies what to do. The most part were of opinion to mainteine the warre still, and to kill the tyrant out of the way; for never would the libertie of Greece be otherwise firme and sure: and better farre had it bene, never to have entred into armes with him, than being once begun, to give it over. And he will, say they, bee greater and more strong hereafter, as if his tyrannicall government were approved, and no doubt he would vouch the people of Rome for author of his unjust rule and dominion, and will induce and incite by his example many in other free States and cities, to lye in wait to worke meanes to overthrow the libertie of citizens, and to bring them into thralldome and bondage. The Generall, of himselfe, was more affected and inclined to peace: for hee saw, that if the enemy were once driven within the walls, there was no way but to lye in siege against the citie, and that would require long tract of time: for as much E as it was not Gytheum (and yet that was betrayed and rendred, and not forced by assault) but Lacedæmon, a most strong towne both for men and munition, that they were to lay siege unto and assault. And whereas the onely hope was, that when they approached with the armie, there might some dissention and sedition have risen among themselves within: now when as they saw the ensignes in manner advanced hard to the citie gates, there was not one that mutined or stirred at all. Hee added moreover and said, That Vilius the Embassadour newly returned from Antiochus, reported, how all was not found there, nor the peace like to continue: and that hee had passed over into Europe with farre greater forces both for land and at sea, than at any time heretofore: and if (quoth hee) the armie should bee wholly employed in the siege of Lacedæmon, what other power have wee to maintaine warre withall against so F puissant and mightie a prince as is Antiochus? These were the remonstrances that openly he gave out; but secretly hee was troubled in mind for feare least a new Consull should come to his successeur, the honour of the victorie of a warre commenced by him, and in good forwardnesse. But when hee perceived that his allies were nothing inclined to his waies, nor withstanding

withstanding all his contradiction and bending to the contrarie, by making semblant that hee now drew with them and was of their mind, he wooed them all to approve his designment and intention. Well, God speed our hand (quoth hee:) let us besiege Lacedæmon since yee will needs have it so: but considering that the laying siege unto cities, is a thing as yee well know, that goeth so slowly forward, and oftentimes maketh the assailants sooner wearie than the defendants: you ought even now to cast this account presently with your selves, that wee must lye all winter long about the walls of Lacedæmon. And were there nothing but travell and perill, that during so long time we were to endure, I would exhort and encourage you to suffer and abide the same, with stout bodies and resolute minds. But besides all that, we must be at great cost and expences about fabricks, engins, and instruments of artillerie, requisite to the assault of so great a citie: we must I say be provided of victuals good store against winter, as well to serve us as you. Be well advised therefore (to the end that you should not sodainly in hast huddle up these matters, or after yee are once entered into the action, give over and abandon it with shame) that yee dispatch your letters aforehand every one to the State wherein hee liueth, and found them to the depth, how their hearts serve them, and what strength and forces they have. Of aids and succours I have enough and to spare: but the more in number we are, the more maintenance shall wee need. At this time the territorie of our enemies hath nothing but bare soile and naked ground: and withall, the winter is coming on apace, all which season, carriage (especially farre off) is combrous and hard. This Oration at the first caused them every one to regard and looke homeward to domesticall difficulties and inconveniences, namely, the idleness, the envie and backbiting of those which tarie at home, against them that are employed in warfare: the common libertie (which causeth men of one societie and communitie hardly to accord and fort together) the publicke want of treasure, and the niggardise of privat persons, when they are to part with any thing out of their owne purses. And therefore suddainly changing their minds, they put to the discretion of the Romane Generall, to doe and determine what hee thought expedient for the good of the people of Rome and their allies. Whereupon Quintius taking the advise onely of his owne lieutenants and Provost-marshals, engrossed these articles and conditions following, according to which, peace should be concluded with the tyrant. Imprimis, That there be a truce made for the tearme of sixe moneths, betwene Nabis and the Romanes, king Eumenes and the Rhodians. Item, That both T. Quintius and Nabis should immediately send Embassadors to Rome, that the peace might be ratified and confirmed by the authoritie of the Senate. Item, That from that day forward, wherein the conditions put downe in writing should be presented unto Nabis, the truce aforesaid should begin. Item, That within ten daies next after ensuing, all the garrisons quit Argos and the rest of the townes within the territorie of the Argives: and then those pieces to be delivered void and free unto the Romanes. Item, That no slave taken captive in warres, belonging either to the king or to any publicke state or privat person, be had away from those townes: and if any before time had beene carried forth, they should be restored againe duly to their right masters. Item, That Nabis should deliver againe those ships that hee had gotten from the maritime cities, and that himselfe have no vessell at all but onely two gallions, and those to have no more than sixe and twentie ores apeece to direct and rule them. Item, That he render all the renegate traitors and captives unto all the cities confederate with the people of Rome, as also make restitution to the Messenians of all their goods againe, that either could be found, or the owners know certainly to be theirs. Item, That he restore to all the banished Lacedæmonians their wives and children; but of the wives, so many onely as would be content to follow their husbands: and that none of them should be compelled against their wills to goe with any exiled person. Item, That to as many mercenarie souldiours of Nabis, as were either gone from him into their owne cities or to the Romanes, all their owne goods should be justly and truly delivered againe. Item, That in the yland of Crete he should not be possessed of any one citie: and looke what cities hee then held, hee yeeld them to the Romanes. Item, That hee enter into alliance with no Candiot nor with any other whatsoever, ne yet make warre with them. Item, That he remove all the garrisons out of all the cities that himselfe had delivered up, and which had surrendered themselves and all they had, under the protection and obedience of the people of Rome, & not molest them neither by himselfe nor any of his. Item, That he build no towne nor castle, either in his owne land or in any other. Item, That for the more assurance of performing these covenants nants, he give five hostages, such as it should please the Romane Generall to chooseth: & namely, his owne sonne for one of them. Last of all, That he make present payment of one hundred talents of silver, and fiftie more yeerely untill the tearme of eight yeeres be run out. These articles engrossed, were sent to Lacedæmon, after the campe was remooved nearer to the citie. But nothing well pleased was the tyrant with any of them. Only hee was wlll apaid, that beyond his hope and expectation, there was no mention at all therein of reducing the exiled persons home into the citie. But that which offended and displeased him most was this, that both shipping was taken from him, and also the maritime port townes: for great commoditie hee gat by the sea, in scouring the coast from the cape of Malea with his pyrats and men of warre: and besides, the youth and able men of those cities, served his turne verie well to furnish and man his ships with the verie best souldiours and men of service that were. And albeit he skanned and considered upon these articles in great secrecie with his friends, yet were they all of them divulged abroad and current in every mans mouth: so vaine are these courtesours commonly and hardly to be trusted, as in all things else, so especially in keeping of secret counsell. These conditions were controlled and found fault with, not so much by all men in generally, as by each one in particular, as they tooke exceptions against those points that touched and concerned themselves. They that had married the wives of the banished, or were possessed of any part of their substance, chafed and stormed thereat, as if they were to loose and forgoe their owne, and not to render and restore the goods of others. The slaves who had been freed by the tyrants, were now not only to loose the benefit of that freedom, but also to endure harder servitude and bondage than aforetime; setting before their eyes how they should returne againe into the houses and hands of their old masters, angrie and incensed now against them. The hyred souldiours were malecontent, for that they saw they should loose their pay after peace concluded: and saw full well, that there was no beefing for them in those states and cities, who hated the tyrants themselves no more than their followers and attendants. At first they muttered and murmured, whispering these things among themselves in their secret meetings and conventicles: afterwards they mutined, and on a suddaine ran and tooke armes. The tyrant seeing the multitude disquieted ynough of themselves with this tumult, assembled the people together. Where, after hee had declared the conditions imposed upon him by the Romanes, and in every article had untruly put to somewhat of his owne devising, to aggravate all matters and make them seeme more greivous and intollerable, at the rehearsing of every particular the whole assemblee one while cried out, and another while the sundrie parts thereof, set up a note of utter dislike. Then hee asked their opinion what answer they would have him to returne unto those articles, and what to do? They all in manner with one voice accorded and said, that there was no answering of the matter, but that he should plainly goe to war, and make no more ado. And that every man for his owne part (as the usuall manner is of a multitude, when they are together) should take a good heart, and hope the best, saying, that Fortune favoureth Fortitude. The tyrant incited with these their words, seconded them himselfe, and assured them that Antiochus and the Aetolians would take their parts and assist them: and if they did not, yet were they strong ynough of themselves, and had sufficient meanes to endure the siege. No more talking now nor thinking of peace, but every man was readie to run in hast to his severall quarter, and stand upon their own guard, without any rest or repose from thenceforth. The Romanes so soon as they saw some few of them to fallie out of the citie, and to discharge their darts among them, were soone put out of all doubt, that no other remedie there was, but they must to warre againe. After this, there passed certaine light skirmishes foure daies together, at first without any assured issue of good speed, either of the one part or the other: but the fift day, after one conflict fought in manner almost of a set battell, certaine Romane souldiours following the chase upon their enemies, and killing them in their flight, entred the citie at certaine void places, where the wall was not united: for in that order were the walls built of that town in those daies. Quintius then verily, having well bridled & tamed by this terror his enemies for making any more excursions, and supposing that ther remained no more, but lustily to go to an assault, sent out certain of purpose for to call the mariners and sea-servitours from Gythæum, whiles himselfe in person, accompanied with the Provost marshals, rode about the walls to view the situation of the citie. This Sparta in times past stood without murage. And the tyrants of late daies had built walles against the open flattes and plaine fields. The higher ground and of harder accesse, they fortified with strong corps de guards of armed souldiours, in steed of bulwarkes of defence. When Quintius had sufficiently considered every corner, hee supposed there was no other way but to invest it round about, and thereupon with all his forces united (which being all together Romane citizens and Latine allies, foot and horse, land souldiours and sea-servitours one with another, amounted to 50000 fighting men) he compassed and environned the cittie. Some brought skaling ladders; some fire, every man one thing or other, not onely to give an assault, but also to terrifie & amaze them: with direction and expresse commaundement, with a loud crie and shout at once in all places to approach the walls, and give the venture upon them; to the end, that the Lacedæmonians, where first to make head against the enemies, and in what place to come with succours. Having therefore divided the whole power of his armie into three parts, hee gave the one of them in charge to assaile that quarter which was called Phœbeum; a second likewise to set upon that which is named Dictynneum, & the third to force the canton Heptagonia; places all lying open and without a wall. The cittie being thus seized on all sides with so great feare, the tyrant moved and troubled to heare those suddaine outcries and fearefull newes brought unto him by hastie messengers: according as any place stood most in daunger, at the first, either presented himselfe in proper person, or else sent some to helpe; but afterwards, seeing the feare so generall, and no one place void of danger, hee was so astonied, that unneath he was able either himselfe to give good direction to others, or to heare theirs. So void was he, and disurnished of advice and counsell, yea, and bereft of his right wits and senses. The Lacedæmonians at first hand sustained the furious violence of the Romanes in the narrow streights and passages, and at one time in diverse places, three armies fought on either side: but afterwards, as the heat of the medlie increased, the service was nothing equal of both parties; for the Lacedæmonians discharged shot, from which the Romane souldiours easily saved themselves, by meanes of their large targuets, and withall much thereof either fell short and besides, or els so feebly flung from them, that little or no harm they could doe. For by reason of the streightnesse of the place, and the multitude so thronged and thrust together, they had not onely no space to take their run, when they should launce their darts (the best meanes of all other to enforce them) but not so much as sure footing, and a ease, to drive and levell them with all their strength. In so much, as of all the darts and javelines which were directly shot afront them, none at all pierced to their bodies, & very few so much as stuck in their bucklers. Marry some happened to be wounded from the higher places, by those that stood neere unto them, and about their sides. And anone as they advanced forward, they chaunced to bee hurt, not onely with arrowes and darts from off the houses, but also with tiles and flates etc they were aware. But afterwards, they covered their heads with their targuets, which they set so close united together one under the other, featherwise, that not onely there was no place of entrance for the darts throwne and cast at randon afar, no nor so much as any roome for a weapon to get betweene, levelled though it were, and aimed neere at hand; so as under this targuetsence they approached neerer and neerer in safetie. At the first the narrow and streight avenues filled with the throng both of themselves and also of the enemies so thrust and crouded together staid them for a while; but afterwards, when they had by little and little gathered upon the enemies, and put them back, and were come into a larger and more spaciouse street of the cittie, then their force and violence could not possibly bee endured any longer. Now when the Lacedæmonians turned their backs, and fled apace to gaine the higher places for their vantage, Nabis verily for his part trembling and quaking, as if the cittie had ben quite lost, looked about him on every side, which way himselfe might escape and save his life. But Pythagoras as in all things else hee performed the devoure and part of a courageous captain, so he was the only cause that the town was not lost: for hee commaunded to set fire on the houses standing next to the wall, which in the minute of an houre burned out on a light flame, as being set forward by the helpe of those, who otherwise were wont to quench the like skarefires: whereupon the houses came rattling and tumbling downe upon the Romanes heads, and not onely the tileshards, but also the timber peeces halfe burnt, fell upon the armed souldiours, the flame spread still farre and neere, & the smoldering smoke put them in feare of more daunger than was. And therefore, as well those Romanes who were without the cittie in the hottest of their assault, reculed from the walls, as also those that were entered already, for feare least by the fire behind them they should be seperated from their fellows, retired themselves. Quintius also seeing how the case stood, caused to sound the retreat, and

A and so being recalled, they returned out of the cittie which they had as good as woon, into the camp. And Quintius conceiving more hope by the feare of the enemies, than of the thing it selfe and the service done, never gave over for three daies to terrifie them, partly by skirmishing, and partly by intrenching and stopping up certeine quarters, that they might have no passage at all to flie and shift for themselves. The tyrant constrained at length with these dangers menaced, sent Pythagoras againe as an Orator unto Quintius. But he at first rejected him, and commaunded him to avant out of the campe: yet in the end, after he had made most humble supplication, and cast himselfe prostrate at his feet, he gave him audience. The beginning of his speech was this, that he yielded all to the discretion and former award of the Romanes. But seeing that he gained nothing thereby, and that his words took no effect, they grew at length to this point, That upon the same capitulations which few daies before were exhibited up in writing, a truce should be made, and hereupon was both the money, and also the hostages received.

Whiles the tyrant was besieged and assailed, there came post upon post to Argos, that Lacedæmon was at the point of being lost: whereupon the Argives tooke such heart and courage unto them (by reason that Pythagoras with the best part of the garison souldiers was departed before out of their towne) that concerning the small number which remained in their fortress, under the leading of one Archippus, they expelled the rest of the garison. As for Timocrates of Pellene their captaine, because hee had behaved himselfe in his charge and government gently & mildly, they sent him away alive with safe conduct. At the very instant of this joyfull occurrence, T. Quintius arrived, after he had granted peace to the tyrant, & sent away from Lacedæmon, Eumenes and the Rhodians, together with L. Quintius his brother to the fleet. The citie of Argos in great joy proclaimed the celebration of their most solemne feast, and those so famous and renowned games and pastimes called Nemea, against the coming of the Romane army and their Generall, which they had forelet upon the ordinarie time and day, by occasion of the troubles of warre. And for the honour of Quintius, they ordained him to bee the overseer of these solemnities. Many things there were to redouble, and increase this their joy and solace to the full. The citizens were reduced from Lacedæmon, whome Pythagoras of late & Nabis aforetime, had carried away. They also were returned home againe who had fled and escaped, after the conspiracie of Pythagoras was detected, & the massacre begun. Now they saw their libertie againe, whereof they had lost the sight a long time: now they beheld the Romans the authors thereof, and who for their sakes were induced to take armes and enterprise the warre with the tyrant. Also, upon the very day of the Nemean games, the libertie of the Argives was published and proclaimed by the voice of the publicke beadle and crier of the cittie. But looke how much joy and hearts content the Achæans conceived in their common and generall counsell of all Achæa, for the restoring of Argos into their auncient freedome, so much troubled they were againe, in regard that Lacedæmon was left still in servitude, and the tyrant so neer unto them readie ever to pricke their sides, whereby their joy was not so sound and entire. But the Aiolians in all their Diets inveighed mightily against this, saying, That the Romanes never gave over the war with Philip before hee had abandoned all the cities of Greece: as for Lacedæmon, it was left still under a tyrant, and in the meane while the lawfull and naturall king who had been in the Roman campe, and all the rest of the noblest citizens should live in exile. For now the people of Rome was become a pensioner to guard the bodie of tyrannising Nabis. Then Quintius brought backe his armie from Argos to Elatia, from whence he departed to the Spartan warre. Some write, that the tyrant when he fought with the Romanes, came not immediately out of the cittie; but that hee was lodged without by himselfe full opposite to the Romane campe: and that after he had made good a long time, expecting the aid of the Aiolians, he was driven in the end to a battaile, by occasion that the Romanes charged upon the foragers and puiveyours of his campe: in which battaile he was vanquished and beaten out of the field, and craved peace, after that fiftene thousand of his men were slaine, and foure thousand taken prisoners, and above.

At one and the same time in a manner, welletters brought both from T. Quintius touching the affaires achieved at Lacedæmon, and also from M. Porcius the Consull, out of Spaine. And by order from the State, there was granted in the name of either of them, a solemne profession to continue three daies, L. Valerius the Consull, after hee had goverened his province in quietnes upon the diffiture of the Bolians about the forest of Lufana, returned to Rome against the generall assembly for election of magistrates, and created Consuls, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Africanus the second time, and T. Sempronius Longus: whose fathers had been Consuls in the first yeere of the second Punick warre. Then the Assembly was holden for the election of Pretours, wherein were chosen P. Cornelius Scipio, and the two Cneij Cornelij, the one Merenda, and the other Blasio: Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus, Sextus Digittus, and T. Iuuentius Talsa. When these elections were finished, the Consull returned againe into his province. That yeere the Ferentines assayed to obtaine a new priviledge: to wit, That as many Latines as were enrolled in any Romane Colonie, should be citizens of Rome. But they of Puteoli, Salernum, and Buxentum, who were coloners and had their names entred there, and by that meanes carying themselves as Romane citizens, were adjudged by the Senat to be no citizens of Rome.

In the beginning of this yeere, wherein P. Scipio Africanus was Consull the second time, with T. Sempronius Longus, two embassadors of Nabis the tyrant, arrived at Rome. For to geve them audience, the Senat assembled together without the citie in the temple of Apollo. Their petition was, That the peace agreed upon with Quintius, might be ratified: and their suite was graunted. When it was moved, as touching the government of the provinces; the Senat (assembled in great frequencie) were all of this opinion, That forasmuch as in Spaine and Macedonie the warre was ended, both Consuls should have the government of Italie. Scipio was of advise, That one Consull was sufficient for Italie, and that the other should be employed in Macedonie. And why? there was cruell warre menaced from king Antiochus: himselfe already was passed over into Europe: And what thinke ye, quoth he, will he then do, when the Aetolians (who doubtlesse are enemies) of one side shall sollicit and call upon him for to warre, and Annibal, a warrior and commander so renowned for the defeatures and overthrowes of the Romanes, shall prick him forward of the other? Whiles they debated thus about the provinces of the Consuls, the Pretours cast lots for their severall governments. The citie jurisdiction fell to Cn. Domitius, the foraine to T. Iuuentius. To P. Cornelius the farther Spaine was allotted, and the hither to Sext. Digittus. Cn. Cornelius Blasio had Sicilie assigned unto him, and Merenda was charged with Sardinia. It was not thought good that a new armie should be transported over into Macedonie. But concluded it was, that the armie there should be brought back by Quintius into Italie, and discharged. Item, That the armie likewise should be casted, which had served under M. Porcius Cato in Spaine. Item, That both Consuls should governe Italie, and leve two legions of citizens to go thither, that when those forces were dismissed and licensed to go home, which it pleased the Senat to set at libertie, there should be eight Romane legions in all, and no more in pay.

In the formeryeere, when M. Porcius and L. Valerius were Consuls, there had bene held a solemnitie of a sacred Spring. But when P. Licinius the high Pontifees made report first to the colledge of the Priests, and by the advise and authoritie of that colledge, unto the LL. of the Counsell, That there was some error committed, and that it was not performed accordingly: the Senatours ordeined, that it should be done againe anew, according to the discretion and direction of the Pontifees aforesaid. Also that the great Romane Plaies, which together with that Spring were vowed, should be exhibited with the accustomed cost & expenses: And that al yong cattaille that fell betweene the kalends of March, and the last day of Aprill, in that yeere wherein P. Cornel. Scipio and T. Sempronius Longus were Consuls, should be accounted as consecrated for that sacred Spring above named. After this, there was an assembly held for the choosung of Censors, wherein were created Sext. Aelius Patrus, and C. Cornelius Cethegus: who elected P. Scipio the Consull, President of the Senate, like as the Censors before them had done. In the survey and review of the whole Senate, they left out and discarded three only, and none of them who had borne office of State, and sit in the yvorie chaire. Great love these Censors woon amongst them of that calling and qualitie, in geving commaundement to the Aediles curule, that at the Romane games and plaies they should set out places apart from the rest of the people for the Senatours to behold the said disports. For aforetime they beheld the sports and pastimes all together, without regard and distinction. Few also of the gentlemen or knights of Rome, had their horses of service taken from them: and rigorously dealt they with no estate and degree. The porch of Libertie, and the hamlet called Ardea publica, were by them repaired and enlarged. The sacred Spring was celebrate; and the games vowed by Serv. Sulpitius the Consull, were by them exhibited. And whiles all men were amused, and their minds occupied thereupon, Q. Plautius who had bene cast in prison for divers and sundrie outrages committed at Locres, to the

A great offence of God and man, had procured certeine persons, who in the night season at one instant should set on fire many places of the citie, to the end that whiles all the people were asfrighted in this night-tumult, he might breake prison and escape. This complot was discovered and reported to the Senate by some of them that were privie and accessarie thereto. And Plautius was let downe into a lower dungeon and there killed.

That yeere were certeine Colonies of Romane citizens conducted to Puteoli, Vulturum, and Linternum, and three hundred men planted in each of them. Likewise Coloners of Romane citizens were brought to Salernum and Buxentum. The Triumvirs who had the placing of them, were T. Sempronius Longus, Consull for the time being; M. Servilius and Q. Minutius Thermus. The territorie of the Campanes was divided among them. Three other also deputed for the like purpose, D. Junius Brutus, M. Babius Tamphilus, and M. Helvius, placed a colonie of Romane citizens in Sipontum, to enjoy the lands of the Arpines. Likewise other colonies of Romane citizens were planted in Tempa and Crotone. The lands belonging to Tempa were woon from the Brutij, who had expelled the Greekes: and the Greekes remained in Crotone. The Triumvirs for Crotone were Cn. Octavius, L. Aemilius Paulus, and C. Platorius: and for Tempa L. Cornel. Merula, and C. Salinius. Also that yeere were seene at Rome divers wonders and prodigious sights: and some were reported from other parts. In the common place, in the publick Hall, Comitium, and Capitoll, were seene certeine drops of blood. And oftentimes it rained earth. The head of Vulcane was on fire. Newes came that at Interamna there ran a streame of milke. Also that at Ariminum, there were two infants both of free condition, borne without eies and nose, and another in the Picene cuntry handlesse and footlesse. These strange tokens were by order given from the chiefe Pontifees, looked unto and expiated, and a Novendiall sacrifice continued for nine daies, because the Adrians brought word, that in their territorie it rained stones.

In Gauls neere to Mediolanum, L. Valerius Flaccus the Proconsull, fought a set field with the french Insubrians and Boians: Which Boians under the conduct of Diomedes passed over the river Padus, for to sollicit and raise the Insulbrians. In which conflict were slaine ten thousand enemies. About the same time his colleague in government M. Porcius Cato triumphed over Spaine. In this triumph he caried in pomp and shew 25000 pound weight of silver in bullion, and in coine 123000 Bigate pieces: of Ocean silver 540 pound weight, and of gold 400000 pound weight. Of the bootie woon from the enemies he dealt among his souldiours that were footmen 270 asses apiece, and triple so much to every man of armes.

T. Sempronius the Consull having put himselfe in his journey toward his province, led first his legions into the Boians cuntry. Boiorix at that time their Prince with his two brethren, having raised the whole nation to rebellion, encamped in certein commodious places: so as it appeared that if the enemy entred their confines, they were readie to give him battaile. The Consull perceiving how strong and confident the enemies were, dispatched a courier to his Colleague, to make hast if he thought so good and come unto him: for untill his coming he would fall off, seeme to retire, and not fight. But the same cause that moved the Consull to stay, gave occasion to the Gauls to make more hast: for besides that the hastening and lingering of the Consull, encouraged the enemies, they were desirous to have the trial of a battaile before the forces of both Consuls were joyned together. Howbeit, for two dayes space they did nothing but stand readie raunged for fight, if any should have come forth to brave and dare them. On the third day they approached the trench and rampier of the Consuls camp, and on every side at once gave the assault. The Consull immediatly commaunded the souldiours to arme. And when they were armed, he kept them in awhile, of intent to increase the foolish confidence in the enemies, and to dispose of his owne forces and give direction, what companies should fall out at every gate. The two legions he commaunded to issue forth under their colors at the two side gates called Principales: but in the very passage withoutforth the Gauls stood thick and made head againe, so that the way was stopped up. A long time they fought in those very streights. And they bestirred themselves no more with their hands and swords, than they pressed one upon another with their bodies and targets: whiles the Romanes strove to advance their ensignes out of the gates, and the Gauls endeavoured no lesse, either to enter themselves within the camp, or else to impeach the Romanes for going forth. But in this conflict there was nothing betweene them either woon or lost, no ground gained the one of the other, before fore that Qu. Victorius a principall Centurion of the Pilani in the second legion, and C. Atinius, a Tribune or Marshall of the fourth, caught the banners from the ensigne-bearers (a thing often practised in time of extremitie) and flang them among the enemies. For whiles these laboured and strained themselves to recover each one a banner, they of the second legion first brake through and gat forth of the gate: so as now, they maintained skirmish without the trench, and the fourth legion stuck still in the gap. By which time, there arose another tumult and noise in the contrarie side of the campe: for the Gaules were broken in at the Questors gate (or the gate against the * Questorium) and slaine those that valiantly made head and held them play; to wit, Lucius Posthumus a treasurer surnamed Tympanus, Marcus Atinius and Publius Sempronius two colonels of the allies, and well neere two hundred souldiours besides. Thus the campe on that part was woon, untill such time as one extraordinarie cohort was sent from the Consull to defend the Questors gate aforesaid: which either slew those that were within the rampier, or else drave them forth, and so withstood those that would have rushed in. And much about that very time, the fourth legion also with two extraordinarie squadrons, brake forth at the gate. Thus at once there were three severall battailes in sundrie places about the campe: and the dissonant cries and noises (according to the divers occasions of each partie ministred by their fellowes) turned and withdrew the minds and spirits of those that were in fight, from the present skirmish before them. In this manner maintained they the medley untill noone; equally matched in strength and number, and little or no ods between them for hope of victorie: but tedious travaile and fouldtering heat compelled the Gaules (whose bodies are soft and open, and soon running to sweat, and who of all other things can least away with thirst) to abandon the battell: and those few that remained behind, the Romans ran upon, ruffled their colours, and chased them into their owne hold. Then the Consull sounded the retreat: at which signall given, the more part retired themselves; but a sort of them, upon a hote desire of fight, and good hope to be masters of their campe, persisted still, close to their trench. The Gaules disdainning their small number, issued all forth out of their campe: and then the Romanes being discomfited, were glad now of themselves for feare and fright, to trudge unto the strength of their owne hold, which they would not retire unto at the commaundement of the Consull. Thus on both sides, there was one while victorie, and another while fearefull flight: howbeit, when all cards were told and the reckoning made, the Gaules had the worst of the game: for of them were slaine eleven thousand, whereas of Romanes there died but five thousand. Then the Gaules retired themselves into the most inward parts of their countrey, and the Consull marched with his legions to Placentia. Some write, that Scipio and his colleague with their joynt forces, invaded and spoiled the countreies of the Boians and Ligurians, so far forth as they could passe for woods and bogs: others againe record, that he, having done no memorable exploit at all, returned to Rome about the assembly for election of Consuls.

The same yeere T. Quintius spent the whole winter season at Elatia (whither he had retired his forces for winter harbour) in hearing mens causes and ministring justice to everyone; also in reforming and redressing all such disorders as had passed in the States and cities, through the licentious government and jurisdiction either of Philip himselfe or his captaines, whiles hee advanced those favorites of his owne faction, and put downe the right and libertie of others. In the beginning of spring he came to Corinth, where he had given summons, that there should be holden a general Diet of the States. There in the assembly of all the ambassadors and agents from the cities, gathered about him as it were to heare an Oration, hee made a speech unto them; beginning first with the amitie contracted betweene the Romanes and Greece: and proceeding to the acts atchieved in Spaine by the Generals afore him, and those also of his owne. All that he spake, was heard and received with great applause, untill he touched the point concerning Nabis: for it was generally thought unfitting, that he undertaking to set all Greece at libertie, had left a tyrant (not onely a grievous oppressour of his owne subjects, but also dangerous to all the cities about him) to remaine still as a fearefull maladic seated in the very bowels and heart of a most noble and renowned State. Quintius not ignorant of their affections and dispositions, confessed, that he should not indeed have given any care at all to the motion or mention of peace with the tyrant, in case that Lacedæmon could have stood in safetie without so doing: but now since that Nabis might not possibly be confounded and overthrowen without the present ruine and fearefull downfall of the citie, he thought it a better course in policie to

A leave the tyrant enfeebled and disurnished of all meanes to offend and hurt any man, thaire to suffer so goodly a citie to die in the cure, and under the hand as it were of the Physician, amidst those quick and sharpe remedies which it were never able to endure: and so in seeking to recover libertie, to perish and die for ever. And after he had discoursed of things past, he intended, that his purpose and intent was, to goe into Italie, and to have away with him his whole armie: also that within ten daies they should heare newes how all the garrisons had quit Deme- trias and Chalcis: and that he would deliver out of hand unto the Achæans in their very fight, the fortresse of Corinth: that all the world may know, whether it be the Romans guise, or the fashion of the Ætolians, to overreach and lie; who in their common talke have not let to discourse, to sow surmises, and to buz into mens heads, that it was dangerous for Greece to put their libertie into the Romans hands: and that they had but made an exchange of their lordly rulers, admitting the Romanes in lieu of the Macedonians. But as for them (quoth he) their tongue is no slander, beeing such persons as never tooke heed and made regard what either they did or said. But the other cities he advertised to weigh their friends by deeds and not by words: to be wise and well advised whome they are to trust, and whome they are to beware of: to use their libertie in measure and moderation; which if it be well attempted and qualified, is good and wholesome to particular persons and generall States: but excessive if it be, it would not only be grievous and unsupportable to others, but also unruly, dangerous, and pernicious to themselves that have it. He gave them counsell, that the princes and States in each citie should maintaine concord not onely among themselves, but also with all other in one communitie: for so long as they accord and agree together, no king nor tyrant should be strong enough for them: whereas discord and sedition maketh overture and openeth easie way to enemies that lie in await for the vantage; considering, that the side which in civill contention is the weaker and goeth to the walls, will band rather with a forrainger, than give place and stoupe to a citizen. In conclusion, he advised them, to keepe and preserve by their carefull regard, this their libertie purchased for them by forrainger forces, and delivered unto them with faithfull securitie of strangers and aliens; that the people of Rome might see, that they have given freedome to well deserving people; and this their great benefit hath bene well bestowed upon worthy persons. While they hearkened to these sage admonitions, as uttered out of the mouth of a verie father, thereares gushed plenteously out of their eyes for kind heart and joy; in so much as they troubled him in the deliverie of the rest of his speech. For a while there was a plausible noise heard among them as they approved his words, and advised one another to ponder these sage sawes, and to imprint them deeply in their hearts, proceeding as it were from divine oracle. After silence made, he requested them to seeke up all those Roman citizens (if haply there were any) who lived in servitude and slavery among them, and within two moneths to send them unto him into Thessalie: for it were a great dilworship and shame even for them, that in their countreies there should remaine in bondage any of those, by whose meanes they themselves were set free and delivered out of bondage. With that, they all cried aloud with one voice, That for this above all the rest they rendred thanks unto him, in that they were admonished and warned by him, to performe their devoir and duty, so honest, so religious, and so necessarie. Now a mighty number there was of captives in the Punick war; such as Annibal (when their friends redeemed them not by raunsome) had sold in open market. And how great the multitude of them was, this may prove and testifie which Polibius writeth; to wit, that this cost the Achæans for their part one hundred talents: and yet they ordained and set downe, that there should but 500 Denarij bee repaid unto their masters for the redemption of every poll: for by this account Achæa had 1200 of them. Adde now unto them as many as all Greece was like to have by that proportion [and see what number may arise.] The assembly was not broken up and dismissed, before they might see the garrison descending from the fortresse of Corinth, who marched directly to the gate and went their waies. The Generall presently followed after, and being accompanied with them all, who called him with a loud voice, Their saviour and redeemer; he tooke his leave and bad them farewell: and so returned the same way he came to Elatia. From thence hee sent his lieutenant Ap. Clandius with all the forces, commaunding him to conduct the armie to Oricum by the way of Thessalie and Epirus, and there to expect and wait his comming: for he purposed there to take sea and set over his armie into Italie. He wrote also to L. Quintius his brother and lieutenant, and Admirall likewise of the fleet, to gather all the ships of burden from along the sea coast of Greece into that place. Himselfe went to Chalcis, and having withdrawn the G garrisons not onely from thence but also from Oreum and Eretria, he held a generall counsell there of all the cities of Euboea: and after he had made remontrance unto them in what case he found them, and in what estate he left them, he dismissed the assemblie. From thence he departed to Demetrias, where also he removed the garison, and being attended with a traine of all the cittizens, like as at Corinth and Chalcis before, hee tooke his journey into Thessalie: where the citties were not onely to bee free, but also to bee reformed, and from a generall mingle mangle and confusion wherein they stood, to be reduced and framed into some tollerable order and forme of government. For they were not onely tainted and infected with the corruption of the times, and the violent current of licentious outrage, which had taken head under the govern- H ment of the king; but also of an inbred troublesome spirit and humor of their owne, whereby, since their first beginning and uprising, even unto our daies they never held Parliaments, Elections, Diets, Countells, or any other assemblies whatsoever, without much trouble & sedition. He chose the Senat and Iudges there in regard especially of their wealth, & in all cities he made that part more mightie, unto which it was more expedient and beneficiall to have all quiet and in peace. Thus having visited Thessalie, and taken a generall review thereof, hee came by the way of Epi- rus to Oricum, from whence he minded to crosse the seas. From Oricum all his forces were trans- ported to Brundisium, and so they passed forward throughout Italie to the citie of Rome, in manner of triumph, sending before them as great a traine of prizes by them taken, as they made themselves in their march. After they were come to Rome, the Senate assembled without the citie for Quintius, where hee had audience to declare and discourse of his worthie exploits: and willing they were to graunt him triumph, according to his deserts. Three daies together he rode in triumph. The first day he made a shew of all the armour, as well defensive as offensive, also of brasse and marble images, of which he had taken more from king Philip, than hee found in the faccage of the citties. The second day there was carried in pompe, the gold and silver both un- wrought and wrought into plate, yea, and cast into coine. Of silver unwrought there was eighteen thousand pound weight: of wrought, two hundred and seventie pound weight. Many vessels of plate of all sorts, and most engraven, some of right curious and exquisite workmanship. Likewise brasse vessels, cunningly and artificially made: and besides, tenne shields of silver, and in coine eightie foure thousand Atticke peeces of silver, which they call Tetradrachma, weighing almost foure Romane deniers apiece: of gold there was three thousand seven hundred and four- teen pound weight, and one shield full and whole of beaten gold: and of Philip golden peeces in coine, foureteene thousand five hundred and foureteene. The third day were borne in view for a pageant, a hundred and foureteene coronets of gold, which were the presents of citties given unto him. Moreover, there were led that day the bealls for sacrifice: and before his chariot went many noble prisoners and hostages, and among them, Demetrius, king Philip his sonne, and Armenes the sonne of Nabis the tyrant, a Lacedaemonian borne. Then rode Quintius himselfe in a chariot into the citie, and a great number of souldiours followed after, by reason that his whole armie was retired with him out of his province. To every footmen he gave two hundred and fiftie Asles, duple as much to a centurion, and triple to an horseman. Those who were redeemed out of captivitie, followed his chariot with their heads shaven, and much beautified the glorie L of the triumph.

In the end of this yeere, Q. Atilius Tubero a Tribune of the Commons, presented a request or bill unto the people, and they graunted & enacted it, to wit, that two Colonies of Latines should be conducted, the one into the Brutians countrey, and the other into the territorie of Thurium. For the conduct and planting whereof, there were ordained three Deputies called Triumvirs, whose commission was in force for three yeeres, namely, Q. Nevius, M. Minutius Rufus, and M. Furius Crassipes for the Brutians: and for Thurium, A. Manlius, P. Atilius, and L. Apulius. For the chusing of these officers, Cn. Domitius the Pretour in the citie, called two severall assemblies in the Capitoll. In that yeere were certaine temples dedicated, one of Iuno Sospita in the hearbe-market, which had been vowed and set out to building foure yeeres before, by C. Corneli- M us the Consull, during the warre with the French: and hee in his Cenforship dedicated it. Another temple of Faunus the Aediles C. Scribonius and Cn. Domitius, had likewise bargained for the building thereof two yeeres before, and laid by the moniey therefore; and this Cn. Domitius being now Pretour of the cittie dedicated it. Also Q. Minutius Ralla, dedicated a temple to

Fortuna Primigenia upon the hill Quirinalis, having ben created Duumvir himselfe for that purpose. P. Sempronius Sophus had vowed the same ten yeeres before, in the time of the Punicke war, and agreed for a certaine price to have it built. Also C. Servilius the other Duumvir consecrated the temple of Iupiter within the island. Vowed it was sixe yeeres before in the Gaules warre by L. Furius Purpurio Pretour, and by him afterwards (when he was Consull) order was given for the edifying thereof. And these were the affaires which passed that yeere.

P. Scipio returned out of his province and government of Gaule for the election of new Consuls; and to that purpose was the generall assembly summoned; wherein were chosen L. Cornelius Aternus, and Q. Minutius Thermus. The next morrow after were created Pretours, L. Cornelius Scipio, M. Fulvius Nobilior, C. Scribonius, M. Valerius Messala, L. Porcius Licinius, & C. Flaminius. B C. Atilius Serranus, and L. Scribonius Libo. Aediles of the chaire, were the first that exhibited the Stage plaies called Megalesia. And the Romane plaies or games represented and set out by these Aediles, the Senate now first & never before beheld a part from the rest of the people. And this (as all novelties and new fashions) ministred much talke: whiles some gave their opinion and said, That now at length that was given to this most noble and honorable State, which long agoe was due; others againe construed thus, and gave out, That whatsoever was added to the majestie of the Senators and nobles, was derogatorie from the dignitie of the people: and that all such kind of distinctions, whereby estates and degrees are severed one from another, are prejudiciall as well to common peace as publicke libertie. For these five hundred and eightie yeeres C say they, these plaies and games have been beheld and looked upon pell mell, without any such precise difference. What new accident is suddainely befallen, why the Nobles should not be willing to let the Commons be intermingled with them in the Theatre? and why a rich man should disdain his poore neighbour to sit by him? This is a new appetite and straunge longing of theirs indeed, full of pride and arrogancie, a thing never desired nor taken up and practised by the Senate of any nation whatsoever. So as in the end even Africanus bestrewed himselfe (men say) and repented thereof, for that hee in his Consulship mooved and persuaded the bringing up of this new fashion. So hard a matter it is to alter an old custome, and make a new order to be well liked of. And men are ever more willing to keepe them to auncient customes, unless they be such, as practise and experience doe evidently checke and condemne.

In the beginning of the yeere, wherein L. Cornelius and Q. Minutius were Consuls, newes came D so thicke of many earthquakes, that men were not onely wearie of the thing it selfe, but also of the holydaies and solemnities that were published and proclaimed in that regard. For the Consuls could not intend either to assemble the Senate and sit in counsell, or manage the affaires of the Commonweale, for being wholly employed about sacrificing and appeasing the wrath of the gods. In conclusion; the Decemvirs were commaunded to peruse the bookes of Sibylla, and according to their answer & direction, a procession & supplication was for three daies solemnised. And before the altars and shrines of the gods & goddesses, they made their praiers with garlands and coroners on their heads: yea, & commaundement was given, that every household and familie by it selfe should fall to their praiers and devotions. Also the Consuls by order from the Senate made proclamation, That upon what day a feast or solemnitie was ordained by occasion E of one earthquake, no man the same day should bring newes of another. Then the Consuls cast lots for the government of their provinces, and after them the Pretours did the like. Unto Cornelius befell Gaule, and to Minutius the Ligurians; C. Sempronius had the charge of the civile jurisdiction, and M. Valerius of the forraigne; L. Cornelius governed Sicilie, L. Porcius Sardinia, C. Flaminius high Spaine, and L. Fulvius the lower. The Consuls looked for no war that yeere: but even then at that instant were letters brought from M. Cincius lord president of Pisa, which gave notice, that twentie thousand Ligurians were up in armes, having conspired together in all market townes and places of resort throughout the whole nation, and that they had already wasted the territorie of Luna, and having invaded and passed through the Pisane land, had overrun also the sea coasts. Wherefore Minutius the Consull, unto whom the government of Liguria F was allotted, by the advise of the LL. of the Senate mounted up into the pulpit Rostra, and published an act, That those two legions of Romane cittizens, which the former yeare had ben enrolled, should within ten daies present themselves at Arretium, in lieu whereof he would levie two other legions out of the citie. Also he commaunded the allies and magistrates of the Latine nation, and their embassadours leagers, who owed knight-service, and were bound to find souldiours

to come before him into the Capitoll. And from among them he enrolled fifteene thousand foot and five hundred horse, according to the number of young and serviceable men that were to be found in each State: which done, he commaunded them forthwith, to go directly from the Capitoll to the gate of the citie, and presently to take musters that all might be done with greater expedition. Vnto Fulvius and Flaminius were appointed three thousand Romane footmen and two hundred horsemen apeece, for to supplie and strengthen their forces: also five thousand foot to either of them of allies of the Latine nation, with two hundred horse. Moreover the Pretours were charged to dismishe and caste the old souldiours, so soone as they were arrived into their provinces. Now, when as the souldiours who were enrolled in the citie-legions, resorted thicke unto the Trib. of the Com. that they should take knowledge of as many of them as were exempted from warfare, for that they either had served out their full time by law appointed, or were sickly and diseased: behold the letters of Sempronius dashed all this, and cleared every difficultie and scrupulositie: wherein it was written, that fifteene thousand Ligurians were entred the territorie of Placentia, and had made great wast and saccage therein, putting all to fire and sword as they went, even as farre as to the very walls of the Colonic it selfe, and the banks of Padus. Also that the nation of the Boij made countenance and gave suspicion of rebellion. In which regards seeing there was a tumultuous and sodaine warre toward, the Senat passed a decree, wherein they signified that it was not their pleasure that the Tribunes should accept any excuses pretended by the souldiours, but that they should all meete and assemble together, according to the Edict. Over and besides they gave order, that the allies of the Latine nation, who had served in the armies of P. Cornelius and Titus Sempronius, and were discharged from souldierie by them being Consuls, should now be readie to shew themselves, against that day which L. Cornelius the Consull should appoint, and at what place soever of Hetruria he should commaund by way of proclamation: Also that the said L. Cornelius the Consull in his march and journey toward the province, might take up, enroll, and arme, what souldiours he thought good, out of all the burroughes and villages in his way, and have them with him whither soever he would, yea and have commission to dismishe whom of them he thought good, and when soever he listed at his good pleasure.

After that the Consuls had taken musters, and were gone into their provinces, then Quintus demanded to have a day of audience in the Senat concerning those affaires that he had concluded with the assistance of the ten Delegates above said: and that it would please them to confirme and establish the same by vertue of their assent and authoritie. Which they might do with more ease, in case they would heare the embassadors themselves speake, who were come out of all Greece, a great part of Asia, and from the kings. These embassies were admitted into the Senate by C. Scribonius the Pretour for the citie, and all dispatched with a gracious answer. But because the dispute about Antiochus required long time of debate, therefore it was referred and put over to the ten Delegates, of whom some had bene in Asia, or at Lyfimachia with the king. And Quintus was commaunded, that together with those said Delegates he should heare what the king his embassadors could say, and so returne unto them such an answer, as might stand with the honor and welfare of the people of Rome. The chiefe of this embassage from the king were Menippus and Hegesianax. Then Menippus began and said, That he knew no such perplexed difficultie in their embassage, considering they were come simply to treat for peace, and to contract a league and alliance. For, saith he, there are three sorts of confederacies and associations, whereby States and Kingdomes ordinarily conclude league and amitie one with another. The first, when they that are vanquished in warre, have conditions and articles imposed upon them: for when all is yielded into the hands of him that is the mightier and more puissant, then it is in his power and at his discretion and will, to give unto the conquered partie what he list, or to take from him as he pleaseth. The second is, when they that are egall in warlike forces give over on even hand, and be content to make peace and amitie, upon indifferent and equall conditions, one with the other: in which case, demand and claime is made, restitution and amends performed according to the accord and agreement: and if in time of the warres, any have bene molested and troubled in their possession, they fall to composition either by the forme and tenor of ancient law, or respective to the good and profit of both parties. The third is, when they that never were enemies, meete and conferre together about concluding some friendship, by way of solemne alliance and societie, who neither geve nor take any conditions: for that belongeth properly to Conquerours, and those that are conquered. Seeing then that Antiochus is comprised in this last kind, I meruaile (quoth he) that the Romanes should thinke or say, It is reasonable to tender articles unto him, or to prescribe and set downe, what cities of Asia they would have to be free & exempt, and which they would have to be tributarie & into what cities they would expressly forbid the king his garisons, or the king himselfe to enter and set foote. For in this wise ought they to make peace with Philip their enemy in times past, and not to draw a contract of amitie and association with Antiochus, a friend at this present. To this oration Quintus shapd his answer in this sort. For as much as it pleaseth you to make your speech thus distinctly by way of division, and severally to rehearse all kinds of confederacies & accords, I also will set downe as methodically in order two conditions, without which, you may let the king your matter to understand, that he must not looke to intertaine any friendship with the people of Rome. The one is this, that if he would debarre us to intermedle with the cities of Asia: he likewise himselfe have nothing to do with all Europe. The other, that if he cannot conteine himselfe within the compasse of Asia, but will needs encroch upon it, the Romanes likewise may have libertie and power both to mainteine those amities which they have already, and also to entertaine new with the States of Asia. Hereat Hegesianax inferred and said, That this was an indigne intolerable, and which he could not abide to heare, namely, that Antiochus should be distressed of those cities of Thrace & Chersonesus, which Selucus his great grandfather had conquered with singuler honor from king Lyfimachus, whom he vanquished in war and slew in field, and seized the same in him as his rightfull inheritance. As for the same cities possessed by the Thracians, Antiochus himselfe with as great praise and glorie hath partly by force of armes regained out of their hands, and partly repeople with the old inhabitants called home againe, whereas they lay abandoned and desolate, and namely Lyfimachia itselfe, as all the world seeth: and more than that, hath reedified to his exceeding charge & expence, those that lay along in their ruines, and were consumed with fire. What likenes then is there between these two demands: namely, that Antiochus should quit the possession of that which either he acquired or recovered in that sort: and that the Romanes should abstaine & forbear Asia, which never appertained unto them? To conclude, Antiochus (saith he) is desirous of the Romans friendship, but in such termes as may stand with his honor, and not purchase himselfe shame and reproch. Then Quintus rejoined again in this manner: For as much as quoth he, we balance and weigh things according to honestie (as in truth it is besitting the chiefe and principall state of the world, and so great and mightie a king to peise that only or at leastwise principally above all other regards) I would gladly know of you, Whether ye thinke it more honest of the twaine, either to will and wish that all the cities of Greece whatsoever and wheresoever should enjoy libertie: or to make them homagers and tributarie? If Antiochus thinketh it be an honorable thing for him to reduce into servitude and bondage as his owne, those cities which his great grandfather held by right of armes, and whereof neither his father nor grandfather afore him were in possession: the people of Rome likewise esteemeth it a materiall point that toucheth their faithfulness and constancie, not to forsake the Greekes, whose protection and defence they have enterprised and taken in hand. And like as they have freed Greece out of the hands of Philip, so they intend to deliver those cities of Asia which are of Greekish race and descent, from the subjection of Antiochus. For the Greeke Colonies were not sent into Aolis and Ionis, to live in servitude under the king, but to increase and multiply, that a most auncient nation might spread over the face of the whole earth. Now when as Hegesianax knew not how to shift and turne himselfe, and could not denie but that the cause of libertie which the Romanes pretended in the title of their quarrell, was of more honestie and credit, than that other of slavery: Let's lay away all these circumstances of words (quoth P. Sulpitius, the auncientest person of all the ten Delegates) and chooseth yee one of the two conditions which even now were expressly offred unto you by Quintus, or else make no more talke about amitie with the Romanes. Then quoth Menippus, As for us, wee may in no case, neither will wee capitulate and covenant any thing prejudiciall to the kingdome and royall state of king Antiochus. The morrow after Quintus when hee had brought all the Embassies of Greece and Asia into the Senate, that they might know what affection the people of Rome caried, and what mind Antiochus bare to the cities of Greece, he declared before them all as well his owne demands, as those of the kings part: willing them to make report unto their own cities, & assure them, that the people of Rome would maintein them against Antiochus (unless he departed out of Europe) with the same vertue, valour, and fidelitie G wherewith he had defended their liberty against Philip. Then Menippus was earnest with Quintius and the LL. of the Senate, beseeching them instantly not to proceed in hast to a decree whereby they should set all the world in trouble and uprore; but both take leifure themselves and give respite unto the king to deliberate farther of the matter: for no doubt, upon the relating of the condicions, he would consider upon them, and either obtaine somewhat at their hands, or for peace sake yeeld his consent to all. Thus was the matter wholly and entirely deferred: & agreed it was, that the same embassadours should be addressed unto the king, who had beene with him at Lysimachia, to wit, P. Sulpitius, P. Villius, and P. Aelius.

Scarcely were they gone from the citie and entred upon their journey, but embassadours arrived from Carthage, who reported, that without all doubt Antiochus made preparation for warre, and therein used the hand and ministerie of Anniball: in so much, as it was feared also that a third Punicke warre would breake out withall. Anniball as wee said before, having fled his native countrey, repaired unto Antiochus, and was in great account and estimation with the king, for no other cause and pollicie in the world, but that the king who projected and plotted long time in his spirit to levie warre upon the Romanes, could find no man more fit than Anniball to break his mind unto, and with whom to discourse upon a matter of such consequence. Anniball his long and resolution was ever one and the same still, namely, To make war within Italie: and that Italie was able to furnish a forraine enemy, with men, munition, and victuals. For this he cast with himselfe and considered, that if all were quiet there and no troubles set a foot, but that the people of Rome might with the forces and riches of Italie, furnish themselves to make war without Italie, there was no monarch nor nation under the sunne able to make head against the Romanes. He demanded therefore to have the commaund of 100 close ships with hatch and decke, 16000 foot, and 1000 horse: and with the said fleet he would first saile into Africk, where he assured himselfe that he should be able to solicit & induce the Carthaginians to rebellion: but if they held off & made it goodly and strange, yet would he settle in some part of Italie and levie war against the Romanes. His advice and counsell furthermore was, that the king should with all his other forces passe into Europe, & in some one part of Greece keep his power together, and not to take the sea, but to be readie ever to crosse over; which would be sufficient to make a shew and raise a bruit all abroad of warre. When he had perswaded the king to this designment and resolution, supposing that he was likewise to sound and prepare the hearts aforehand of his own countymen to this purpose: he durst not dispatch any letters unto them, for fear they might chauce to be intercepted by the way, and so discover the whole plot. He happened at Ephelus upon a Tyrian one Ariston, a man whose industrie and dexteritie he had tried in some small services wherein he had employed him. Him he plyed with gifts in hand, but fed him more with large promises of great rewards, which king Antiochus also himselfe seemed to make good and give his word for; and so sent him to Carthage with credence & instructions. He redied him in the names of all those persons with whom he was to talke and conferre: hee furnisheth him with secret tokens, whereby they might assuredly know, that hee was no counterfeit, but came with a message from him. Now whiles this Ariston conversed in Carthage, the friends of Anniball knew no sooner about what errand he came, than his very enemies. At the first, much talke and discourse there was in every corner of the citie where they met, and at their feasts and merriments, of this matter. Afterwards at their counsell table some stucke not to say, that the exile of Anniball was to little or no purpose, if whiles he was absent hee could contrive and compass new plots, and by soliciting and tempting mens minds, disquiet and trouble the state of the citie. There is a stranger, say they, one Ariston a Tyrian, hither come with instructions from Anniball and king Antiochus: certaine men there are, that daily have privie conference with him, and devise in secret of that, which anon will breake out to the utter ruine and overthrow of all. Wherupon they all cried with one voice to convent Ariston peremptorily before them, & to examine him about what businesse he was thither arrived; & unless he would bewray and declare the matter, to send him with embassadours of purpose, to Rome: For why? we have (say they) felt the smart enough, and paid sufficiently for the folly and rash head of one harebrained man already. Let privat persons beare their owne load hereafter, and at their owne perill commit a trespass: provided alwaies, that the Commonweale be preserved cleare not onely from all fault, but also from all apparance and bruit of any such intent. Ariston being called before them, stood stiffely upon

A upon his integritie and excused himselfe, and evermore used this for his best and surest defence. That he had brought no letters at all to any person: howbeit he could not render a ready and sound reason of his coming thither: but especially hee was shrewdly troubled and put to his trumps when they charged him, That he had talke & communication with those only of the Barchine faction. Hereupon arose some debate & altercation in the house, whiles some were of opinion, that he should be apprehended for a spie, and clapt up fast in ward: others againe were of mind, that there was no cause to make such a stirre and tumult; for it was an evill president to be given, that strangers coming to their citie, should be troubled and hardly intreated: and the like measure no doubt would be offered to the Carthaginians in Tyrus and in other townes of marchandise, whereunto they use to have resort for exchange and traffique. So for that day the matter was put off. Ariston framing himselfe to play the craftie Carthaginian among these B Carthaginians, wrote a certaine bill, & in the shutting in of the evening, hung it up in the most conspicuous & publicke place of all the citie, even over the seat where the head magistrate useth daily to sit; and himselfe about the third watch gat to shipbord and escaped. The morow after, when the Suffetes were set on the bench to minister law, the bill aforesaid was seen, taken down, and read: wherein to this effect was written, That Ariston was not come with a message to any person in particular, but to all the Seniors or Elders in generall (for so they call the Senat.) After that the thing was by this meane made a publicke matter, and the whole state of the Senators reputed culpable, they were not so earnest to search into privat persons. Howbeit thought good it was, that Embassadours should be sent to Rome to give information hercof to the Consuls C and the Senat, and withall, to make complaint of certaine wrongs done by Masanissa.

Masanissa understanding that the Carthaginians were suspected and in some ill name among the Romanes, and also at jarre and variance within themselves; and namely, that the great and principall men were had in jealousy by the Senat for their conferences with Ariston; and their Senate likewise suspected by the people, by reason of that writing above-named of the said Ariston: taking this for a good advantage and opportunitie to do them some injurie, not only invaded their maritime parts & made spoile, but also forced certain tributarie cities to the Carthaginians for to pay himselfe tribute. That quarter of the countrey they call Emporia. It is the sea coast of the lesser Syrtis, and the country is exceeding fertile: there is in it one only citie named Leptis, which paid to the Carthaginians for tribute, a talent every day. All this region Masanissa D then had plagued sore, yea and for one part thereof he made some claime, as beeing litigious whether it pertained to his kingdome, or the seignorie of the Carthaginians: and because hee knew for truth, that the Carthaginian embassadours were about to goe to Rome, as well to purge themselves of some crimes wherewith they were charged, as to complaine of him; therefore himselfe also addressed his embassadours to Rome, who should lay open more matter against them of deeper suspicion, and debate withall as touching the right of those tributes. The Carthaginians were no sooner heard speake concerning that Tyrian stranger, but the LL. of the Senat grew into some doubt least they should wage warre with Antiochus and the Carthaginians both together. And this presumption of all the rest made the suspicion most pregnant, because when they had the partie among them and were purposed to send him to Rome, they neither E made the man himselfe sure, nor the barke wherein hee arrived. After this, they fell to debate and argue with the kings Embassadours, about the territorie and land in controversie. The Carthaginians pleaded for themselves, and stood much upon their bounds and limits, for that the land in suite lay within that precinct, by which P. Scipio the conquerour limited out that territory which pertained to the seignorie of the Carthaginians. Also they alledged the confession of the king himselfe, who at what time as he pursued Apheres, that fled out of his own realm, and with a companie of Numidians raunged abroad about Cyrenæ, made request unto them to give him leave to passe through this very ground, as if (without all question) it belonged to the Carthaginians. The Numidians answered againe to these points and said plainly to their faces, that they lied in their throates, as touching that supposed limitation and bounding by Scipio: and moreover, if we would go (say they) and search the very original indeed of the law, what land at all ought the Carthaginians have of their own proper inheritance? For being but meere strangers, they had after much praier and entreatie, as much ground allowed them and no more, to build them a citie in, as they could compass with thongs cut out of one bull hide. And looke whatsoever they had encroched upon; without that nest and seat of theirs in Byrsa, they gat and held it by by force and violence. And as for the land now in strife, they are not able to prove, that they alwaies held the same in possession, no nor that they kept it any long time together. But as occasion and opportunities served of advantage, one while they, and another while the Numidian kings made recient and enjoyed it, and evermore he went away with the possession thereof that was the stronger, and had the keener sword. In these considerations they requested the Romanes to leave the thing in that state and condition, wherein it stood before that the Carthaginians were enemies, or king Masani friend and allie to the Romanes; and not to intermeddle betweene, nor take a part, but let the winner weare it, and him have it that can hold it. In conclusion, it was thought good, that to the embassadours of both parties this answer should be returned, namely, That they would send certaine Commissioners into Affrick, to decide this controversie about the land in question, betweene the people of Carthage and the king. So there were sent of purpose, P. Scipio Africanus, C. Cornelius Cethegus, and la Minutius Rufus. Who having heard what could bee said, and seene the thing, left all hanging still in suspence and undecided, without adjudging it by their definitive sentence to the one or the other. But whether they so did, on their owne head and selfe-accord, or by direction from the Senat, is nor so certaine, as it seemeth agreeable unto that present time in pollicie, to leave them as they found them, and the contro-versie still depending. For unlesse it were so, Scipio himselfe alone, in regard of the knowledge that hee had of the thing, and of his authoritie with the persons (so much bound they were unto him on both sides) might with a word of his mouth, or a nod of his head, have ended all this matter.

THE XXXV. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the five and thirtieth Booke.

Pylus Scipio Africanus being sent embassador unto Antiochus, talked at Ephesus with Annibal (who had sided with Antiochus) to this end, that he might rid him of that feare which he had conceived of the people of Rome, as touching the taking away of his life. Among other matters passed betweene them, when he demanded of Annibal, whom he judged to have been the noblest and greatest warrior that ever was, hee answered, that it was Alexander king of the Macedonians: for that he with a small power had discomfited and defeated an infinite number of armies, and withall, passed through those farre distant and remote parts of the world, unto which a man would not believe, that it were possible for any person to go and see them. When he asked again of him whom he deemed for the second: who but Pyrrhus (quoth he) because he taught the manner how to pitch a campe, and besides, no man had the cast to gaine places and holds for advantage, nor could set his corps de guard, or plant garisons better than he. And when he proceeded still to know whom he took to be the third, Annibal named his owne good selfe. At which answer Scipio fell a laughing: And what would you have said then (quoth he) if your hap had been to have vanquished me? Marrie then (saith he) I would have set myselfe before Alexander, before Pyrrhus, and before all other. Among other prodigious fights, whereof there were reported very many, it is said, that in the yeare wherein En. Dr-mitius was Consul, an exe spake, and said these words, ROME, LOOKE TO THY SELFE. The Romanes prepare to warre with Antiochus. Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians, provoked by the Etolians, who sollicited both Philip and also Antiochus to wage warre against the people of Rome, revolted from the Romanes, and after he had levied warre against Philip, Pretour of the Achaeans, was by the Etolians slaine. The Etolians likewise abandoned

A done the friendship of the people of Rome, with whom Antiochus king of Syria banded: who waded upon Greece, and sw-rised many cities, and namely Chalcis and Euboea among the rest. Besides, this booke containeth the martiall affaires in Liguria, and the preparation of Antiochus for the warres.

IN the beginning of that yeere wherein these affaires thus passed, Sext. Digitius Pretor in high Spain, sought battels (rather ordinarie, and for number many, than otherwise memorable and worth the speaking) against those States, whereof after the departure of Cato a great sort had rebelled. And those battels for the most part were so unfortunat, that hardly he could deliver up to his successor the one halfe of those souldiours which he had received. And doubtlesse all Spaine would have taken heart again, if the other Pretour P. Cornelius Scipio, the sonne of Cneus, had not sped better in many of his conflicts beyond Iberus. Upon which terrour, no fewer than fiftie good townes revolted unto him. And these exploits performed Scipio, as Pretour. Who also in qualitie of Propretour, encountered the Lusitanes upon the way, as they returned homeward charged with a mightie great bootie raised out of the base Spaine, which they had utterly pillied and spoiled: where hee fought from the third houre of the *day unto the eight, with doubtfull event. For number of soldiours he was inferiour to his enemies, but for all things else he had the vantage, and went beyond them. For his bat-tallions were wel appointed and close compacted of armed men, and so he charged upon the enemies marching in a long traine, and the same encombred with a deale of cattell: besides, his souldiours were fresh and in heart, whereas the other were wearied with long travell. For the enemies set forth at the third watch, and besides their night journey, they had marched three houres also of the day, and without any repose or rest at all, they came to a conflict presently upon their travell on the way. And therefore at the beginning of the battell, so long as they were in any heart, and their strength served, they troubled and disordered the Romanes with the first charge they gave; but afterwards for a while they came to be equall in fight. In which hazard of doubtfull issue the Propretour vowed to set forth certaine solemne games to the honour of Iupiter, in case he might discomfit the enemies, and kill them in chase. At the length the Romanes advanced forward more hotely, and the Lusitanes reculed, yea, and anone turned their backs quite. And when as in this traine of victorie the Romanes pursued them hard in the rout, there were of the D enemies slaine upon twelve thousand, five hundred and fortie taken prisoners, all in manner horsemen; and of militarie ensignes they caried away one hundred thirtie and foure. Of the Ro-mane armie seventie and three onely were lost. This battell was fought not far from the citie Illipa. And thither brought P. Cornelius his victorious armie, enriched with prey & pillage. Which was laid all abroad before the towne, and every man had leave giuen to challenge and claim his owne. All the rest was given to the Treasurer for to be sold, and the monie raised thereof, was parted among the souldiours.

Now had not C. Flaminius the Pretour as yet taken his leave of Rome, when these things fell out in Spaine, and therefore both he and his friends talked and discoursed much upon these oc-curents both good and bad: and forasmuch as a great warre in his province was broken out to a light fire, and himselfe was to receive from Sext. Digitius but a small remnant of an armie, and the same timorous still & full of fright, as not wel recovered of their former flight, he had assaied to bring about, that the Senate would assigne unto him one of the citie-legions; to the end that when he had joined thereto those souldiours which himselfe had enrolled according to an order set downe by the Senate, he might out of all that number chuse forth fixe thousand and five hundred footmen, and three hundred horsemen. With which legion (for in the armie of Sext. Digitius he reposed small confidence) he minded to make warre. The auncient Senatours denied and said, That acts of the Senate were not to bee made upon every flying tale and report set abroad and blased by some particular persons in favor of magistrats. Neither would they hold any thing for certaine, but that which either the Pretours themselves wrote out of the provinces, or em-bassadours sent of purpose, related. And if there were any such commotion & trouble in Spaine, they were of advice, that the Pretour should levie in hast without Italie, such tumultuarie souldiours, as in that case were usually taken up. The intent and mind of the Senat was, that soldiers should in that sort be prest out in Spaine. Valerius Antias writeth, that C. Flaminius both sailed into Sicilie to levie and muster men, and also as he made saile from Sicilie toward Spaine, was by

by wind and tempest put with the shore of Africk: where he found certaine souldiers disperſed over the countrey, remaining of the armie of P. Africanus: of whom he tooke a militarie oath to ſerve him in his warres: and that to theſe levies raiſed in two provinces, he joynd alſo a third in Spaine.

The warre of the Ligurians likewiſe grew aſt: for they had already beſieged and inveſted Piſæ with fortie thouſand men: and thither reſorted and flockt dayly unto them great multitudes aſ well for hope of pillage, as upon the bruit and rumor that went of the warre. Minutius the Conſull came at the day appointed to Arretium, which was the Rendezvous where he had commaunded all his ſouldiours to meete him: from whence he marched with a foureſquare Battailon toward Piſæ. And when the enemies had removed their camp a mile from the citie on the other ſide of the river, the Conſull entred the towne, which no doubt by his comming he preſerved. The next day himſelfe alſo encamped on the other ſide of the river, almoſt halfe a mile from the enemies, from which place he made light ſkirmiſhes with them and ſaved the territorie of his allies from the excuſions and robberies of the enemies. Hee durſt not as yet try a battaile in pitched field, as having but raw and new ſouldiours, and thoſe gathered out of many kinds of men, and not ſo well knowne among themſelves, that one might ſurely truſt another. The Ligurians bearing themſelves bold of their numbers, not only came forth into the field readie to bid battaile, and hazard all upon a throw: but having multitudes at commaundement and to ſpare, ſent out into all parts ſundrie companies to ſpoile and raiſe booties as farre as to the marches and frontiers of the countrey. And when they had gathered together much cattaille and great ſtore of pillage, they had a ſtrong place of defence readie at hand, well manned and garded, by meanes whereof all was convoyed into their burroughs and townes.

Thus while the Ligurians warre was ſettled about Piſæ, the other Conſull L. Cornelius Merula entred with his armie by the utmoſt confines of the Ligurians into the territorie of the Boians: where the warre was managed farre otherwiſe than with the Ligurians. For the Conſull entred the field in battaile array, but the enemies fell off, and would not fight. In ſo much as the Romanes ſeeing none to come forth and preſent themſelves, ran abroad into all parts to ſpeed their hands with pillage. And the Boians choſe rather to ſuffer their goods to be ranſacked, making no reſiſtance, than to ſave the ſame with the hazard of a battaile. The Conſull when he had wrought his pleaſure, and conſumed all with fire and ſword, departed out of the territorie of the enemies, and marched toward * Mutina ſecurely without any regard of himſelfe, as through a peaceable country of his friends. The Boij perceiving once that they were gone out of their limits, followed after with a ſtill and ſilent march, ſeeking ſome convenient place for to lay an ambuſh. And having in the night ſeaſon paſſed beyond the Romane camp, they ſeiſed themſelves of a ſtreight paſſage within a ſtrefneſſe, through which of neceſſitie the Romanes muſt paſſe, and there they forlayed them. This was not ſo cloſely caried, but the Conſull had an ynking thereof: and therefore whereas his manner was to ſet out in his march early in the morning, long before day light, now for feare leaſt the darkenes of the night ſhould increaſe the terror of a tumultuarie ſkirmiſh, he waited for the day. And albeit the ſunne was up before he removed and ſet forward, yet he ſent out a troupe of horſemen to ſeoure and diſcover the quarters. And after he was advertiſed by theſe eſpials what number there was of enemies, and in what place they were, he commaunded that all the baggage and cariage of the whole armie ſhould be beſtowed in the mids, and that the Triarij ſhould ſtake and pale it all about, whiles he with the reſt of his forces marched in order of battaile, and approached the enemy. The like alſo did the French, after they once ſaw that their ambuſh and traines were detected, and that they muſt of neceſſitie fight a ſer pitched battaile, where downe-right blowes, cleane ſtrength, and pure valour, was to carry away the victorie. Thus about the ſecond houre of the day they affronted one another. The left wing of the horſemen of the allies and the extraordinaries fought in the vanguard, under the conduct of two Lieutenants that had bene Conſuls, to wit, M. Marcellus, and T. Sempronius, Conſull the yeere before. The new Conſull one while was in the front of the battaile, another while at the taile to keepe in the legions, leaſt for egre deſire of fight they ſhould advance forward to the conflict before that the ſignall was given. As for the men of armes belonging to the legions, he commaunded Quintius and P. Minutius, Marſhals or Colonels, to bring them forth, and conduct them without the battaile into a large plaine, from whence out of the open ground they ſhould on a ſodaine charge the enemies, when he gave them

A them a ſignall by ſound of Trumpet. Thus as he was marſhalling and directing his men, there came a meſſenger from T. Sempronius Longus with a report, that the looſe Extraordinarie ſouldiers aforeſaid were not able to abide the violence of the Gaules: that very many of them were ſlaine, and thoſe that remained, partly for weariſſe of travaile, and partly for fearefull cowardice began to quail their heate of fight: and therefore if he thought ſo good, he ſhould ſend one of the two legions to ſuccour, before they had received farther diſhonor. Whereupon the ſecond legion was ſent, and the Extraordinaries retired themſelves out of the battaile. Then began the conflict anew, by reaſon that the ſouldiours came in freſh and in heart, and the legion beſides was complet and fully furniſhed with all her companies: the left wing of horſemen aforeſaid was retired out of the battaile, and in lieu thereof, the right wing advanced into the forefront. By this time the ſunne with extreme ſcorching heate, roſted and fried the bodies of the Frenchmen, which of all things can leaſt abide heat: howbeit, ſtanding with their ranks thicke and cloſe together, one while they leaned one upon another: other whiles they reſted and bare themſelves upon their targets, and ſuſtained the violence of the Romanes. Which when the Conſull perceived, he commaunded C. Livius Salinator who had the conduct of the light horſe in the wings, to ſend in the quickeſt horſe in all his companie, with full carriere to breake their ranks: and gave charge that the legionarie horſemen ſhould abide behind in the reregard. This tempeſt and ſtorme of Cavallerie firſt ſhuſtled and put in diſſaray the battaile of the Gaules, and afterwards brake their ranks and files cleane, yet not ſo, that they turned their backs: for why, their captaines and leaders would not ſuffer them, laying about with their truncheons upon the backs of them that ſo trembled for feare, and forced them againe into their ranks: but the light horſemen aforeſaid riding among them would not permit them to ſtand to it, and keepe their place. The Conſull for his part encouraged and exhorted his ſouldiers to ſtick to it awhile, for the victorie was in their hands; and to charge ſtill upon them, ſo long as they ſaw them diſordered and affrighted: for if they ſuffered their ranks to cloſe againe, they ſhould abide another conflict, and the ſame perhaps doubtfull and dangerous. The Enſigne-bearers he commaunded to advance their banners: and thus at length with putting all their power and good will together, they diſcomfited the enemy, and put him to flight. After they ſhewed their backs once and tooke them to their heeles, running away on all ſides, then the legionarie horſemen were ſent out after to follow the chaſe: fourteene thouſand Boians that day were ſlaine, a thouſand and nine hundred taken priſoners alive: 221 horſemen: three of their leaders: and of enſignes were woon 212, and chariots 63. The Romanes likewiſe woon not this victorie ſo cleere, but it coſt them ſome bloud. For of their owne ſouldiours and allies together, there died above five thouſand: 23 Centurions, beſides foure Colonels of Allies, and two Marſhals of the ſecond legion, to wit, M. Genutius, and M. Martius.

At one and the ſelfe ſame time in manner, both the Conſuls letters were brought to Rome. Cornelius his letters, touching the battaile fought at Mutina with the Boians: but the other of Q. Minutius from Piſæ, were written to this effect, That whereas by lot it belonged to him to hold the aſſembly for the election of new magiſtrates, yet conſidering in how doubtfull tearms of hazard his affaires ſtood in Liguria, that he might not poſſibly depart from thence without the utter ruine of the allies, and hinderance of the weale publicke: therefore if it might ſeeme ſo good unto the LL. of the Senat, he would adviſe them to ſend unto his brother Conſull, That he, who had finiſhed his warre, might returne to Rome for to hold the aforeſaid generall aſſembly for the election: but in caſe he ſhould thinke much thereof, becauſe this charge properly appertained not to him; hee promiſed them, that himſelfe would doe whatſoever the Senate ſhould thinke good. But he requeſted them to conſider and be well adviſed, Whether it were not more expedient for the common-weale to proceed rather to an interreigne, than ſhat he ſhould leave the province in that ſtate of jeopardie. The Senat hereupon gave in charge to C. Scribanus for to ſend two embaffadours both of Senators calling, unto L. Cornelius the Conſull, who ſhould carrie alſo with them unto him the letters of his colleague written and ſent unto the Senate: and withall, to let him underſtand, that unleſſe he would come himſelfe to Rome: for the election of new magiſtrates to ſucceed, the Senat would ſuffer an interreigne rather than call away Q. Minutius from the warre unfiniſhed, and wherein he was wholly employed. The Embaffadours that were ſent, brought word backe, That L. Cornelius would repaire to Rome himſelfe for the chuſing of new magiſtrates. As touching the letters of L. Cornelius, wherein he did them to understand, what happie issue and successe he had in the battaile with the Boians; there was some reasoning and debate in the Senat house: for M. Claudius his lieutenant had written other letters privately to most of the Senatours, to this effect; That they were much beholden and bound to give thanks unto the good fortune of the people of Rome, and the valour of the soldiers, in that they sped so well as they did: for by meanes of the Consull, not only there were a good number of men lost, but also the armie of the enemies was escaped out of their hands, when they had fit opportunitie presented unto them, of a small difficutie and overthrow thereof: and that by this occasion there was a greater number of the souldiours miscaried; for that they who should have rescued and succoured those that were distressed, came too late out of the regard: and thereupon why the enemies got away and escaped was this, because the legionarie horsemen had not the signall soone enough founded unto them, and could not possibly pursue them in the chase. Therefore as concerning that point, they would not determine any thing rashly and hand over head, but the matter was referred and put over to a more frequent assembly of Senatours.

A greater object there was to trouble their heads; for the citie was much oppressed with usurie: and albeit the avarice and covetousnesse of men had bene well gaged and bridled by many lawes concerning usurie, yet there was a cautelous devise and shift found out, to avoid all statutes in that behalfe: to wit, that all obligations should passe in the names of allies, and be sealed unto them, who were not tied and bound to observe the lawes aforesaid. By which meanes the creditors enwrapped their debtors in what bonds they list, and forced them to pay extreme interest as they would themselves, without stint. For to see into this disorder and enormitie, and to redresse the same, it was thought good and order taken, to set downe and limit a certain day, namely, upon which the usurers were last restrained. From which day all those allies should come in and declare and professe, what money they had put forth upon usurie to any citizens of Rome; and that the creditour should have right to recover those monies put forth from that time, according to such conditions as the debtour would himselfe. Hereupon, after there were discovered great summes of money and debts contracted by this fraudulent practise, M. Sempronius a Tribune of the Commons, by advise of the Senate propounded a law, and the Commons allowed it, That the same course of putting out money practised betwene citizen and citizen of Rome, should likewise be in force among the allies of the Latine nation. In this sort went matters in Italie, both within the citie of Rome, and also in the warres abroad.

In Spaine the warre was nothing so much as the bruit that ran thereof. C. Flaminius in high Spaine, wan Lucía, a towne in the Oretans country: after which exploit, he laid up his soldiers in their winter harbour. And in winter time there passed certaine light skirmishes (not worth the naming) against the excursions of brigands and theeves, I may rather say, than enemies: and yet the fortune was variable, and not without some losse of men. As for M. Fulvius he achieved great matters: for hee fought in a raunged battaile with banner displayed against the Vacceans, the Vestones, and the Celtiberians, before the town Toleum; where hee discomfited and put to flight the armie of those nations, and tooke prisoner alive, their king Hilernus.

Whiles these things thus passed in Spaine, the day drew neere, of the solemne election of magistrates at Rome: and therefore L. Cornelius the Consull having left M. Claudius lieutenant in the armie, came to Rome: who, after he had discoursed in the Senate house of his owne exploits, and in what estate the province stood, he complained to the LL. of the Senat, that considering so great a warre was brought to an end, by one battaile so fortunately and happily fought, there was no solemnitie to the honour of the gods, performed in that behalfe. Over and besides, he demanded, That they would decree a procession and triumph withall. But before the Senatours were to deliver their opinions to this demand, Q. Metellus, who had bene Consull and Dictator, rose up and said, That there had been letters brought at one and the same time; both from the Consull Cornelius to the Senate, and also from M. Marcellus to a great many of the Senatours, and those letter importing contrarieties: whereupon the consultation of that matter had bene deferred and put off, to the end that it might be argued and debated in the presence of them both, who wrote the letters: and therefore I ever looked (quoth he) that the Consull (knowing especially that his lieutenant had written and enformed somewhat against him, and considering that himselfe was to repaire to Rome) would have brought him along with him; seeing that it had bene more meet and besitting him to have delivered the armie to T. Sempronius.

Annus, one that was in the commission and had a commaund, than to a lieutenant. But it should seeme now, that hee was left behind farre enough off of very purpose, for feare he would avow and iustifie personally his hand-writing, and charge him face to face: and that if the Consull should make report of any untruth, he might be challenged therefore, and the thing sifted and canvassed, untill the truth appeared clearly and came to light: and therefore my opinion is (quod hee) that nothing be determined at this present, as touching the demands of the Consull. But when as he persisted notwithstanding, and followed the suit still, namely that they would ordaine a solemne procession, and that himselfe might enter the citie, riding in triumph: then Marcus and C. Titinius, both Tribunes of the Commons, protested, that they would interpose their negative, and cancell the order of the Senate in that behalfe.

The Censors for that time, were Sex. Aelius P. Petus and C. Cornelius Cetbegus, created the yeare before. Cornelius tooke a review of the citie and numbred the people; and there were accounted by his survey 143704 polls of citizens. Great floods arose that yeere, and Tyber overflowed all the flats and plaine places of the citie: and about the gate Flumentana certain houses and buildings were overthrowen withall, and laid along. The gate Calimontana besides, was stricken with lightning, & the wall about it was likewise blasted from heaven. At Aricia, Lanuvium, and in mount Aventine, it rained stones. And reported it was from Capua, that a great swarme of wapes came flying into the market place, and setled upon the temple of Mars; which beeing with great care taken up and gathered together, were afterward consumed with fire. In regard of these prodigious tokens, order was given, that the Decemvirs should search and peruse the bookes of Sibylla; whereupon a novendiall sacrifice (to continue nine daies) was appointed, a publicke procession solemnized, and the citie was cleansed and hallowed. About the same time M. Porcius Cato, dedicated the chappell of Virgin victorie, neere to the temple of the goddesse Victorie, two yeeres after that he had vowed it. In that yeere also the Triumvirs, C. Manlius Vulso, L. Apustius Fullo, and P. Aelius Tubero, (who had preferred a bill of request about the planting of a Colonie) had commission granted, to conduct a Colonie of Latines into the countrey of Thurium: and thither went three thousand footmen and three hundred horsemen; a small number in comparison of the largenesse and quantitie of the territorie. There might well have bene set out thirtie acres for every footman, and threescore for an horseman: but by the motion and advise of Apustius, one third part of the lands was excepted and reserved, to the end, that afterwards in time, they might enroll new Coloners if it pleased them. And therefore the footmen had twentie acres, and the horsemen fortie apeece.

Now approached the end of the yeere, and more ambition there was, and hotter suite for place of dignitie in the election of Consuls, than ever had been knowne any time before. Many mightie men, as well of the Patritij and nobles, as the Commoners, stood and laboured hard for the Consullship, to wit, P. Cornelius Scipio, the sonne of Cneus, who lately was departed out of Spaine after he had atcheeved many worthe deeds. L. Quintus Flaminius who had ben Admiral of the navie in Greece, and Cn. Manlius Vulso, all of the Nobilitie. But of the Commons were C. Laelius, Cn. Domitius, C. Livius Salinator, and M. Acilius. But all mens eies were fixed upon Quintius and Cornelius: For they desired one place, being both of them nobly descended, and their fresh glorie for seats of warre, recommended both the one and the other. But above all other things, the brethren of these competitours, two most renowned warriors of their time, set the debate on a light fire. The glorie of Scipio, as it was the greater of the twaine, so it was more subject to envie. The honour of Quintius was more fresh, as who that yeer had newly triumphed. Over and besides, the one of them had bene now almost ten yeeres continually conversant in the eies of men (a thing that maketh great men not so highly regarded, by reason that they are growne stale, and the world is full alreadie of them) also he had been twice Consull, and Censor since he vanquished Anniball. But in Quintius all was fresh & new, to win the good grace and favor of men. And more than that, he neither after his triumph had obtained ought of the people, nor, to say a truth, requested any thing. He alledged, that he made suite for his owne naturall and whole brother by both sides, & not for a cousin german, in the behalfe of a very companion and partaker with him in the managing of the war (for as himselfe served by land, so his brother performed many exploits by sea.) So he obtained, that Quintius should be preferred before his competitor, whom Africanus & his brother Asiaticus brought in and graced, whom the whole race of Cornelius seemed to countenance, even then when a Cornelius, Consull, was president of the election.

tion, & held the assembly, whom the Senat had given to grave a testimonie of, in adjudging him to be the best man simply in all the citie, & thought most worthie to receive the goddesse, dame Ides, committing from Pessinus to the citie of Rome. Thus were L. Quintus, & Cn. Domitius Aenebarbus created Consuls, in such sort, that Africanus was of no credite, and bare no stroke at all (ye may be sure) in the election of a Consull out of the third estate of Commons, albeit he employed himselfe, and did his best for C. Lelius. The next day after were the Pretors elected, namely L. Scribonius Libo, M. Fulvius Centimalus, A. Attulus Serranus, M. Bibius Tamphilus, L. Valerius Tappus, and Q. Salinius Sarra. In this yeer M. Aemilius Lepidus and L. Aemilius Paulus, the Censors, bare themselves so in their office, as they made their yeer to be notable and much spoken of. They condemned & fined many of the citie grasiers or farmers of the common pastures; and of that money which arose of their ameracements, were certaine gilded shields made, which were set up on the finiall or lanterne of Iupiters temple. They made one terrace or gallerie without the gate Trigemina, with a merchants hall or Burse adjoined thereto, neere Tyber; and another from the gate Fontinalis they built in length as far as to the altar of Mars, leading to Mars field.

For a long time nothing was done in Liguria worth the remembrance. But about the end of the yeere, twise were the Romanes in great jeopardie: for both the campe of the Consull was assailed and hardly defended, and also not long after, as the Romane hoast marched through a streight pafe, the armie of the Ligurians kept the very gullet of the passage, and the Consull seeing he could not make way through, turned his ensignes, and began to retire the same way he came: but by that time, some of the enemies had gained also the backe part of the pafe, in so much as the lamentable remembrance of the Caudine overthrow, not onely presented itselfe to their spirit and mind, but also was in manner an object to their eie. Now had he amongst his auxiliarie or aid-forces, to the number almost of eight hundred horse. Whose captaine promised the Consull, that he and his would breake through whether way hee would, let him onely but tell him which of the two quarters were better peopled and inhabited: for the first thing that he did, he would fire their villages and houses; to the end, that the feare and fright thereof might force the Ligurians to depart out of the chafe which they held and beset, and run to succour their owne neighbours. The Consull commended him highly, and fed him with hope of large rewards. Whereupon the Numidians mounted on horsebacke, and began to ride about the corps de guard of the enemies, without offering to charge upon any man. At the first, a man that had seen them, would have thought nothing more contemptible, being both men & horse, litle, spare and gaunt. The horseman unarmed and without weapon, save that hee carrieth about him some light darts: the horses without bridles; and as they ran shutting out their stiffe neckes, and bearing their heads forward without any reining at all, they made a very ill favoured sight. And the riders, for to make themselves more despised, would for the nones seeme to take fals from their horses, and make their enemies good sport. Whereupon they (who if at first they had been assailed, would have been heedfull and readie to have received the charge) now sat still (many of them unarmed) to behold this pleasant pastime. The Numidians would gallop toward them, and presently ride back again, but so, as by litle & litle they gained ground, and advanced neerer to the pafe, yet making semblance, as if they had had no rule of their horses, but were caried thither against their wils. At the last, they set spurs to their horses indeed, and brake through the mids of the enemies guards: and so soone as they had recovered the open ground, they set on fire all the houses neere the high way side, and so forward they burnt the next village they came unto, & destroyed all afore them with fire and sword. First the smoke that was desired, afterwards, the outcrie heard of them that were affrighted in the villages, and last of all, the children and old folke that fled to save themselves, made a trouble and hurlyburly in the campe in so much, as every man of himselfe without advise, without warrant or direction, made what hast he could to runne and save his owne. Thus in the turning of an hand, the campe was abandoned, and the Consull delivered from siege, arrived thither where he intended.

But neither Boians nor Spaniards (with whom that yeare the Romanes made warre) were so despitous and maliciously bent against them, as the whole nation of the Aetolians. They at the verie first were in very good hope, that presently upon the remoove of the forces out of Greece, Antiochus would have entred Europe, and seized upon the vacant possession thereof: and that neither Philip nor Nabis would be in rest and doe nothing. But seeing them not to stirre in any place,

A place, they thought it high time to make some trouble and confusion themselves, for feare least by delays and lingering, all their designments would turne to nothing: and therefore they published a Diet or Councell to be holden at Naupactum. In which assembly T. Boas their Pretour, after he had made grievous complaint of the wrongs received by the Romanes, mooving and solliciting the state of Aetolia (for that they of all other nations and cities of Greece, were least honoured and set by after that victorie, whereof they had bene the cause) gave his advise, that there should be embassadours sent to all the neighbour kings, not onely to found their minds and affections, but also to incite and prick them every one forward to enter into armes against the Romanes. So Damocritus was addressed to Nabis, Nicander to Philip, and Dicaearchus the brother of the Pretour unto Antiochus. Damocritus had in commission to signifie unto the tyrant of Lacedaemon, That by the losse of his maritime cities, the very strings and sinews of his tyrannie and kingdome were cut in sunder. For from thence was hee furnished with souldiours, from thence had he his ships and servitours at sea: where as now, hee might see the Achaeans LL, and rulers of Peloponnesus, whiles himselfe was pinned up and enclosed within his walls, and never should he have opportunitie to recover himselfe, if he let passe this that presently was offered unto him. No Romane armie was now in Greece: and never would the Romanes thinke it sufficient cause, to passe over the seas with their legions into Greece, for any occasion of Gytheum or other Laconians inhabiting the sea coasts. These reasons were laid forth to incense the courage of the tyrant, to the end, that when Antiochus was once passed over into Greece, he being touched in conscience, that he had broken the Romane league, by committing outrage upon their allies, might of necessity joine and band with Antiochus. Semblable remonstrances and reasons used Nicander for to provoke and perswade Philip: and much more matter he had to enforce that point, as the king was deposed from much higher degree of estate than the tyrant had been, and also had sustained farre greater losses. To this, he alleadged the auncient name and renowne of the KK, of Macedonia; and how that nation had overrun the whole world, and filled all places with their noble conquests & victories. Moreover he said, That he advised him to take a course, which was safe both to be enterprised, & also easie to be executed. For hee gave not Philip counsell to stirre, before that Antiochus were passed over with an armie into Greece: and considering that hee without the aid of Antiochus had maintained warre so long against the Romanes and Aetolians, what possible meanes had the Romanes to withstand him, assited with Antiochus and the Aetolians his allies, who even then were fiercer enemies than the Romanes? Over and besides, hee inferred this reason also, what a brave and doubtie captaine Anniball was, a man even borne to be an enemy to the Romanes, and who had slaine already more leaders and souldiours of theirs, than were left behind. These were the allegations of Nicander to Philip. As for Dicaearchus, hee had other motives to perswade with Antiochus. First and principally above all others, hee affirmed, That howsoever the prize and bootie of Philip fell to the Romanes, the victorie was gained and archeved by the Aetolians, and none but they either gave the Romanes entrance and passage into Greece; or furnished them with forces for the performance and accomplishment of the victorie. Then hee shewed and made promise what power as well of foote as horse they would present unto Antiochus toward his warres, what places they would give him for his land-forces, and what havens and harbours for his strength and armie at sea. After all this he stuck not (to serve his own turn) for to overreach and tell a lowd lie as touching Philip and Nabis, in giving out confidently that they were both of them ready and at the point to renew war: and would take the vantage of the very first opportunitie and occasion that could be presented, to recover those things which by warre they had lost. Thus the Aetolians laboured to set all the world at once upon the top of the Romanes. Howbeit, the KK were either not moved at all with their solliciting, or bestirred them more slowly than they looked for. But as for Nabis, he sent immediatly about all the townes by the sea side, certeine persons of purpose to sow discord and kindle seditions among them: and some of their principall citizens hee wooon by gifts and presents to his owne purpose and designments: but such as stidly continued fast and firme in alliance and allegiance with the Romanes, those he made away and murdered. Now had T. Quintus given in charge and commission to the Achaeans, for to guard all the Laconians that dwelt upon the sea coasts: and therefore presently they both dispatched their embassadors unto the Tyrant, to put him in mind of the confederacie and association with the Romanes, and to warne him and give him advertisement, that in no wise he would trouble that peace, which he had so earnestly craved and sought for: and also sent aid unto Gyttheum, which now the tyrant began to assault; yea, and addressed other embassadors also to Rome to geve intelligence of these occurrences.

Antiochus the king after he had that winter time given his daughter in mariage to Ptolemaeus the king of Egypt at Rhaphia a citie in Phoenicia, retired to Antiochia; and in the very end of the same winter, passed through Cilicia over the mountaine Taurus, and came to Ephesus. And from thence in the beginning of the Spring, after he had sent his sonne Antiochus into Syria for to defend and keepe in obedience the utmost frontiers of his kingdome, least in his absence there might arise some troubles behind his back, he marched with all his land-forces against the Pisidians, who inhabit about * Selga.

At the same time the Romane embassadors P. Sulpitius and P. Villius, who as we said before had ben sent unto Antiochus with direction, first to visit king Eumenes, arrived at * Elrea, and from thence went up to * Pergamus, where Eumenes kept his royall court. Eumenes was desirous in his heart that Antiochus should be warred upon: supposing verily, that if he were at peace, being a prince so much mightier than himselfe, he would be but an ill and dangerous neighbour so neere unto him: but if warre were once afoote, that he would be no more able to beard and match the Romanes than Philip had ben: and that either he should wholly be overthrowne and come to utter ruine; or if, being vanquished he had peace given unto him by the Romanes; then, as he lost much thereby and would be weaker, so himselfe should gaine by the bargain, and grow mightier, that afterwards he might be able easily of himselfe to make his part good, and hold his owne against him, without the help and aid of the Romanes: or if any misfortune should happen unto him, he were better by farre, to hazard any fortune whatsoever in the Romane societie, than either alone to endure the lordly dominion of Antiochus & be subject, or in refusing to obey, be compelled thereto by force and armes. For these causes he employed all the credit and authoritie he had, yea and addressed all counsell that he could devise for to prick on and set forward the Romanes in this warre. Sulpitius remained behind sick at Pergamus. But Villius advertised that the king was occupied and busied in the Pisidian warre, went to Ephesus: and whiles he abode there some few dayes, he endeavored and made meanes to have conference oftentimes with Anniball, who haply at that time sojourned there, both to sound his mind if possibly he could, and also to secure him of all feare from the Romanes. In these meetings and communications, no other thing passed nor was done between them. But see what ensued hereupon of it selfe, as if it had bene a thing wrought and compassed of meere pollicie. Anniball by this meanes was lesse set by and in smaller credit with the king, yea and in all matters began to be more and more suspected and had in jalousie. Claudius (the Historian) who followeth the greeke bookes of Acilius, writeth that P. Africanus was joyned in that embassage, and that he talked and devised with Anniball at Ephesus: and namely maketh report of one conference and speech betweene them twaine: and that is this. Africanus demanded of Anniball, whom in his judgement, he tooke to have bene the greatest commaunder for seates of armes, that ever was: to which he made answer, that he judged Alexander the king of the Macedonians was simply the most excellent warrior; in this regard, that he with a small power had defeated innumerable armies; and besides had passed as farre as to the utmost bounds of the whole earth, even to those lands, that a man would think incredible, for any one to reach unto. And when he asked againe whom he deemed worthie to stand in the second place: he answered, that Pyrhus was the man; for that he first taught how to pitch a camp, and above all other points of military skill, no man knew better to choose out commodious ground and places of advantage, or more cunningly to plant and dispose garisons: besides he had such cast and a dexteritie, to draw and win men unto him, that the Italian nations had leiser have bene subject to him a foreine prince, than to live under the people of Rome, notwithstanding they had of long time the seignorie and rule of those parts. And when he proceeded still to know whom he reputed for the third, he made no sticking at the matter but named himselfe. Whereupon Scipio tooke up a laughter and replied againe: What would you say then, if your hap had bene to have subdued me? Mary then quoth he, I would thinke I were worthy to be set before Alexander, before Pyrhus, yea and before all other martiall men and commanders in the whole world. At this answer, Scipio tooke delight and pleasure, to see how suttely and cautelously he had like a cunning Carthaginian, couched his words in a certeine kind of flatterie, as if he had sequestred him from out of the raunge and ranke of

A of all other captaines, as being by many degrees incomparable, and farre above all others. Then Villius went forward from Ephesus to Apamea: and thither Antiochus also repaired for to meete him, hearing of the coming of Romane legates. In this communication and conference at Apamea, the matter was debated much after the same sort, as it had bene at Rome betweene Quintus and the kings embassadors. But the newes of Antiochus the kings sonne his death (whom I said a little before to have bene sent into Syria) brake off the peace. Great mourning and sorrow there was in the kings court, and much was that yong prince missed and moaned. For, that good prooffe he had given of himselfe, that if he had lived any long time, he would have proved by all likelihood of his towardnesse, a great, a mightie, and a righte censing king. The derer and better beloved he was of all men; the more suspicious was his death: and namely B that his father doubting: that he would presse forward and be instant to succeed him in his old age, tooke order by the ministry of certein Eunuches or gueldded men (persons greatly accepted with kings for such services) to have him poisoned. And they say, that another cause also set him forward to commit this secret act, because having geven the citie Lyfimachia to his sonne Selenus, he had no such place to bestow upon Antiochus his sonne, for to keepe his residence in, whereunto he might have removed him farther off from his owne person, under colour of doing him honor. Howbeit, great semblance and shew there was of much mourning and lamentation all over the court for certein daies: in so much as the Rom. embassador retired himselfe to Pergamus, because he was loth to converse there uncivilly, at so unseasonable a time. The king returned to Ephesus, and gave over the war that he had enterprised. Where, the court gates being C shut by occasion of the mourning time, he devised and consulted in great secret with one Adanio, an inward friend unto him, and whom of all other he loved best, and trusted most. This Adanio, a meere stranger and altogether ignorant in foreine affaires and forces, measuring & esteeming the power and greatnes of the king by his exploits done in Syria or in Asia, deemed verily, that Antiochus had not only the better cause, in that the Romanes demanded unreasonable conditions; but also should have the upper hand in the triall thereof by warre. When as now the king refused to have any conference and dispute with the embassadors, either for that he knew by good experience that it would be bootlesse for him so to do, or because he was troubled in spirit upon this late and fresh object of griefe and sorrow: Adanio undertooke the businesse, and professed that he would speake to the point of the matter & to good purpose: and so persuaded the king to send for the embassadors from Pergamus. By this time Sulpitius was recovered of his sickness, and therefore both of them repaired to Ephesus, where Adanio executed the king, and D in his absence they began to treat about their affaires. Then Adanio with a premeditate oration began in this wise. I see well (qd. he) that you Romanes pretend unto the world a goodly title of setting free the cities of Greece, but your deedes are not answerable to your words: and ye have set downe unto Antiochus one manner of law to be tied unto, and practise your selves another. For how cometh it about that the Smyrneans & Lampfacenes should be Greekes, more than E the Neapolitanes, the Rhegines, and Tarentines, of whom you exact tribute and require ships, by virtue of the accord and covenants betweene you? Why send you yeerely to Saracose and other Greeke cities of Sicily, a Pretor in soveraigne authority, with his rods and axes? Certes, ye have nothing els to say, but that ye have subdued them in warre; and by right of conquest have imposed these conditions upon them. The like, yea and the same cause know ye that Antiochus allegedh as concerning Smyrna, Lampfacus, and other cities had states of Ionia & Aeolis: For he having been conquered in war by his ancestors & progenitors, having I say been made tributarie and taillable, he chalengeh of them the aunient rights & duties due from them, and to him belonging. And therefore if ye wil debate and treat the question according to aequitie and reason, and not rather pick quarrels and seeke occasions of war, I would gladly know what ye will answer to him in this point? To this Sulpitius made answer in this wise. Antiochus (quoth he) hath done very well, & with good regard of modestie, in that having no other matter to plead unto for his defense & the maintenance of his cause, he hath made choise of any other rather than himselfe to be the speaker. For what one thing is there alike in those cities which you have named and put in comparison? Of the Rhegines, Neapolitanes and Tarentines, we demanded that which is due according to the deeds of covenants entered, and hath ever bene since time that first they were in subjection under us; that I say which we have chalenged & enjoyed by virtue of one continued course and tenor of right, by us ever practised without any intermission or interruption. And

And are you able to avouch, that as those nations neither by themselves nor by any other, have altered and chaunged the accord betwene us and them; so the cities of Asia, when they once became subject to the aunccestors of Antiochus, remained alwaies in the perpetuall possession of your kingdom? And not rather, that some of them have bene under the obedience of Philp, and others obedient to Ptolomee? Yea and divers of them for many yeeres have been free and used their owne liberties without contradiction, and no words or doubt made thereof? For admit this once, that (because these cities sometime were in bondage through the iniquitie of those times wherein they were oppressed) there shall be a right pretended, and the same benefectually to reduce them againe after so many ages into servitude? What wanteth it but ye may as well say, that we have done just nothing, in delivering Greece out of the hands of Philp? and that his successours and posteritie, may claime againe and lay title to Corinth, Chalcis, Demetrius, and the whole Thessalian nation? But what meane I to maintaine the cause of the cities of Greece, whome it were more meet and reasonable, that both wee and the king himselfe would give audience unto, and let them plead what they can for their owne selves? With that he commaunded the embassages of the cities to be called in, which were prepared and instructed aforehand by Eumenes, who made this reckoning, that whatsoever strength went from Antiochus, should accrue and come unto him and his kingdom. Many were admitted to speake: & whiles every one set forward his owne cause, some by way of complaint, others in manner of demaund, each one putting in for himselfe without regard of right or wrong, so he served his owne tune, they fell at length from reasoning to warbling and wrangling: in so much, as the Embassadors returned to Rome as uncertaine and doubtfull in all matters as they were when they came, without releasing or obtaining any one thing at all.

When they were dismissed and gone, the king held a councell as touching the Romane war. In which assembly, some delivered their opinion more freely and stoutly than others: but generally the more bitter speech that any one used against the Romanes, the greater hope he had to enter into especiall grace and favour with the king. One above the rest, inveighed much and spake against those proud and insolent demaunds of the Romanes, who imposed hard lawes and conditions upon Antiochus, the mightiest king of all Asia, as if he had bene no better than Nabis, whome they had conquered and subdued. And yet (saith he) they left unto Nabis some feignorie and dominion in his owne countrey and citie of Lacedaemon: whereas if Lamplacum and Smyrna should be at the command of Antiochus, they deemed that an unworthy thing and a very indignitie. Others opined and said, that those two cities were but small causes, and not woorth the naming, for so puissant a prince to stand upon and to warre for. But alwaies (say they) men begin with just and reasonable demaunds, to make an overture and way to compasse and obtaine that which is unjust. Unless one would beleve, that when the Persians requested of the Lacedaemonians, water and earth, they stood in need of a clor and turfe of ground, ora draught of water. In like sort for all the world the Romanes doe but sound and trie the king, in their demaunds touching these two cities. For other cities likewise, so soone as they shall perceive that those two have shaken off the yoke of obedience, will soon revolt and turne to that people which is their deliverer, and at whose hands they hope for libertie. And say, that freedome were not to them more deare and pretious than bondage, yet it is the nature of every man to feed and please himselfe with a bare hope of a chaunge and new world, much more than with the assured hold of any present state whatsoever. There was in place at this councell, Alexander of Acarnania, one who sometime had friended Philp; but of late daies was fallen from him and followed the court of Antiochus, a more wealthie and magnificent prince: and being taken for a politician who had a speciall insight into the state of Greece, and was not ignorant of the affaires of Rome, had wound himselfe into high favour and inward friendship with the king, that he was taken into be one of his privie counsell, and acquainted with all his secrets. This man, as if the question in hand had bene, nor, Whether war should be levied or no; but, Where, and by What means, and How it should be managed, spake aloud and said, That he made full reckoning and account in his very spirit and heart of the victorie, in case the king would passe the seas over into Europe, to plant and settle himselfe in some part of Greece, and there wage warre: for at his verie first comming hee should see in armes already the Aetolians, that inhabit the very heart and centre of Greece, who would be the only chieftaines and port-ensignes to march before them, readie to venture and enter upon the most difficult and daungerous enterprises of war. Again, in the two cantons and angles as it were thereof, he should find Nabis of the one side from Peroponneseus, at hand to rise and raise those quarters, with intent to regaine the citie of the Argives, to win againe the maritime cities, which the Romanes have disseized & dispossessed him of, and have mued and shut him within the walls of Lacedaemon. On the other side from Macedonice, Philp would no doubt take armes, so soone as he shall heare the first alarme and sound of trumpet. Full well (qd. he) know I his courage, & of what spirit and stomacke he is: right well I wote that he hath fostered in that brest of his for a long time, anger & despite; like to these wild and savage beasts, which either are kept within yron grates, or fast tyed and bound: and as well I remember, how many a time he was wont (during the wars) to pray heartily to all the gods, to vouchsafe for to give him Antiochus for his helper and assistant: and if now hee might enjoy his wish, and have the thing so long desired and praied for, hee would without any delay, enter into armes and warre incontinently. Onely (quoth Alexander) we must not linger and stay nor drive off, for as much as herein consisteth the very point of victorie, even betimes to seize upon commodious places of advantage, before the enemies be possessed of them. Also with all speed, Anniball is to be sent into Affricke, whereby the Romanes may be distracted, & compelled to turne themselves sundry waies. Anniball only was not called to this counsell; for by reason of the foresaid conferences with Villius, the king had him in some jealousie, and therefore he was out of favour, and of no credit and account with him. At the first, he put up this disgrace and made no words, but afterwards hee thought it a better course, both to demaund the cause of so suddaine strangeness and alienation of his, and also to take some good time to excuse and purge himselfe. And therefore upon a day having simply asked of the king, and heard the cause of his anger toward him. My father Amilcar (qd. he) o Antiochus, when upon a time he sacrificed unto the gods, caused me (a verie little one) to be brought and presented before the altar, where he forced me to touch the same with my hand, & to take an oath, Never to be friend unto the people of Rome. To accomplish and fulfill this oath, I maintained the wars for the space of sixe and thirtie yeere; by vertue of this oath, in time of peace I was driven out of my native country; and being fled from thence, this oath brought me into your court: and by the guidance & direction of this oath, if you should disappoint me of my hope, yet whersoever I know there are forces, whersoever I heare there is any stirring and rustling of armes, I shall seeke all the world over, untill I find some Romane enemies. And therefore, if there be any of your Courteors that have a mind and desire to advance themselves in your good grace, and would grow by carrying tales and accusing me unto you, let them find some other subject and matter to doe this by me: for I hate the Romanes, and am likewise hated of them. That this is truth which I say, my father Amilcar and the gods in heaven, can testifie. Wherefore, whensoever you shall thinke to make war with the Romanes, see you entertaine Anniball for one of your greatest and most assured friends: but if any occurrent shall force you to peace, seeke some other counsellor and not me, to consult withall about that point. This speech was so effectually, that not onely it prevailed with the king, but also reconciled Anniball unto his grace. And so they departed out of the councell with a full resolution to make warre.

At Rome it was commonly talked and discoursed, that Antiochus was an enemy, but no provision and preparation there was for warre, but onely whetting the edge of their stomackes. For both Consuls had no other province but Italic assigned unto them to governe. And they were either to agree between themselves, or els to cast lots, whether of the twaine should hold the generall assembly, and be president of the election for that yeere. And he whose hap was not to be charged with that businesse, was to bee in readinesse to lead forth the legions into any place out of Italic, as need should require. And to this Consull it was permitted to enroll two new legions of citizens, and besides of allies and Latines twentie thousand foot, & eight hundred horse. To the other Consull were appointed those two legions, which L. Cornelius the Consull of the former yeere had under his governance: also of allies and Latines fifteen thousand footmen out of the same armie, and five hundred horse. As for Q. Minutius, his commission was continued full for the conduct of that armie which hee had in Liguria. And for to supply and make up the broken companies, he was allowed to enroll foure thousand Romane footmen, and one hundred and fiftie horse, and likewise to levie of the allies five thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horse for that service. To Cn. Domitius it fell by lot, that he should goe with a power out of Italic, whithersoever the Senat gave order; and unto Quintius to governe Gaul. Then the Pretours election election followed, who likewise cast lots for their provinces. M. Fulvius Centimalus had the civil jurisdiction, and L. Scribonius Libo the forraigne. L. Valerius Tappus governed Sicilie, Q. Salpinx Sarra, Sardinia: M. Babius Tamphilus high Spaine, and A. Attilius Serranus the balc. But these two chaunged their provinces, first by an order from the Senate, and afterwards by an act also of the Commons. For to Attilius Macedonia was assigned and the navie, and to Babius the countrey of the Brutij. Flaminius and Fulvius continued in the government and commaund of Spaine, and to Babius Tamphilus for the rule of the Brutij, were those two legions appointed which the yeere before lay in the citie, with commission to take up and levie of allies fiftene thousand foot, and five hundred horse to go thither. Aulus Attilius had in charge to cause thirtie galleaces to bee made with five banckes of oares on a side, and to take out of the harbours and dockes as many old vessels as were fit for service, and to enrol mariners and rowers. The Consuls also were enjoined to deliver unto him two thousand allies of the Latine nation, and a thousand Romane footmen. It was commonly voiced, that these two Pretours with two armies both by land and at sea, were prepared against Nabis, who openly now assailed the confederates of the people of Rome. But still the embassadors were looked for, who had been sent unto king Antiochus, and the Senate commaunded the Consull Domitius not to depart from the citie before their returne. The Pretours, Fulvius and Scribonius, whose charge it was to minister law and execute justice in Rome, had commission to provide a hundred galleaces, besides that fleet which Attilius was to commaund. But before that either Consuls or Pretors went forth into their provinces, there was a procession holden, in regard of the prodigies and fearefull sights that were reported. For word was brought out of Picenum, that a shee goat had yeared sixe kids at once, and that it rained earth at Amitemum; and at Formia, that a gate and wall of the citie were smitten with lightening; and that which most of all troubled and frighted the Consull Domitius that an ox spake these words, ROME, TAKE HEED TO THY SELF. In regard of the other prodigious tokens, there was a supplication holden: but as for the ox, the Soothsayers & bowel-priests gave commaundement, that he should with great care be kept & nourished. The Tyber also with more violence overflowed into the citie than in the former yeere, and overthrew two bridges and many buildings, especially about the gate Flumentana. Moreover, a mightie huge stone shaken out of the Capitoll cliffe, fell from thence into the street called Iugarium, either by the force and violence of raine, or some earthquake (which if there were any, was so little, that it could not be perceived) & that stone killed many a man. In the countrey also, by reason of this deluge, much cattell was carried away with the flood, and many farme houses and graunges were borne downe and laid along.

Before that L. Quintius the Consull was arrived into his province, Q. Minutius fought a battell with the Ligurians in the territorie of Pise, and slue nine thousand enemies; the rest he discomfited, put to flight and chased into their campe, which being assailed, was defended manfully with much fighting untill darke night and then the Ligurians slipt away in the night season secretly. And by the dawning of the next day the Romans entred & seised therof when it was empty of the enemies. Lesse pillage was there found, for that ever and anone what booties soever they gate in the countrey they sent home to their houses. Minutius notwithstanding gave the enemies no repose from that time forward. For being departed out of the territorie of Pise he came into Liguria, where he destroyed their borroughes and castles, and put all to fire and sword. There the Romane souldiours filled their hands with the Tuscan prizes, sent thither by the forragers and robbers.

Much about this time the embassadors returned to Rome, from the King who brought word and made relation of nothing that was sufficient to enforce them to proceed in any hast to warre, but onely against the Lacedaemonian tyrant, by whom (as the Achaean embassadors also gave intelligence) the sea coasts of Laconia were wronged and assailed, against the covenants of the league. Whereupon Attilius the Pretour was sent with a fleet to defend the associates. And for as much as there was no imminent perill from Antiochus, it was thought good, that both the Consuls should goe into their provinces. Domitius tooke his journey, and went the nearest way by Ariminum, and Quintius came into the Boians countrey by the way of Liguria. And these two Consuls armies in divers quarters, wasted all abroad the enemies countrey. At the first some few of their gentlemen and horsemen, together with their captaines; afterwards, all those of Senatours calling; and last of all, as many as were of any haviour, worth and worship, to the number

Likewise in both Spaines that yeere, the affaires went prosperously: for not onely C. Flaminius won by force of mantelets and engines of batterie the rich and strong towne Litabrum, & tooke prisoner alive their lord Corribilo a noble prince, but also M. Fulvius the Proconsul fought with two armies of the enemies twise, and put them to the worse; and woon by assault two townes of the Spaniards Vescelia and Holone, with many other fortresses: the rest of themselves revolted unto him. After this hee made a journey into the Oretanes countrey, and there having gotten two townes, Noliba and Cusibi, he set forward and marched to the river Tagus. In that quarter there stood Toletum, a small citie, but strongly seated: while he assaulted it, there came a mightie armie of the Vectones to aid the Toletanes, with whome hee fought a set field, and woon the day, and having defeated the Vectones, hee forced the Toletanes with engines of batterie, and woon the towne.

But all the warres which at that time were in hand, nothing troubled the LL. of the Senate, so much as the expectation of the war, which Antiochus had not yet begun and enterprised. For albeit they had ever and anone certaine advertisement and intelligences of all things by their embassadors, yet many flying tales and headlesse bruits there went without any certaine authors, reporting lies as well as truths. And among the rest there ran a rumor, that Antiochus, so soone as he was come into Aetolia, would presently put over a fleet into Sicilie. Whereupon the Senat, notwithstanding they had sent Attilius the Pretor with a fleet into Greece, yet forasmuch as there was need not of forces onely, but also of authoritie to entertain the hearts and affections

C of their allies, they sent over T. Quintius, Cn. Octavius, Cn. Servilius, and P. Villius, as embassadors into Greece, and gave order, that M. Babius should advance his legions out of the countrey of the Brutians, toward Tarentum and Brundisium, that from thence if need required, hee might saile over into Macedonia. Moreover, that M. Fulvius the Pretour should put out a fleet of thirtie saile, for the defence of the coast of Sicilie, and that the admirall thereof should have full commission there to commaund (now L. Oppius Salinator, who the former yeere had bene one of the Aediles of the Commons, had the conduct of those ships). Also, that the same Pretour should adresse his letters unto L. Valerius his Colleague, and advertised him that it was to bee feared, that the armada of king Antiochus would crosse over out of Aetolia into Sicilie; and therefore it was the will and pleasure of the Senate, that hee should take up and enroll into that armie which hee had alreadye, of tumultuarie souldiours twelve thousand footmen, and foure hundred horse, by whose means he might defend that coast of the province which looketh toward Greece. For the levie of these forces, the Pretour tooke musters not onely in Sicilie, but also in the Isles adjacent and lying thereabout, and fortified with good garrisons all the townes upon the sea side which lie toward Greece. Those rumours aforesaid were fed still and maintained by the coming of Attalus the brother of Eumenes, who reported that king Antiochus was passed over Hellespontus with an armie: and that the Aetolians were in that forwardnesse, that they would beeprest and readie in armes against his arrivall. Great thanks were given as well to Eumenes in his absence, as to Attalus there present in place. Also order was taken, that he should have a lodging allowed him at his pleasure, and his charges borne for his diet and housekeeping. Moreover, there were given him as presents, two great horses of service, two paire of horsemens armours, as much silver plate as amounted to an hundred pound weight; and of gold plate, as much as weighed twentie pound.

And for as much as messengers one after another advertised and gave warning, that war was at hand, it was thought requisite and expedient, that the new Consuls should be chosen in all convenient speed: whereupon a decree passed from the Senat, that M. Fulvius the Pretor should forthwith dispatch his letters unto the Consull, to certifie him of the Senates pleasure, namely, that he should commit the government of his province and the armie unto his lieutenants, and remove himselfe unto Rome, and in his way send out his writs aforehand for the publishing of an assembly generall for the election of Consuls. The Consull obeyed these letters, directed forth his summons in manner aforesaid, and came so Rome. In this yeere also great ambition there was, and much suite for the dignitie of government. For that three noblemen stood for one place, namely P. Cornelius Scipio the sonne of Cneus, who the former yeere had the repulse, L. Cornelius Scipio, and Cn. Manlius Volso. The Consullship was conferred upon P. Scipio, so as it might appeare to the whole world, that this honour was deferred onely, and not fully denied to so worthe a perso-a personage. His adjoinct companion in government was M. Acilius Glabrio, a man by calling G a commoner. The morrow after were the Pretours chosen, to wit, L. Aemilius Paulus, M. Aemilius Lepidus, M. Iunius Brutus, A. Cornel. Mammula, C. Livinus, and L. Oppius, both surnamed Salinator. This Oppius was he that had the conduct into Sicilie of a flecte of thirtie saile. Meane while that these new Magistrates cast lots for the government of their provinces, M. Babius was commaunded to passe over with all his power from Brundisium into Epirus, and to keepe his forces about Apollonia. And M. Fulvius the Pretor of the citie had in charge to build fiftie new Galeaces called Quinqueremes, of five banks of ores on either side. And thus verily the people of Rome was provided against all enterprises and attempts of king Antiochus whatsoever.

Neither was Nabis behind for his part in levying warre; but assailed with great force the towne of Gytheum; and of a mischeivous and malicious mind against the Achæans, for sending H a garison to aid the besieged townesmen, he forraied & wasted their countrie. The Achæans durst not go in hand with warre, before their embassadours were returned from Rome, and untill they might know the pleasure & wil of the Senat: but after the return of those embassadours, they both published a Diet and generall Counsell at Sicyone, and also sent their embassadours to Quintius for his advise and counsell. In this Diet, all their opinions inclined and tended to make warre out of hand: only the letters of T. Quintius made some stay of the enterprise, wherein he advised them to expect the Pretor and navie of the Romanes. Now when the States there assembled in counsell were distracted, some persisting still in their former opinion, and others of mind to take with them the advise of him unto whom they had sent for counsell: the multitude at length looked what Philopamenes would say in that behalf. The Pretor he was for the time, and in those I daies surpassed all other in wisdome & authoritie. Then he rose up and used this preface & said, That it was a good custome among the Ætolians, and well ordeined and provided, that the Pre- tour himselfe in all consultations of warre should not deliver his owne opinion; and therefore 33 willed them of their selves to resolve and determine with all speede possible what they pleased. As for the Pretor, saith he, he will be readie to execute with fidelitie and carefull diligence their 33 decrees accordingly: yea and indeavor, so farre forth as mans pollicie may reach unto, that they 33 shal not repent of their resolution, be it war or peace. This brief speech of his was more forcible and effectually to incite them to take armes, than any persuasive oration, wherein he openly could have shewed his desire to follow the warres. And therefore with exceeding accord of all K in generall they agreed upon warre. As for the time and meanes of managing the same, it was wholly referred to the discretion of the Pretor, to use his owne libertie & pleasure. Philopamenes, besides that Quintius so advised, was also himself minded to wait for the Romane flecte which on the sea side might defend Gytheum: but fearing again that their present necessity could abide no delays, and least not only Gytheum should be lost, but the garison also miscarie; which was sent to the defence of the warre, he set afoore and put to the sea the Achæans shipping. The Tyrant likewise had rigged and dressed a small flecte to empeach any aid and succors that haply might be sent to the besieged by sea; to wit, three covered ships with hatch and deck, three Bri- 33 gantines or Pinnaces, and as many Gallions. For the old ships were by composition and cove- nant delivered up to the Romanes. And to make prooffe and triall of these new vessels, how swift and nimble they were, and withall to see how all things els were well fitted for a battaile, if neede L were; he made every day certeine shewes and representations of fight at sea, and exercised both mariners and souldiours by such kind of false alarmes: supposing that herein principally con- sisted the hope of his siege, in case he could cut off all their aid from the sea side. Now the Pretor of the Achæans, as he was egall to any of the best and most renowned commanders and cap- taines of that time in land service, either for expetience and practise; or wit and pollicie: so at sea he was but a novice and a learner, as being an Arcadian borne, an Inlander farre within the maine, and ignorant besides of all foreine forces, but that he had borne armes and served a little in Candie, whiles he had the leading there, of some aid-souldiers. One old Gallie there was M a Quadrireme, taken at sea 80 yeeres before, at what time as she carried Nicola the wife of Craterus from Naupactum to Corinth. And having heard much talke of this ship (for indeed she had bene sometime of great name in the kings royall flecte) he commaunded her, all rotten as she was now, and readie to fall in peeces, to be shot into the sea from out of the Bay of Argium. This ship as admirall, made way before the rest, wherein Tiso of Patra, a capitaine generall of a flecte was aboard; and encountered the ships of the Laconians; making saile from Gytheum. And

A And at the first she chaunced to affront and run against a new strong ship, and being old of her selfe, leaking and taking water at every joynt, she was rent asunder and fell apieces. All with- in her were taken prisoners. The rest of the flecte having lost their captaine, fled as fast as pos- sibly their ores could make speede and away. Philopamenes himselfe was in a light foist, trigot or pinke, and fled amaine, and never stayed untill he was arrived at Patra. This mishap nothing discouraged and abated the heart of this martiall warriour, who had run through many and sundrie adventures: but contrariwise wrought this effect, that he assured himself and said, That if he were overtaken and put to the worse in service at sea, wherein he had no skill, he would so much the rather quit himselfe to upon the land (where he had such experience and was so re- adie) as that the Tyrant should not long joy and make boast of his winnings. Nabis puffed up with pride of his fortunate victorie, and perswading himselfe assuredly that he had no cause to feare any more danger from the sea, purposed likewise to stop up all the avenues & passages by land; and therefore beset all the wayes betimes with strong guards, which he bestowed in conve- nient places. And retiring with a third part of his forces from the siege of Gytheum, he encam- ped before Pleia. This is a place that overlooketh and commaundeth Leuca and Acra, by which wayes it seemed that the enemies would make their approach with their armie. Whiles he kept a standing camp there, and few of his souldiours were provided of tents and pavilions, and the rest of the common sort had made them cabins of reedes, wound and interlaced one within another, and the same covered with leaves only to geve them some shade; Philopame- nes devised, before that he were discovered and came in sight of the enemies, to assault them at C unawares and not looking for his comming, after a new fashion of warre that they little doubted. Certeine small craies or boats he got together into a secret blind bay, lying within the territorie of Argos: in which he bestowed certeine souldiours nimble appointed, most of them having round bucklers, with slings, darts, and such like offensive light weapons. From thence he coasted along the river neere the shore, untill he was come to the promontorie or cape adjoining close to the enemies camp: then he went a land, and by knownen wayes he came by night unto Pleia: and whiles the watch was fast asleepe, as mistrusting no such feare neere hand, he set fire upon the cabins aforesaid in every quarter of the camp. Many men were consumed with the fire before they wist that the enemy was come: and they that were ware of them, had no meanes to help and save their fellows: so with fire and sword all went to wrack. Some very few escaped out of D this extremitie of danger, and fled to the maine camp before Gytheum. Thus Philopame- nes having discomfited and frighted his enemies, led his armie forthwith to wast Tripolis in the territorie of Laconia, bounding fast upon the confines of the Megalopolitanes: and ha- ving driven from thence great prizes of men and cattail, hee departed before that the Tyrant could send any guards from thence for the defence of the countrie. And when hee had gathered and assembled his armie at Tegea, and published and made knowne unto the Achei and other Allies, a Diet or generall counsell to be holden there, whereat also were the chiefe States of the Epirots and Acarnanians: he determined (for as much as both the hearts of his owne people were sufficientlie recovered after the disgrace and shamefull dishonor received at sea; and also the courages of his enemies well cooled and they affrighted) to leade his forces E against Lacedemon: supposing that, the onely meanes to draw the enemy away from the siege of Gytheum. And first hee encamped before Caria within the enemies ground. But that very day was Gytheum forced by the enemies and won. Philopamenes nothing ware thereof, set forward, and encamped neere Barbothesenes, a mountaine, ten miles from Lacedemon. Nabis also, having gained Gytheum, departed from thence with his armie light- ly appointed; and marching apace beyond Lacedemon, seized upon a place, called, The Camp of Pyrrhus: which hee made no doubt but that the enemies intended to be posses- sed of. And then from thence he went to meete them. Now by reason of the narrow way, they took up in their march almost five miles of ground in length. At the taile of the armie were the horsemen, and especially, where the aid-souldiers marched: because Philopamenes thought, F that the tyrant would charge his men behind with his mercenarie souldiours, in whome hee reposed his greatest trust. Two things fell out contrarie to his expectation at once, which troubled him much: the one was, that the place was gotten by the enemies before, which hee intended to have seized upon for his owne advantage: the other was, for that hee saw the enemy affront his vaward in a place so rough and rugged, that without the gaid of his light- armed armed souldiours, he could not possibly march forward and aduance his ensignes. Now Philopemenes had a singular dexteritie and skill, yea and great experience in leading an armie, and in making choice of his ground either to pitch or fight: and not onely in time of warre, but also in peace, he busied his head and employed himselfe principally therein. His manner was, when he rode forth any whither and was come to a streight passage hard to passe through, to looke every way, and diligently to view and consider the situation and posture of the place on all sides: and if he were alone, to cast about and devise wth himselfe; but if there were any in his companie, to aske their aduise, in this wise: What if the enemy appeared and shewed himselfe in that place? How if he came affront or aslanke on this or that side? nay, How if he should charge upon our backe, what were best to be done? It may be the enemies will encounter vs directly ranged in battaile array; it may be they march disorderly and loosely, minding nothing els but their way, and to trauaile on. Thus I say, would he either devise with himselfe or seeke aduise of other, what place he were best to seaze for his owne purpose and commoditie: also what number of armed men hee should need to employ; or what kind of armour and weapons were needfull to use (for therein also lay no small importance.) Moreover, where hee should bestow his carriages? where he should lay his baggage? and where hee should place and dispose of the multitude that were not meet to beare arms? what strength and what manner of guard was needfull for their defence? and whether it were more expedient to goe forward still the way that hee was entred into, or better to goe backe againe as he came? likewise, what ground was meet to be chosen for to pitch his campe upon? what compasse and space were necessarie to be taken up for the fortification of the place? from whence he might have convenient watering? from what quarter he might be best provided of fodder and fewell? Finally against the morrow, which way were safest to remouue the campe? and what forme and manner of march were best? In these courses and discourses, he had from his childhood so inured and exercised his spirits, that hee was neuer to seeke what to doe upon any such sodaine occasion or occurrent presented unto him. And now at this present, seeing his enemies so nere, first and foremost he made a stand with his vauantgard; then he sent out toward the foremost ensignes, his auxiliar Candiores that came to aid him, and those horsemen which they call Tarentine, whose manner is to haue with them, two horses apeece; and then commanding his own men of arms to follow after, he possessed himselfe of a rock standing over a brook or running rill, from whence they might water commodiously: into that place he gathered together all his bag and baggage; there hee bestowed all the pages K and horse-boies, and followers of the campe, whome he environed also with armed men: and as the nature of the place would give him leave, he fortified his campe. But to pitch pavilions in a craggie, rugged, and uneven ground he found much adoe. Now were the enemies about halfe a mile off: and at one and the same riveret they watered both, with the guard of their light armed souldiours: but before that they could scuffle and skirmish together (as commonly they doe when the camps stand so nere one to another) the night overtook them. It appeared plainly there would be some fighting the next day about the brooke for water: and therefore in the night season he bestowed close in a valley, farthest out of sight from the enemies, as many of his targuettiers as possibly the place would containe and hide. When daylight was come, the light armed Candiores and those Tarentine horsemen (of both sides) entred into skirmish upon the verie banks of the brooke. Letemastus the Candiot had the leading of his countrymen; Zycortas the Megapolitane commaunded the light horse. The Candiores, who likewise were auxiliaries and aid-souldiours to the enemies, and the same sort also of the Tarentine horsemen, guarded those that came to water for them. Doubtfull was the skirmish for a good while (as beeing managed and maintained of the one side and the other by men of onenation, and those furnished with the same kind of weapons) but those that were for the Tyrant, were more in number than the other. And by reason that Philopemenes had given charge & direction to the captains, after they had held skirmish a while, to seeme to recule and flie, thereby to traine the enemy into the aforesaid place of ambush; they followed hard in chafe upon them as they fled along within the valley, and most of them were either slaine or wounded before they saw the enemies hidden there within. Now those targuettiers aforesaid, were set in that order (so far forth as the breadth of the valley would permit) that they might easily receive their fellows as they fled, within the spaces betwene their ranks and files. Then at once they arose, fresh in heart, and ordered in good array, and charged upon the enemies, disordered, disbanded, loose, scattered, wearie

A wearie with travell, and faint of their wounds. Then was it out of doubt and past all peradventure where the victorie went: for presently the Tyrants souldiers turned their backs, fled a good deale faster than they made pursuit before, & were beaten into their camp: many were either killed or taken prisoners as they fled; and they had ben put in affright also within the camp, but that Philopemenes commanded to sound the retreat, fearing more the rugged and broken ground, & the disadvantage and difficulties therof, in case he had rashly ventured forward any farther, than he did the enemy. Then he, taking his conjecture by the issue of the fight, & guessing by the nature of Nabis the Generall, in what feare and fright he mought be, sent unto him one of his auxiliaries that were strangers, counterfeiting himselfe to be a renegade revolt, to informe him assuredly, that the Achæans determined the next day to march as far as to the river Eurotas, which runneth hard by the walls of Lacedæmon, for to stop the passage, that neither the tyrant might retire himselfe into the citie when he would, nor any munition or victuals be caried from thence into the campe: moreover, that they would give the attempt, and assay if they could sollicit any of the citizens to revolt from the tyrant. This counterfeite, carried himselfe so in this errand, that the tyrant beleevd not so much his words, as took hold therby of a good pretence & honest occasion for to quit & abandon the campe: and therefore the next morrow, he commanded Pythagoras, with the auxiliarie souldiers and the horsemen, to keepe a good guard about the trench and enclosure of the campe: himselfe in person with the strength of his armie, marched as it were to a battaile, and commanded to aduance forward the ensignes in all hast toward the citie. Philopemenes perceiving that the armie marched so fast through the narrow passage downe the hill, put forth all his owne horsemen and the auxiliarie Candiores, against the guards of the enemies that warded before the campe. They, seeing the enemies to approach, and themselves forsaken of their owne fellows, at first went about to retire within their hold: but afterwards when they perceived the whole armie of the Achæans aduancing against them in order of battaile, fearing that they and their tents should be at once surpris'd, made apace after their owne hoast which was gone a good way before. With that, the targuettiers of the Achæans assailed the campe, entred upon it, and rancked the tents, whiles the rest went forward and pursued the enemies. The way was such, as that an armie at libertie and free from feare of enemies, might hardly and with much adoe rid any ground and march without encumbrance: but so soone as the skirmish began in the taile of the reward, & the noise and cry of them affrighted behind D was heard in the vauantgard: every man made shift for one, flung away weapons, and fled into the woods on either side of the way; and ere one could turne about, all the waies were strewed and choked up with armour and weapons, and especially with darts or javelins, which lighting for the most part with one end full against the enemies, were in stead of a staked or empalled palisade to hinder their passage. Philopemenes having given commaundement to his light armed aid-souldiours to prease forward still, and to follow the chafe as fast as they could (knowing well that the horsemen would have much adoe and trouble in their flight) conducted himselfe the maine armie and heavily charged, by a more open way to the river Eurotas: where hee encamped himselfe a little before the going downe of the sunne, and there he staid for his light appointed souldiours, whome hee had left to follow after the enemies. VVho being E come about the time of the first watch, brought word, that the tyrant with some few was entred into the citie, but the unarmed multitude were disperfed, and wandered all about the Forrest and the woods. Then hee willed them to repose and refresh their bodies: which being done, himselfe chose out of all the souldiours besides (who because they were come first into the campe, had well hartened themselves with taking their refection and some small sleepe) certaine elect and speci- all men, and tooke them forth immediately with him, having about them nothing but their swords, and set them in good order to keepe two port-waies, by which men goe to Phææ & Barbothenes, where he presumed that the enemies would take their way and retire themselves upon their flight: and nothing was hee deceived. For the Lacedæmonians, so long as the daylight lasted, had withdrawne themselves to the middle of the Forrest, through by-lanes and blind paths; F but when the night was once come, and that they descried lights within their enemies camp, they kept themselves aloofe over against them within close and secret lanes; and when they were once passed beyond, and thought all to be in safetie and securitie, they came downe into the more open high waies, where they were received and caught up by their enemies that forelied them in ambush: so they were every where by numbers either killed or taken prisoners; inso much as

scarce one fourth part of their whole armie escaped. Philopemenes having shut up the tyrant G close within the citie, spent almost thirtie daies consequently ensuing, in waiting and spoiling the territorie of the Laconians: and when he had thus weakened and in manner broken the backe of his enemy, he returned home, and the Achaens held him a paragon, and equall to the Romane Generall for glorious deeds of armes, nay, in the service of the Laconian war they preferred him before the other.

During the warre betwene the Achaens and the tyrant, the Romane embassadours, who carefully and diligently visited the cities of the Allies, for feare least the Ætolians had alienated any of their affections from them to king Antiochus, travelled but little in going about to the Achaens, whom by reason of the hatred they bare to Nabis, they hoped verily to be safe & faithfull ynough unto them in all other things. And first they came to Athens, from thence to Chalcis, and so into Thessalie: and after they had conferred with the Thessalians in a frequent counsell of theirs, they turned their way to Demetrias, where there was published a solemne Diet to be holden by the Magnetes. Where they were to frame their speech more curiously than in other places, because certaine of their great men and potentates were estranged from the Romans, and altogether made for Antiochus and the Ætolians. The reason was this, because when news came that Philip his sonne, who was left hostage with the Romans, should be rendered againe unto him, and likewise the tribute remitted which had beene imposed upon him, among other false tales and untruths, it was reported, That the Romans would redeliver Demetrias also into his hands. And rather than that should come to passe, Eurylochus (a principall & chiefe man among the Magnetians) and some others of that faction, desired to have a new world and an alteration, by the coming of the Ætolians and Antiochus. To these Magnetians, they were to couch and place their words so, in ridding them of that foolish vaine feare which they had conceived, that thereby they did not put Philip cleane beside his hope, and so give him occasion to be ill affected unto the Romans; considering that he alone was to them of farre greater importance in all respects, than were the Magnetians, put all together. Thus much onely they said by way of advertisement, That as all Greece generally was much beholden and bound unto the Romans for the benefite of Libertie, which they by their meanes enjoied, so that citie and State especially above all others was obliged unto them. For there, not onely a garrison of Macedonians had been maintained to keepe them in awe, but also the king had built him a roiall pallace, to seat himselfe there, to the end, that they might evermore have in their eie, their lord to command them. But in vaine, and to no purpose was all this, in case the Ætolians brought Antiochus in his steed to make his residence in the house and pallace of Philip; and would needs entertaine a new and unknowne king in lieu of the old, so long a time and so well knowne. The soveraine magistrate of that citie, they call Magnetarches; and for that time Eurylochus was the man: who bearing himselfe big and stout of his high place, said plainly, That hee knew no cause, why either hee or the Magnetians should suppress and smother the rumour that ran so rife touching the deliverie of Demetrias into Philip his hands. For rather than to suffer that, the Magnetians were to oppose themselves, yea, to doe and dare any action whatsoever. And in the vehement heat of speech he went so farre, that inconsiderately hee cast out one word & said, That Demetrias seemed free in outward shew and appearance, but in very truth, was at the command and devotion, yea, and at every becke of the Romans. At this speech there arose a dissonant bruit and murmuring of the assembly, which jarred and varied one from another, whiles some soothed him up, others were offended, and tooke it in great despight, that hee should presume to utter and speake so much. And Quintius was in such an heat of choler therewith, that stretching forth his hands to heaven, he called the gods to witnesse this ingratitude and disloyaltie of the Magnetians. At whose words they were all greatly terrified. Then Zeno one of the chiefe, a man at that time of great authoritie and reputation, as well in regard of the honourable port that he ever carried in the whole course of his life, as also for that he alwaies stood firme and sure to the Romane side, besought Quintius and the rest of the embassadours with teares, Not to impute the folly of one man to the whole citie, for every man is to beare his owne burden, and as he hath bredd, so to drinke, and abide the smart of his owne scratching. As for the Magnetians (saith hee) they acknowledge to owe unto T. Quintius and the people of Rome, not onely their freedome, but all other things els that are most deere and precious unto men. Neither could a man pray or wish at the hands of the immortall gods for any thing, which the Magnetians had not

A not received by their meanes: and sooner would they like franticke persons plucke the very heart out of their own bellies, yea, and teare themselves in peeces, before they would violate and break the amitie which they had with the Romans. This speech of his was followed and seconded with the humble praies of the multitude. Eurylochus departed out of the assembly, and through by-waies and blind lanes recovered the gates, and from thence fled streight into Ætolia. For now by this time, and every day more than other, the Ætolians discovered and shewed themselves how they were affected to revolt. And happily at the same time, T. Boas, a principall personage of that nation, whome they had sent as embassadour to king Antiochus, was newly returned, and brought with him Menippus the kings embassadour. Who, before they had audience given them in a counsell assembled for them, had filled every mans eares and blabbed forth, what forces were prepared both for land and sea, what a mightie power was coming, both of foot and horse, how Elephants were sent for out of India, and above all (wherewith they thought the minds of the people would be most moved) That there was such a masse of gold brought, as would buy all the Romans out and out. It was easie to see what trouble and broile such language might make in the generall diet and assemblie. For the Romane embassadours had intelligence, both of their coming, and of all that ever they did. And albeit there was little hope or none at all to doe any good, yet Quintius thought it not amisse, that some embassadours from the allies and associate cities should be present at that Counsell, such as might admonish and put the Ætolians in mind of the Romane alliance and societie, and not stick to speake their minds frankly, yea, & thwart the king his embassadour. The Athenians of all other were thought the meekest men for that purpose, both in regard of the authoritie and reputation of their citie, and also for the auncient league betwene them and the Ætolians. So Quintius requested them to send their embassadours to the Panætolian parliament. When the assembly was met, and the Counsell set, T. Boas first declared his embassage: and after him was Menippus called in, who being entred in place, spake in this manner: It had been (quoth hee) the best course for all them that inhabite both Greece and Asia, that Antiochus had intermeddled in these affaires, during the upright fortune & entire state of Philip: then, every man had enjoied his owne, and all had not beene reduced to the appetite and devotion, nor brought under subjection of the Romans. And even yet (quoth hee) in case yee persist still in the same mind, and purpose resolutely to accomplish and finish these your designs, and commended enterprises, possible it is by the favor and helpe of the gods, and by the meanes of the Ætolian association, that Antiochus may recover the State of Greece, crased as it is, and much broken, & bring it again to her first fresh hue, to her lively & lightsome lustre, which consisteth in true libertie, even that which is able to stand alone and maintain it selfe, and dependeth not upon the will and pleasure of others. The Athenians, who first (after the kings embassage was delivered) had audience given them and libertie to speake their mind, without making any mention at all of the king, Advertised the Ætolians of the Roman societie, and put them in mind of the favours and good turnes done by Quintius to all Greece in generall: advising them to take heed, that without discretion they overthrow not the welfare thereof, by running rashly and too soone into a new world of strange courses and fine devises: for hote, hasty, and headie counsels are at the first sight and entertainment, pleasant and amiable; in the handling and managing, hard and difficult; in the end and issue, heaveie and dangerous. Consider how the Romane embassadours, and namely Quintius among them, are not far off: and whiles things stand in good termes of integritie, it were better to treat & debate of matters in question and doubt, by words and reasons, than to set all Asia and Europe together to take armes and to make lamentable and deadly warre one upon another. The multitude desirous of a change, enclined altogether, and were wholly devote to Antiochus, being of opinion, that the Romane embassadours were not to be admitted into the Counsell: but the more grave and auncient persons of the nobilitie and states-men, obtained thus much by vertue of their authoritie, That they should have audience graunted unto them. And when the Athenians had made relation of this decree and conclusion passed, Quintius was of mind to go into Ætolia: for this accompt he made, either to obtaine somewhat that he came for, or els to have all gods and men to beare him witnesse, that the Romans would enter into the action of warre justly, and in manner upon constraint and necessity. Quintius being thither come, began at first to discourt before the whole assembly, as touching the societie of the Ætolians with the Romans, and how often they had broken for their parts the faithfull accord betwene them: and when he had so said, he used a brieft speech concerning concerning the right of those cities that were in question. And if they thought that they had any law and reason of their side, how much better (quoth he) were it to send ambassadors to Rome, either to argue and expostulate the matter with them, or to demand their advise (whether they would themselves) than to cause the people of Rome to make warre with Antiochus and the *Ætoli*ans together, not without great trouble of the whole world, and certeine ruine of all Greece? For none should feele the smart and calamitie of this warre sooner than they that are the very causes thereof and began first. Thus spake the Rōmane ambassador by way of prophetic, but in vaine and to no effect. After him Thōas and the rest of that faction, were heard with the generall applause of all: and they effected so much, that without any farther proroging of the Diet, and referring the matter to another day, yea and without staying so long untill the Romanes were out of the place and absent, they concluded to make a decree, by vertue whereof Antiochus (should be sent for to enfranchise Greece, and to decide the quarell betwene the Romanes and the *Ætoli*ans. This decree was not so proud and insolent, but Damocritus their Pretor accompanied it with as arrogant & reprochfull a stump of his own. For when Quintius required of him to see the said decree, he without any respect of the honorable personage of the man, made answer, That for the present time he had somewhat els to do of greater importance; but he would give him the decree & an answer withall shortly, & that within Italie, encamped upon the banke of Tyberis. So great a spirit of senselesse follie in those dayes had possessed the nation of the *Ætoli*ans, and their chiefe magistrates! Then Quintius & the delegates returned to Corinth.

After the Romanes were dismissed, the *Ætoli*ans held no more generall counsell of the whole nation, because they would make semblance and seeme to do nothing of themselves as touching the cause and question of Antiochus, but sit still and expect the coming of the king. Mary, they treated and debated the matter by their Apocleti (for so they call their speciall and privie Counsell which consisteth of certeine elect chosen persons) by what meanes there might be an alteration and change in the affaires of Greece. This was held of all men for certeine, that in every citie and State, the chiefe and the best men generally were for the association of the Romanes, and contented themselves with the present condition wherein they stood: but the multitude and those who had not all things to fall out to their owne good liking, were desirous of a change. And one day above the rest, the *Ætoli*ans entred into a designement and plot, which was not only out of all measure audacious, but also most shamelesse, namely, to surpris and possesse themselves of Demetrius, Chalcis and Lacedæmon. And to each of these cities there was sent one of their principall personages, namely, Thōas to Chalcis; Alexamenus to Lacedæmon, and Diocles to Demetrius. This Diocles had the help and assistance of Eurylochus a banished man (of whose flying away, and the occasion thereof we have spoken before) who otherwise had no hope at all to returne againe into his native countrey. The kinsfolke and friends of Eurylochus & the rest of that faction, upon instructions given them by his letters, willed his wife and children to present themselves in the frequent assemblie of the citizens in habit of mourners, in poore array, and veiled after the manner of humble suppliants, there to beseech them all and some, not to suffer him a guiltlesse person, neither convicted nor condemned, to wax old and pine away in exile. All that were plaine & simple men seemed to be touched with pittie and commiseration. The wicked & seditious persons conceived some hope to make a confusion in the State by these Ætolian troubles: in so much as every one was of opinion & gave his voice, that he should be restored and sent for home. This ground being laid and matters thus prepared, Diocles with his horsemen (for then was he the captaine of the Cavallerie) tooke his journey, under a colour and pretense to reduce and bring home this banished person his host and good friend; and in one day and night traueiled a mightie great journey, and came within sixe miles of the citie. And betimes in the morning by day light, accompanied with three elect troupes he marched forward, commanding the rest of the horsemen to follow after. When he approached the gate, he caused them all to alight on foot and to leade their horses in their hands by the reines of their bridles, and to go without order, resembling travellers & waifaring men, so as they seemed more like to the ordinary train of captain Diocles, than to the men of armes and warriors under his charge: and leaving one of his troupes at the gate, for feare least the horsemen behind might be shut out, he led Eurylochus by the hand, and brought him through the mids of the citie and the market place home to his house: and all the way he was met with many of his lovers and friends that welcomed him, and joyed for his returne. Anon the whole citie

was full of horsemen, and all places of oportunitie and advantage were seized and possessed by them. Which done, divers were sent to massacre the chiefe of the adverse part in their houses. Thus the *Ætoli*ans became maisters of Demetrius.

As for Lacedæmon, they devised in no hand to force the citie, but by some wile to entrap and surpris the tyrant. For seeing the Romanes had despoiled him of all his sea coast townes: and the Achæans driven him within the walls of Lacedæmon, there was no doubt, but who so ever could first take his life from him, should carie away all the thanks, and curry especial favor with the Lacedæmonians. Good occasion and pretense they had to send unto him a power of armed men, for that he had importuned them by his prayers for some aids, considering that by their advise & persuation he had rebelled. So there were given unto Alexamenus a thousand footemen, and thirtie elect horsemen, drawne out of all the floure of the citie. Damocritus the Pretour delivered unto them from the privie counsell of that nation (of which we have before spoken) That they should not beleve that they were to be employed in warre against the Achæans, or in any other service, according as each one might imagine and conceive in his owne head: but he charged them to be readie to performe and execute obediently whatsoever sodain designement Alexamenus upon the present occasion should happen to attempt, were it never so unlooked for, strange, inconsiderate, & audacious: and to rest upon this, That they were sent with him to accomplish that, and for no other purpose. Thus Alexamenus with the conduct of these men thus prepared to his hand, came unto the Tyrant: and no sooner was he arrived, but he possessed him presently with a world of hopes: giving him to understand, That Antiochus was already passed over into Europe; that shortly he would be in Greece, and over-spred all seas and lands with his armies and armadoes; that the Romanes should full well know and find, that they have not now to deale with such an one as Philip; that the numbers of his foote and horses by land cannot be counted, nor his ships at sea numbred; that the battaile of his Elephants at the very first sight will decide the matter and finish the warre. Moreover, that the *Ætoli*ans with all their forces, were ready and prest to come to Lacedæmon, (as neede required) at any time: but indeede, desirous they were to shew and muster before the king at his arrivall, a goodly number of armed souldiours. Nabis therefore himselfe should doe verie well, not to suffer those forces which hee had, to decay with long repose and idleness, but to bring them forth and traine them abroad, make them to run in their armour, thereby both to whet and sharpen their courages, and also to exercise and inure their bodies: for by use and custom, the labour will be lighter; and by the courtesie and graciounes of their Generall, not without delight and pleasure. Hereupon, they began to issue out of the citie, and oftentimes went into the plaine lying hard by the river Euroras. They of the tyrants guard kept commonly in the battaile or middle ward: and himselfe with three horsemen at the utmost (with whom Alexamenus for the most part was) used ordinarily to ride before the ensignes, taking survey and viewing the utmost points and wings of the armie. The *Ætoli*ans were placed in the right wings, as well those that came before to aid the tyrant, as those thousand that were newly arrived with Alexamenus. Now had Alexamenus taken a custome, one while to tourney as it were amongst the rankes before in the companie of the tyrant, and to instruct him in some matters sounding to his commoditie: otherwhiles, to ride to his owne men into the right wing, and soone againe to returne to the Tyrant, as if he had given them charge of somewhat necessarie to be done. But upon that day which was appointed for to doe the feat and murder the tyrant, after hee had ridden forth with the tyrant to the usuall place, and kept him companie a while, he tooke occasion (as his maner was) to make a step aside to his own souldiours; and then he went in hand with those horsemen which were sent with him from out of Ætolia, & said thus unto them: Now sirs, you must adventure & execute that lustily and without delay which you were commaunded to performe by my direction and leading. Be ready with heart and hand, and be not slack and idle to exploit that, which yee shall see me to undertake and enterprise. And looke whosoever he be that either standeth still, or will seeme to argue and interpose his owne wit and advise to cross mine, let him make account, he shall never go home againe to his owne countrey. With that he set them all a quaking, for well they remembered what their charge was when they came forth from home. Now was the Tyrant a coming on horseback from the left wing: Then Alexamenus commanded his horsemen to couch their launces downe, and to have their eye upon him. Hee also ferded himselfe to take a good heart unto him, which was not a little daunted at first with the cogitation tation of so great a desigment that he had projected. When he was now approached and come G neere the tyrant, he ran with full carriere at him, gored his horse, and overthrew himselfe to the ground. He was not so soon unhorsed and laid along, but the horsemen stabbed him with many a thrust; wherof the most part did no harme, considering they were driven against his corslet: but in the end, they found where his bodie was naked & unarmed, so he gave his last gaspe before he could bee rescued by his guard in the maine battaile aforesaid. Then Alexamenus taking with him all the Ætoliens, made all the haste he could to possesse himselfe of the royall palace. The Pensioners and Squires of the bodie, seeing this murder done before their eyes, were at first mightily affrighted: but afterwards perceiving the armie of the Ætoliens to go their waies and depart, they ran to the breathlesse carkase left among them, and of men that should have guarded his bodie and revenged his death, they became a sort of idle gazers and lookers on. And surely there would not a man have once stirred, in case the multitude had immediately been called to an assembly; and if after armes laid downe, they had been entertained by him with some oration or remonstrances framed according to the time. The Ætoliens were kept many together, in armes still, without any outrage or wrong done or offered to any one person. But all things that they did, hastened the speedie ruine and destruction of those that had committed this fact: as it could not otherwise be in all reason, but they should so be served, who had plaid so leaud and treacherous a part. The captaine and ringleader of all this mischief, kept him selfe close shut within the royall pallace, spending both night and day in rising and searching the Tyrants coffers and his treasure. And the Ætoliens for their part also fell to ransacking, as if they had woon that citie by assault, which they made countenance and semblance to set free. The indignitie of these their pranks, the contempt withall and small regard made of them, encouraged and animated the Lacedæmonians to gather together and consult of the matter. Some were of opinion and said, That the Ætoliens were to be thrust out by the head and shoulders, and to be sent away with a mischief, and their owne libertie to be recovered, which under a colour of being restored, was intercepted and taken from them: others advised and said, that for fashion at leastwise, some one of royall blood should be set up for to be the head in this action. Now there was of that race and streene one Laconicus a young child, brought up with the children of the late Tyrant: him they mounted upon horsebacke, and then they tooke armes with all speed, and as many Ætoliens as they could light upon, wandring here & there in the freets, they ran upon and hewed in peeces. Then they assaulted the pallace, where they also murdered Alexamenus, albeit with some few about him he made resistance and defended himselfe. The rest of the Ætoliens gathered together about Chalciceos (which is a chappell of Diana made of brass) and there likewise they were massacred. A few of them flang away their weapons and fled, some escaped to Tegea, and others to Megalopolis*: where being apprehended by the magistrats, they were sold in port sale, to them that would offer most. Philopæmenes hearing of the Tyrants death, went to Lacedæmon, where he found all things out of order and in confusion by reason of feare. And having called forth the principall and chiefe citizens, hee used unto them such a speech, as indeed Alexamenus should have made, and thereby knit the Lacedæmonians in league and alliance with the Achæans: which he effected the sooner, because it chanced even then, that Attalus was come before Gythæum* with four and twentie galleaces of five banks of ores on a side.

About the same time, Thæas had not so good speed before Chalcis: by means of Euthymidas, a great and cheefe man of the citie (one, who by the might and stronger hand of those that sided with the Romans, had been expelled the citie after the coming of T. Quintius and the embassadours or delegates) and also of Herodotus of Canus, a merchant and a man that in regard of his welth & riches bare a great side in Chalcis: Thæas, I say, sped not so well by their means, notwithstanding that the supplicants and part-takers of Euthymidas were well disposed to betray the townes, as Eurylochus did in the surprising and seizing of Demetrias. This Euthymidas from Athens (for there he had made choise to dwell) first came to Thebes, and so from thence went forward to Sal-ganea. Herodotus abode at Thronium, and not farre from thence within the gulfes of Malea, hee had 2000 footmen, and Thæas two hundred horsemen, and about thirtie light Caravels. Which Herodotus was commaunded to set over into the Island Atalanta with sixe hundred footmen, that from thence, when he perceived once the land-forces to approach Aulis and Euripus, hee might cut over to Chalcis. As for themselves, they conducted the rest of the forces in all the haste they could

A could, and most by night journies marched unto Chalcis. Mistio and Xenochides (who had the managing of the affaires in Chalcis, and might doe all in all there, now that Euthymidas was banished) remained in Chalcis, and whither they mistrusted somewhat themselves, or had some inkling and intelligence of the matter, I wor not, but affraid they were at first, and had no other hope at all but by flight to save themselves: howbeit afterwards when their feare was well allaid and settled, seeing evidently, that not onely their owne countrey was betrayed, but also the Roman societie abandoned, they plotted in this wise, and entred into a course as followeth.

It fortunèd at the very same time, that a solemne anniverfarie sacrifice was celebrated at Eretria, to the honour of Diana Amarnthis: to which solemnitie there resorted not onely the inhabitants of those places neere at hand, but also a number of Carystians. Thither they sent certaine Oratours to request and entreat the Eretrians and Carystians, both to take some pittie of their estate, considering they were borne in the same Island, and also to have some regard to the alliance of the Romanes, and not suffer Chalcis to fall into the hands of the Ætoliens: who no doubt, if they might get Chalcis, would not bee long ere they had Eubœa too. Syrlie lords (say they) were the Macedonians, and rigorous, but the Ætoliens would be much more unsupportable. These citie were principally respectie to the Romanes, whose verue and prowesse in warre, whose justice & bountie in victorie they had lately experience of, & therefore both States armed the flower and manhood of all their youth, and sent them. The townesmen of Chalcis having committed the guard of their walls to these, went forth themselves with all their forces, passed over Euripus, and encamped neere Salganea. From which place they sent first an herald, and after him embassadours to the Ætoliens, to demand of them, Wherein they had so offended either in word or deed, that their allies and friends should come to molest and assaile them so by way of hostilitie? To whom Thæas the Generall of the Ætoliens made this answer, That they were not come to annoy and trouble, but to deliver and free them from their servitude under the Romanes. For bound they were and tied now with a brighter and more glittering chain indeed; but saine heavier, than at what time as they had the garison of the Macedonians within their castle. The Chalcidians replied againe and inferred, that they neither were in bondage, nor needed at all the garison of any. And thus the embassadours departed from the party, and returned to their owne people. Thæas and the Ætoliens, whose whole and onely hope was to come upon them on a suddaine and surprize them at unwares, returned home againe as they came, being not able to maintaine open warre, nor to assaile a citie so well fortified both by sea and land. Euthymidas being advertised that his countrey men lay in campe at Salganea, and that the Ætoliens were dislodged and gone, retired himselfe also from Thebes to Athens. And Herodotus likewise, after hee had wistly and with great longing, expected from Atalanta* certaine daies together, to see some signall (but in vaine) sent out a pinnace or brigantine, to know what the cause might be of such stay: and understanding that the enterprize was given over by his complices and fellows in the complor, he returned to Thronium from whence he came.

Quintius likewise having intelligence of these occurrents, as he sailed with his fleet from Corinth, encountered Eumenes in Euripus neere Chalcis. And thought good it was betweene them, that Eumenes the king should leave at Chalcis five hundred foildours in garison, and himselfe E go directly to Athens: and Quintius kept on his way to Demetrias* whither he intended, supposing, that the deliverance of Chalcis would make somewhat to induce the Magnesiens to embrace againe the societie of the Romanes. And to the end that those persons in Demetrias who sided with him, might have some forces for their defence, he wrote unto Eumenes the Pretour of the Thessalians, to put the youth in armes: and he sent Villius before unto Demetrias to sound their affections, not minding otherwise to give the attempt, unlesse some part of them inclined to respect the auncient societie. Villius entred the mouth of the haven with a five banked galleace. Thither ran the whole multitude flocking unto him: And Villius deniaunded of them whither they had leifer that hee came to them as to friends or enemies? Unto whom Eurylochus the Magnetarches, answered, That he was come unto his friends: but hee willed him to forbear the haven, and suffer the Magnesiens to be at peace and libertie, and to beware, that under a pretence of parle, he did not sollicite and disquiet the multitude. After this there was no farther talke and speech betweene them, but plaine debate and altercation: whiles Villius the Roman blamed and challenged the Magnesiens as unthankfull persons, and forthwarned them of the miseries & calamities that hung over their heads; and again the multitude cried out aloud, and accused as well the the Senate as Quintius. Thus Villius without doing any good, returned to Quintius. But Quintius having dispatched a messenger to the Pretour, that he should reduce home his forces, retired himselfe againe by sea to Corinth.

The affaires of Greece thus interlaced and blended with the Romane, have caried me away as it were out of my list: not for that they were so necessarie and important to be written, but onely because they were materiall to the cause of the war against Antiochus. After the Consuls were elect (for there I began my digression) L. Quintius and Cn. Domitius the Consuls went into their severall provinces. Quintius into Liguria, and Domitius against the Boij. As for the Boij, they held themselves quiet, yea, and the whole bodie of their Senate with their children, their captaines also with their Cavallerie, to the number in all of fiftene hundred, yeelded themselves to the Consull. But the territorie of the Ligurians was overrun and wasted, and some fortresses woen: where by not onely there were prizes gotten of all sorts, and prisoners taken, but also diverse captives, as well citizens as allies, were recovered out of the enemies hands. This very yeere a Colonie was planted at Vibo, by an act of Senate and Commons: and there went thither three thousand and seven hundred footmen, & three hundred horsemen. The Triumvirs, who had the placing of them, were Q. Nevius, M. Minutius, and M. Furius Crassipes. Every footman was endued with fiftene acres of land, and the horsemen twice as much. It was a territorie held last in the tenure of the Brutians, and they had conquered it first from the Greeces.

About the same time, there happened at Rome two most feartfull accidents; the one of them continued long, but was not altogether so vehement and terrible: for there was an earthquake endured eight and thirtie daies. All which time, the lawsteed or vacation from all courts of law and civill causes, continued in great feare and pensiveness: in regard whereof, a supplication was holden for three daies. As for the other, it was not a vaine feare, but a very losse indeed that touched many men: for there began a skarfire in the beast market; and continued a day and a night, burning many houses standing on the Tyber side; and all the shops and warehouses, with marchandise of great price, were consumed. Now was the yeer well drawing toward an end, and daily more and more the bruit and rumour of the warre with Antiochus encreased: and likewise the care that the LL. of the Senat had thereof. And therefore they began to treat as concerning the provinces of the Magistrates elect, to the end, that all of them might be more circumspect and intensitive to their charges. So a decree passed, that the Consuls should have the governance of Italie, by name, and also to go whithersoever the Senat should please to dispose of them: and all men knew well enough, that the warre against Antiochus was upon the point. Also ordained it was, that hee whose lot it was to manage that warre, should have the conduct of foure thousand footmen of Romane citizens, and three hundred horsemen; besides sixe thousand allies of the Latine nation, and foure hundred horsemen. L. Quintius the Consull was appointed to take musters for those souldiors, that there should be no stay, but that the new Consull might immediatly put himselfe in his journey, to what expedition soever the Senate thought good. Item, It was decreed as concerning the provinces of the Pretours, in this manner: namely, That the first lot should assigne the double jurisdiction, civill and forreine, as well among citizens as strangers: the second, should concerne the Brutians: the third, the navie; and the same to saile whithersoever the Senat would appoint: the fourth, for Sicilie: the fift, for Sardinia: the sixt, for the nether Spaine. Over and besides, L. Quintius the Consull was commaunded to enroll two new legions of Romane citizens, besides twentie thousand foot and eight hundred horsemen of allies of the Latine nation: and this armie they set out for that Pretour, who was to governe the Brutij. Two chappels that yeere were dedicated to Iupiter Capitolinus: the one of them L. Furius Purpureo vowed in the Gaules warre, as Pretour; the other, when he was Consull: and Q. Martius Ralla the Duumvir, dedicated them. This yeere, there passed many sharpe and grievous sentences and judgements upon usurers; against whome (being privat men) M. Tuccius and P. Iulius Brutus the two Aediles of the chaire, commenced action. Of that silver wherein they were fined, was made a charriot with foure wheels, gilded; and set up it was in the Capitoll in the cabinet of Iupiter above the top of his shrine: likewise twelve bucklers gilded. The same Aediles also, caused the porch or gallerie to be made without the gate Tergemina, among the carpenters.

As the Romanes were wholly amused upon preparation for this new warre, so Antiochus for his part sat not still: three cities there were which kept him backe and checked his progresse, to

A wit, Smyrna, Alexandria in Troas, and Lampascus; the which he never could to that day force by assault, or draw into amitie with any conditions whatsoever; and to leave them behind in those tearmes, when he should in proper person passe over into Eitope, he was not willing. Somewhat also he was impeached by a consultation as touching Anniball. For at first he was staied and hindered by occasion of the open ships which hee intended to send with him into Affricke. And afterward buzzed it was into his head by Thoon the Aetolian especially, and question moved, whether it were good simply to send him thither at all, or no? This Thoon, when Greece was all in an hurry and full of troubles, bare them in hand, that Demetrius would be in their power & at their devotion. And like as with his leafings touching the king, in multiplying and magnifying his forces, he had brought many of the Greeces into a fooles paradise, even so also after the same manner he ceased not to feed the king with lies, and fill him with hopes, making him beleieve that all men wished for him with all their hearts, & would run by heapes to the sea strand, to meet him so soon as they could but ken his fleet under saile. This selfesame man was so bold also as to alter the kings mind as touching Anniball, which seemed before resolved and settled. For he perswaded him that the kings navie was not to be dismembred, and part thereof to be sent away; and if hee were to make out any of the ships from the rest, yet Anniball of all other was not to have the conduct thereof, a banished person and a Carthaginian; who was like ynough to be of many minds, and to change a thousand times in a day, such was his present condition and fortune, & such was his nature and disposition. And as for that glorious name for martiall prowesse (which is the cause that Anniball is so much set by, and which recommendeth him as a speciall and singular gift to the world) it is too much, and farr unfitting for any one captaine under a king: & more meet it were that the king himselfe should be regarded & seen above all other, that the king, I say, and none but the king should be the leader, conductor, and commander of all. Again, if Anniball chanced to miscarie with the fleet, or to have his forces defeated, the losse would be counted no more than if any other meaner captaine had done it: but if the affaires should prosper & speed well, Anniball should go away with all the honour, and not Antiochus. Moreover, say that fortune were so kind as to give Antiochus the upper hand of the Romanes, and the entire victorie over them for ever, what hope or likelihood is there that Anniball would be content to live under the king, and subject to him alone, who hardly could brooke and endure the command and sovereignty of the whole State wherein he was borne? He hath not caried himselfe so, ever since his first youth, bearing a mind with him to compass the dominion of the whole world, as that now in his old age hee can abide to have a lord and superior over him. To conclude: the king (quoth he) hath no such need of Anniball in this war, as to make him a commander: well may he use him for a counsellor, and so forth to have him in his train and companie; for some meane fruit and use of such a nature, cannot be combersome, hurtfull, and dangerous: but if high and great matters be reached at, soon they may beare down and overcharge both the giver, and also the receiver. And no spirits are so readie to envie and mallice others, as they whose birth and parentage, whose degree and estate is not answerable to their hautie minds: and such commonly, as they hate the vertue, so they depreffe the good of another. Hereupon that counseil of sending Anniball into Affricke, was forthwith laid aside and cleane cast behind, which was so well devised in the beginning of the warre.

Antiochus bearing himselfe aloft now, principally for that Demetrius was revolted from the Romanes unto the Aetolians, determined no longer to delay the matter, but presently to take a voyage into Greece. But before that he embarked and took the sea, he went up to him, from the sea side for to sacrifice unto Minerva; and when hee was returned to his fleet, he made saile with 40 close covered & hatched ships, and 60 uncovered and undecked, and after these followed 200 vessels of burden, charged & fraught with victuals, munition, & warlike furniture of all sorts. And first he fell with the Iland *Imbros: & from thence he cut over to Scythos, where after he had rallied his ships which had bene skattered one from another in the wide & deepe sea, he arrived at Preleum, the first towne of the maine and continent. Where Eurylochus the Magnetaiches, [i. the sovereign of Magnesia] and the principall citizens of that State, who were come from Demetrius met him and joyned with him; who rejoycing exceedingly to see so goodly a companie of them in his traine, the next day put into the haven of the cite of Demetrius: and not far from thence landed all his forces, which amounted in the whole to tenne thousand foot, five hundred horse, and sixe Elephants: a small power (God wot) and unsufficient, to seize upon Greece, all naked and alone, farre shorter than to hold and mainteine warre with the Romanes. After it was reported that Antiochus was come to Demetrius, the Ætoliens proclaimed a counsell, wherein they made a decree to send for Antiochus. For now the king knowing that they would passe such an Act, was departed from Demetrius, and had withdrawn himselfe to Phalera within the gulph of Mulea. And after he had received once the patent of that decree, he went from thence to Lamia, where he was received with exceeding favour of the common people, with clapping of hands, shouts, acclamations, and other signes whereby the multitude used to shew and tellie their great joy. When they were assembled together and set in Counsell, Phaneas the Pretor and other chiefe citizens brought him solemnely in: where after Oyades made, thus the king began his speech, first excusing himselfe, In that hee was come with a farre smaller power than all men hoped or looked for. And even this (quoth he) may serve in steed of the greatest argument that may be of my exceeding love and affection toward you, in that being to unprovided and unfurnished of all things, and at a time so unseasonable for to saile, as too earely to take the sea, I have not thought much but am willingly come at the call of your embassadours: being thus assuredly perswaded, that the Ætoliens seeing me once, would suppose that in me alone consisted all their hope and defence whatsoever. And yet I will accomplish I assure you, and satisfie to the full even your contentment also, whose expectation for the present may seeme to have bene disappointed: for so soone as the time of the yere will serve, and the spring is once come, that the seas are navigable, I will overspread all Greece with men, horse, and munition; I will take up all the sea coasts with fleets; I will spare for no cost, no paine, no perill, untill I have taken from their necks the heave yoke of the Romane empire, set Greece free indeed, and made the Ætoliens the chiefe commanders therein. Nay with mine armies besides shall come all kind of provision and furniture out of Asia. But for the present (saith he) the Ætoliens must see and take order, that my people may be served with corne & other victuals at a reasonable rate. To this effect when the king had spoken with the great assent of all men, he departed. After the kings departure, there arose some contention betweene two great men of the Ætoliens, to wit, Phaneas and Thobas. Phaneas was of opinion, that it was better policie to use Antiochus for a mediator and reconciler of peace, or to be an umpire or arbitrator to decide the controversies betweene them and the Romanes, rather than to be the Generall of the warre. For his very coming and majestie would be more effectuell than all his forces, to strike some reverence in the Romanes, and cause them to be respective unto him. For men oftentimes yeeld and remit many things of themselves willingly to avoid warre, which they cannot be forced unto by wate and by armes, when they are once entred into action. Thobas inferred againe and said, that Phaneas spake not this for any desire and love to peace, but his meaning was to scatter and dispart this furniture and preparation of war, for this intent, That by this tedious lingering, the kings courage might abate, and the Romanes gain time to make themselves readie. For, that there was no reason possibly to be gotten at the Romanes hand, they had tried sufficiently by good experience, in sending so many embassages to Rome, and in debating the matter so often with Quintius: neither would they ever have sought unto Antiochus and craved his aid, if all their hope otherwise had not bene cut off and cleane failed. And now since his helping hand is presented unto them sooner than all men thought or looked for, they were not now to begin to faint and give over, but rather to request and intreat the king, that since he was come himselfe in person (which was the greatest matter of all) to set free and maintein Greece, he would send for his forces both at sea and land. For, the king in armes, might peradventure obtaine something: but dismissed if he were, little or no reckning would the Romanes make of him in the quarell and question of the Ætoliens, no nor in his owne affaires whensoever he should reason and debate thereof. And here went the harte away. They all opined straightwaies to stile the king with the name of Imperator [i. Emperour:] and they chose thirtie of the chiefe personages to assist him in counsell for all things requisite. Thus the Diet was dissolved, and every man slipt away and retired to his owne citie. The next day the king sat in consultation with their Apocletes. In what place they should begin the warre. And it was thought best, first to assaile the citie of Chalcis, which lately the Ætoliens had assaied in vaine. And for to effect this service, there was more expedition and speed required, than any other great forces and preparations. Hereupon the king set forward with 1000 footmen which followed him from Demetrius, and marched by the way of Phocis: The chieftaines also of the Ætoliens, having levied some few companies of their youth, took another

A another way, and met with him at Charonea, and followed with ten covered ships. The king encamped neere Salganea, and himselfe in person with the chiefe of the Ætoliens crossed the Eurypus: and when he was landed and not farre gone from the haven, the magistrats and chiefe men of Chalcis came forth without their gates, and some few of both sides met together for to parlie. The Ætoliens were earnest to perswade with them, That so far-forth as they might without impeaching the Romane amitie, they would assume the king also to be their alie and friend, for as much as he was passed into Europe not to make warre, but to deliver Greece, and set it free in very deede, and not in word only and false semblance, as the Romanes had done. And nothing was there more for the good and benefit of the cities in Greece, than to enteraine the societie and friendship of them both. For under the defence and safeguard of the one, they might be sure to guard themselves from the violence & outrage of the other. But if they accepted not of the king, they were best to take heed and see what danger they presently incurred: considering the furors of the Romanes to relieve them were so farre off, and the forces of Antiochus their enemy to annoy them, so neere even at their gates, whom of themselves with their owne power they were not able to withstand. To this, Melicio one of their chiefe men made this answer: Insave much (quoth he) who they be, that Antiochus for to deliver and set free, hath taken the paines, to leave his owne kingdome, and to passe over into Europe. For mine owne part, I know no citie in Greece, that either hath Romane garison, or payeth any tribute unto them, or is bound to unjust and unreasonable covenants, or endureth any hard lawes and conditions against their wils: and therefore the Chalcidians have neede of no person to restore them to freedome, since they be free already: ne yet of a garison for their defence, considering that by the grace and favour of the same people of Rome, they enjoy peace and libertie already. As for the king, we refuse not his amitie, ne yet reject we the friendship of the Ætoliens. And we will take it for a speciall point of friendship that they shall do us, if they gently will depart out of our yland and be gone: For as for us, we are resolute in this, not to receive them within our walls, no nor to contract with them any societie, without the advise and consent of the Romanes. When these matters were related to the king, who stayed behind with the ships, he determined presently to returne to Demetrius, for that he was not come with such a power as to attempt any thing by force: where, seeing his first enterprize came to nothing, he devised and conferred with the Ætoliens what was to be done next: and concluded it was, to found the Achæans, and Aminander the king of the Athamans. They supposed also that the nation of the Boeotians was cleane estranged and badly affected to the Romanes ever since the death of Barclay, and those troubles that ensued thereupon. They were perswaded also that Philippus a great potentate, & principall leader of the Achæans, was both malicious and odious unto Quintius for emulation and jealousie of honor in the Laconian warre. Aminander had espoused and taken to wife Apamea the daughter of one Alexander a Megapolitan, who vaunting himselfe to be defended from Alexander the Great, named his two sonnes, Philip and Alexander, and his daughter, Apamea: whom being thus advanced by marriage with a king, her elder brother Philip accompanied into Adiamania. This Philip, a vaine-headed yongman, the Ætoliens and Antiochus had induced into a foolish hope (considering that for certaine he was of the royall blood) to obtaine the kingdome of Macedonie, if haply he could bring about to joine Aminander and the Athamans to Antiochus. And these vaine conceits of great benefits wrought mightily not with this Philip only, but also with Aminander. Now in Achæa there was a counsell holden at Egium, and audience given there to the embassadours of Antiochus and the Ætoliens, before T. Quintius. Where the king his embassadour spake first, and being (as all those commonly are, that have their intendment and language of kings) full of foolish babble, and making sea and land resound againe with his vaine bragging and senselesse words, set tale on end, and told them, what an infinite number of hostes were passing over by Hellefpoint into Europe, whereof some of them were in complete harness, armed at all peeces, whom they call Cissaphratis: some were archers, and some on horseback, against whom there was nothing close, nothing stout enough, who when their backs were turned, and their horses run away, shooote so much the more surely, and even point-blank. And albeit these forces of horse by his report, were sufficient of themselves to defeat all the armies of Europe if they were put together, yet he added besides a mighty number, I wote not how many of footemen: and terrified them with naming a sort of strange nations, that scarcely had been heard heard of before, to wit, the Dakes, the Medians, the Ælymæans and Cadusians. But for his forces at sea, there was no bayes, no harbors, nor havens in all Greece able to receive them. The Sydonians and Tyrians (say they) hold the right side, the Aradians, and the Sidets out of Pamphylia keep the left; nations for skill and valour. As for money and other provision and furniture for the warres, it were needlesse to discourse of, since they themselves knew well enough, that the realms of Asia have alwaies stowed with gold, as their proper foison. So as the Romanes now were not to deale with Philip nor with Anniball, the one a chiefe person among many others of a citie, and the other limited within the confines only of the kingdom of Macedonie; but with the great Monarch of all Asia, yea & of some part of Europe. And yet he, as mightie a potentate as he is (notwithstanding he is come from the utmost coasts and bounds of the Levant sea, to deliver and enfranchise Greece) demandeth nothing of the Achæans prejudiciall to their fealtie and allegiance to the Romans their first allies and associates: for he required not them to take arms with him against them, but only not to intermeddle nor take a part: his seeking is, that (as behooveth good friends and mediators between both parties) they would with all well and peace among them, and not interpose themselves in the quarrell of war. Archidamus likewise the embassador for the Ætolians, requested in manner the same. That they would hold themselves quiet and in repose (a thing most easie and safe for them) and being but lookers on the warre, wait and attend the issue of other mens fortunes, without the hazard of their own: yet he staid not so, but proceeded so far and overshot himselfe so much in words, that he brake forth at length into ill language, one while railing against the Romans in general, another while against Quintius in particular; calling them ungratefull and unthankfull persons, reproching, upbraiding, and hitting them in the teeth, how not onely they had gotten the victorie of Philip, but also saved themselves by the vertue and valour of the Ætolians: and as for Quintius, he was to thanke them and their meanes, as much as his own life came to and the preservation of his armie. For wherein at any time (qd. he) perfourmed he the dutie and devoir of Generall in the field? Seene him indeed I have in the time of battaile and in the campe, take the flight of birds, kill sacrifices, and make vowes verie deuoutly, like some holy parish-priest or divining prophet, whiles I my selfe was faine in his defence to expose and present my bodie to glaives and darts of the enemies. To these challenges Quintius made answer in this wise, saying, That Archidamus had more regard in whose presence he spake, than to whome he directed all his speech: for the Achæans know very well, that all the valiancie of the Ætolians, standeth in bragging words and not in martiall deeds, as men that love to be heard in Diets and assemblies rather than scene in the field and battaile; and therefore no marvell if he made so small reckning to speake unto the Achæans, considering that he knew, how well acquainted they were with the maners and fashions of the Ætolians. But he hath besides vaunted and made great brags before the kings embassadors, & in their person, before the king himselfe in absence. And if a man had not knowne before, what it was, that had so knit and united Antiochus and the Ætolians together, he mought perceive it evidently by the speeches of the embassadors: for by exchanging lies agood reciprocally, and by bragging of their forces which they have not, they have inflated and puffed up one another with vaine hopes, whiles they tell and would make them beleue, That Philip by them was vanquished, That the Romanes by their valour were protected; and other gay matters, which erewhile ye heard: building castles in the aire, to the end, that you and other itares and nations would side with them and take their parts: The king againe (by his embassador) overspreadeth all with clouds of horsemen and footmen, and covereth whole seas with fleets and armadaes. Now in faith this is mine hoast of Chalcis up and downe, a friendly man. I assure you, and a good fellow in his house, and one that knoweth how to entertaine his guests and bid them welcome. And verily I can liken this manner of dealing to nothing better than to a supper of his: We went upon a time to make merrie with him, and I remember well it was at midsommer (when the daies are longest & the sun at the hottest) where he made us passing good chere. And as we wondred how at such a season of the year he met with that plentie of venison, and such varietie withall; the man (nothing so yaineglorious as these fellows here) smilison, and led pleasantly upon us and said, We were welcom to a feast of a good tame swine and no better: but well fare a good cooke my masters (qd. hee) who by his cunning hand, what with seasoning it, and what with serving it up with divers sauces, hath made all this faire shew of wild flesh, and the same of sundry sorts. This may fity be applyed to the king his armies and forces: of which which even now so great boast was made. For these divers kinds of arms, these many names of nations never hard of before, to wit, the Dakes or Dahians (I wot not what to call them) the Medes, the Cadusians, the Elimeans, they are but Syrians when all is done; who for their base minds by nature, are much better to make a sort of slaves than a companie of good soldiers. And would to God (you my masters of Achæa) I could represent unto your eyes the port and train of this great king, when he ran from Demetrius, one while to Lamia to the counsell of the Ætolians, & another while to Chalcis: you should see in this kings camp hardly two pretie legioners, & those but lame ones neither and not well accomplished: you should see the king sometime as good as begging graine of the Ætolians, to measure out among his hungrie souldiors: otherwhiles making thike to take up monies at interest to make out their pay: now standing at the gates of Chalcis, and anon shut out from thence and excluded cleane: and when he had don nothing els but seen Aulis and Euripus, returning faire into Ætolia. Antiochus (you see) hath yeilded but small beleefe to the Ætolians, and the Ætolians have as litle trusted and relied upon the vanitie of the king. And therefore the lesse should you be deceived by them, but rather repose your selves assuredly in the fidelitie of the Romanes so often tried, so often knowen and approved. For whereas they say, It is your best course not to be imbarked and interested in this warre, I assure you, there is nothing more vaine than this, nay nothing so hurtfull unto your estate. For you shall be a prize and prey to the victorour, without thank of either part, without any worth and reputation. Quintius was thought by the Achæans to have spoken not impertinently, but to have answered them both, fully: and an easie matter it was to approve his speech unto those, that were well enough inclined to have given him gentle hearing: for ther was no question nor doubt at all, but that everyman would judge them to be friends or enemies to the Achæan nation, whom the Romanes held for theirs: yea and would conclude in the end of an act, to denounce warre both against Antiochus & the Ætolians. Moreover, according as Quintius thought good, they sent presently an aid of 500 soldiers to Chalcis, and of as many to Pyraeum. For at Athens there had like to have been a sedition & mutinie, whiles some drew the multitude (which commonly is bought and sold for money) to take part with Antiochus upon hope of large rewards & great bounties, untill such times as Quintius was sent for by them that took part with the Romanes: in so much as Apollodorus (who gave counsell & perswaded to revolt) was accused by one Leon, and being condemned, was banished. Thus verily the embassage returned from the Achæans to the king with heave answer. The Boeotians delivered no certaintie: this only was their answer, That when Antiochus himselfe was come into Boeotia, then they would consider and consult what they were best to do. Antiochus being advertised, that both the Achæans and king Eumenes also had sent men for the defence of Chalcis, thought good to make hast, that his forces might not onely prevent them, but also if it were possible receive them and cut them short as they came. And for this intent, hee sent Menippus with three thousand souldiors or thereabout, and Polyxenides with his whole fleet. Himselfe a few daies after marched with sixe thousand of his owne souldiors; and of that levie, which on a suddaine might be gathered at Lamia, no great number of Ætolians. Those five hundred Achæans afore said, and the small aid that king Eumenes sent under the conduct of Xenocides the Chalcidian, having safely passed Euripus before that the waies and passages were beset, arrived at Chalcis. The Romanes also who were upon five hundred, at what time as Menippus encamped before Sarganea, came to Hermeum, where is the advenue out of Boeotia into the land of Eubæa. In their companie was Mistion sent as Embassadour from Chalcis to Quintius, for to crave some succour: who perceiving that the waies were laid and the streights kept by the enemies, leaving his intended journey by the way of Aulis, turned to Delium, minding from thence to cut over into Eubæa. This Delium is a temple of Apollo situate upon the sea strand, and five miles distant from Tanagra, from whence there is a short cut (little more than a league) over an arme of the sea unto the next parts of Eubæa. In this temple and sacred grove about it, so religious, so privileged and secured (as are those franchised houses and sanctuaries which the Greekes call Asyla) and at that time, when neither warre was proclaimed, or at leastwise not so farre proceeded, as that in the hearing and knowledge of any man there had been sword drawne, or blood shed in any place: In this place, and at this time, I say, whiles the souldiors wandered at their leisure and pleasure, some gone to see the temple above said and the grove, others walking upon the strand unarmed, and a great sort also of them scattered over the fields (such as were gone for forrage and fewell) all on a suddain Menippus

ripus finding them loose and disbanded, charged upon them, and slew them, and to the number of fiftie hee tooke alive: very few escaped, among whom was Micrip, who got into a small vessel of merchandise. This occurrent, as it troubled and disquieted Quintus and the Romanes, for the losse of their souldiours, so it seemed much to encrease the right of their just quarell to make warre upon Antiochus. Antiochus having advanced his armie, and approached Aulis, after hee had once again addressed Orators, partly of his owne subjects, and partly *Ætoli*ans to Chalcis, for to follow those causes which of late he had commended, but in more minatorie terms, now prevailed easily, notwithstanding Mitrio and Xenocides laboured to the contrarie, that the gates should be set open unto him. All those that were for the Romanes, abandoned the citie a little before the kings comming. The souldiours of Achæa and king Eumenes, kept Salgamea. The Romanes souldiours also (who were but few) fortified and made a sconce upon the water of Euripus, to be a defence for the passage. Menippus began to assaile Salgamea, and the king himselfe to set upon the fort of Euripus aforesaid. The Achæans and the souldiours of Eumenes first grew to composition, and having capitulated to depart without any harme, quit their place of garrison. The Romanes held out longer, and stoutly defended the hold of Euripus: but even they also being so streightly invested both by land and water, and seeing now the ordinance and engines of batterie, brought and readie to be planted against them, would no longer endure the siege. When as now the king had possessed himselfe of the head ciue of Eubœa, all the other ciities of that Island, refused not to submit and come under his subjection. And hee thought hee had made a good beginning and entrance in this warre, in that so great an Island, and so many ciities commodiously seated, and of such importance, were reduced under his obeisance.

THE XXXVI. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIVS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the fixe and thirtieth Booke.

Marcus Acilius Glabrio the Consull, with the aid of king Philip, vanquished king Antiochus, near to Thermopylae, & drove him out of Greece. He also subdued the *Ætoli*ans. P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica the Consull (reputed and iudged by the Senate, the best man in the citie) dedicated the temple of the mother of the gods, whom himselfe had brought into the Palatium. He also when he had overcome the Boians, took them upon surrender to his protection, and triumphed over them. Over and besides, here are set downe the prosperous battailes fought at sea, against the admirals and captaines of king Antiochus.

So soone as P. Cornelius Scipio the sonne of Cneus, and M. Acilius Glabrio, the two Consuls, were entred into their magistracie, the LL. of the Senate enjoined them (before any speech and question moved as touching the provinces) to sacrifice greater beasts in all those temples, wherein the custome was for the more part of the yeare to celebrate the solemnitie of Lectisternes, and to make their praier in this manner, That where as the Senate intended a new war, the gods would vouchsafe to blesse and happily conduct the same to the good and publicke weale of the Senat and the people of Rome. All those sacrifices prooved good and as they ought to be: even the

A the very first beasts that were slain, prognosticated fortunat successe, and shewed apparent signes that the gods were pacified and well pleased. And thus the soothsaiers and bowel-priers out of their learning, answered, It was evident, that by this warre the bounds and limits of the Romane empire should be extended, and that both victorie and triumph was foresignified. These answers being reported, and mens minds settled, and their consciences resolved of all scruples as concerning the gods, then the LL. of the Senate graunted out an order, that a bill should be preferred solemnly unto the people in this forme, PLEASETH IT YOU, AND IS IT YOUR VWIL, THAT WAR SHOULD BE ENTERPRISED AGAINST ANTIOCHUS, AND ALL THAT TAKE HIS PART? AND IF THIS WILL PASSE AND BE GRAUNTED, ARE YEE PLEASED, THAT THE CONSULS, IF THEY THINKE SO GOOD, REFERRE THE VVHOLE MATTER UNTO THE SENAT TO TAKE ORDER FOR THE MANAGING THEREOF ACCORDINGLY? P. Cornelius propounded this bill, and the people accepted thereof. Whereupon the Senate set downe a decree, that the Consuls should cast lots for the government of Italie and Greece: and that he whose hap it was to governe Greece, should (over and above that number of souldiours, which L. Quintus by authoritie and commission from the Senat had for that province either enrolled or levied) receive that armie also which M. Babius the Pretour caused to passe over the yeere before into Macedonie, by vertue of an order by the Senat, in that behalfe enacted. And license he had, if need so required, to take up aid-souldiours from among the allies without Italie, so as hee exceeded not the number of five thousand. Also agreed it was, that L. Quintus the Consull of the yeere before, should be deputed lord Generall for that warre. As for the other Consull, unto C whome had beene allotted the charge of Italie, he was commaunded to levie warre against the Boians, and to have his choise, whether armie he had leiffer have of those two which the former Consuls conducted: & when he had received one, to send the other to Rome, that those legions of citizens should be in readinesse for to be sent whither it pleased the Senate. This order being taken in the Senate, as touching the appointment and assignation of those provinces, then it was thought good, that the new Consuls should cast lots for their governments. To Acilius besel Greece, and Italie to Cornelius. After this, by a speciall lot there passed an act of the Senate, That whereas the people of Rome had ordained to wage war at that time against king Antiochus, and those that were under his dominion, the Consuls should cause a procession to be solemnised. Also, that the Consull M. Acilius should conceive and make a vow to Iupiter, for to celebrate the D great Games in his honour, and to bring offerings to every altar. This vow was by him pronounced in this forme of words, according as P. Licinius the Arch-priest endited and prompted unto him. IF THAT VWARRE WHICH THE PEOPLE HATH DETERMINED TO BE ENTERPRISED AND MADE AGAINST KING ANTIOCHUS, SHALL BE PERFORMED ACCORDING TO THE MIND AND CONTENTMENT OF THE SENAT AND PEOPLE OF ROME, THEN SHALL THE PEOPLE OF ROME CELEBRATE UNTO THY HONOUR, O IUPITER, THE GREAT GAMES FOR THE SPACE OF TEN DAIES TOGETHER, AND OBLATIONS SHALL BE BROUGHT TO EVERY ALTAR, OF THAT PRICE, AND AMOUNTING TO THAT SUMME WHICH THE SENATE SHALL ORDAINE AND SET DOWNE. AND VVHAT MAGISTRATS SOEVER SHALL EXHIBITE THOSE GAMES, OR IN VVHAT PLACE, YEA, AND AT VVHAT TIME SOEVER THEY SHALL BE REPRESENTED, THE SAID GAMES SHAL BE HELD FOR GOOD, AND REPUTED AS VVEL DONE, YEA, AND THE OFFRINGS ACCEPTED AS RIGHTLY PRESENTED. After this there was published & proclaimed by both Coss. a supplication for the space of 2 daies. When the Coss. had cast lots for the parting of their governments, the Pretors likewise went presently about the same for their provinces. To M. Iunius Brutus fell both the jurisdictions, as wel of citizens as aliens. A. Cornel. Mammula had the charge of the Brutij, M. Aemilius Lepidus of Sicilie, and L. Oppius Salinator of Sardinia. C. Livius Salinator was L. Admirall of the navie, and L. Aemilius Paulus governor of the nether Spaine. And in this manner following, were the armies and forces distributed and appointed. Vnto A. Cornelius were assigned the new souldiours which the former yeere L. Quintus the Consull, by vertue of an Act of the Senate, had enrolled. And his commission was to defend and keepe in order all that tract and coast about Tarentum and Brundisium. As for L. Aemilius Paulus, who was to take a voyage into the farther Spaine, he was allowed (besides the armie which he was to receive of M. Fulvius the Pretour) to have the conduct of three thousand new souldiours footemen, and three hundred horse: so that of them, two third parts should consist of allies of the Latin nation, and one third of of Romane citizens. The like supply was sent unto C. Flaminius into the higher Spaine, whose G commission was renewed for to have the command there still. M. Aemilius Lepidus had commandement to receive the government of the province, and withall, the conduct of the armie, at the hands of L. Valerius, whom he was to succedee; and if he thought so good, to keepe with him in the province L. Valerius, in qualitie and place of a Viz:pretour: and so to divide the province, that the one part should reach from Agrigentum to Pachinus; the other halfe from Pachinus to Tyndarium: also, that L. Valerius should defend the sea coasts and the river with a flecte of twentie Gallies. The same Pretour aforesaid was to levie and gather a double tenth of corne, and to take order for the convoy therof to the sea, and so to be embarked and transported into Greece. The like commission had L. Opimius, to exact and take another tenth in Sardinia; but that graine was to be brought to Rome, & not to be caried over into Greece. C. Livius the H Pretour, & admirall of the navie, was appointed with 30 saile readier rigged and trimmed, to saile into Greece with all speede, and to receive the ships that Acilius had: likewise to repaire, rigge and furnish the old vessels that rid in the harbours, or lay at one side up in docks. M. Junius the Pretor his charge was, to levie mariners and rowers from among the libertines, for to serve that Armada. And there were sent Embassadors into Africk to Carthage, and into Numidia, three into either part, for to seeke and purvey corne to besent into Greece, for which the people of Rome would make present payment. And so wholly employed was the citie, to prepare and take order for this warre, that P. Cornelius the Consul published an Edict, that no Senatours, nor any that had authoritie to give their opinion in the Senate, neither any inferior magistrates, should take any journey out of the citie, farther than they might make returne againe the same day: I Item, that there should not be five Senatours absent at once from Rome.

C. Livius the Pretour, whiles he used all diligence and care to prepare and provide his flecte, was impeached and hindered a time, by occasion of a debate and contention that arose betweene him and the Coloners of the sea side. For when they should be gathered and sent to sea, they appealed to the Tribunes of the Com. from whom they were put over and referred to the Senate: and the Senate with one voyce and accord pronounced and determined, that these Coloners were not exempted from sea-service. The Colonies that contended with the Pretour about their immunitie were these, Hostia, Fregena, Castrum novum, Pyrgi, Antium, Tarracina, Minturna and Sinuessa.

This done, the Consull Acilius by order from the Senate, consulted with the collidge of the K Feciales or Heraults at Armes, and demaunded their advise, Whether the warre should be proclaimed and defiance geven to Antiochus himselfe in person; or it were sufficient, to intimate and denounce the same to some one of his garisons? Also, whether they would advise to proclaime warre against the Ætoliens apart by themselves; or whether it were not meete and convenient first to disclaime and renounce their societie and friendship, and then to proclaime and denounce hostility? The Fecials answered, that heretofore they had determined and cleered this point, at what time as their opinion was asked as touching Philip, to wit, That it was all one, and made no matter, whether the defiance were given him to his face, or only intimated to some garison of his. And as for the Ætoliens, this was their mind, that they had quit already their amitie, and abandoned all societie, in that when our embassadors so oftentimes had redemaun-ded amends for wrongs done, they never thought good to make restitution or satisfaction. L Moreover, the Ætoliens had themselves sent defiance first and proclaimed warre against the Romanes, when as by force they seized Demetrias a citie of our allies, and advanced before Chalcis, to assaile it both by land and sea: and lastly, in that they had sollicitied king Antiochus and brought him into Europe for to levie warre against the Romanes. All things now being sufficiently provided, M. Acilius the Consull published an Edict and proclaimed, That all those souldiours whom L. Quintius had enrolled, likewise all those whom he had levied of the allies of the Latine nation, who were to go with him into his province, likewise all the Colonels and Marshals of the second and third legion, should render themselves, and be readie altogether at Brundisium upon the * Ides of May following. Himself upon the * fifth day before the Nones of M the same moneth, departed forth of the citie clad in his rich cote of armes. And at the same time the Pretors also tooke their journeys into their severall provinces.

Much about that time there arrived at Rome embassadors from two kings, to wit, Philip of Macedonie, and Ptolomee king of Ægypt; promising their aid of men, money, and corne for

A for that warre. And besides from Ptolomeus there was brought * 1000 pound weight in gold, * 36000 pound and the weight of * 2000 pound in silver: howbeit, nothing was received, but much thanks rendered to both the kings. And whereas both of them offered to come with all their power into Ætolia, and to be there in person, Ptolomee was discharged of that offer of his, but the Embas-sadors of Philip received this answer, That he should highly please and content the people of Rome, in case he would not faile the Consull M. Acilius. In like manner there came Embassa-dors from the Carthaginians and Masanissa. The Carthaginians made promise of a * thousand Modij of Wheate, and of Barley five hundred thousand for the armie, and likewise to bring halfe so much to Rome; praying the Romanes to accept the same at their hands as a free gift and gratuitie: adding moreover, that they would man out a flecte at their owne charges, and were readie also to make one entire payment of the tribute behind, which they were of dutie to pay by sundry termes of many yeeres. The Embassadors of Masanissa, promised in the behalfe of their king, to send five hundred thousand Modij of wheate, and 300000 thousand of barley into Greece to the armie, besides 500 men of armes and twentie Elephants, unto M. Acilius the Cons. As touching the corne, this answer was returned unto them, that they were content to accept thereof, so that they would take money therefore to the worth. As to the flecte aforesaid, which the Carthaginians made offer of, they acquit them cleane, save as many ships as they were to find & provide according to the tenure of the accord and composition between them. Last of all, concerning the tribute money, none would they receive before the day.

Whiles the affaires passed thus at Rome, Antiochus being at Chalcis, because he would not C sit still and do nothing, all a winter time, partly himselfe sollicitied (by sending his embassadors) the minds of the States, and partly also there came unto him embassadors from thence of their owne accord: and namely among others, the Epirots presented themselves by the common consent of their whole nation, and the Eleans also came out of Peloponnesus. They of Elis craved aid against the Achæans, who (they verily thought) would first take armes against their citie, because war was denounced against Antiochus nothing to their will and good liking. Unto them were sent 1000 footemen under the leading of Euphanes the Cretensian. The embassage of the Epirots plaid with both hands, meaning to deale roundly & simply with no side, but to go between the bark & the tree. Gladly they would make court to the king and curry favor with him, && but so, as they stood in good termes still with the Romanes, whom they were loth to offend. For && D their request to him was, that he would not draw them without great and important cause into && the quarrell, considering that they for the defense of all Greece lay open & exposed to Italy, and && were sure before others to feeble the Romanes fingers, and receive their first assaults. But in case he && were able of himselfe with his forces by land and sea to defend Epirus, and furnish it with gari- && sons sufficient, they would with hart and good will accept of him and his into their cities & port- && townes: but if so be he could not effect that, they belought him not to offer them, naked and && unarmed men, to the violence of the Romane warres. Their drift was in this their embassie (as it && appeared) that if the king and his forces came not into Epirus (as they rather thought nay then yea) they might reserve themselves and all they had, safe, entier, and at their owne libertie for the Romane armies, and win withall the kings good grace, in that they seemed to make E an offer to receive him: or if hee came indeed, yet they might conceive good hope to find favour, and have pardon at the Romanes hands, in that they had not expected their succors being so farre off, but rather yeilded to the forces of Antiochus being present there in person.
 In such sort they caried themselves in their embassage so perplexed and intricate, that the king knew not well how to answer them redily: but said, that he would send his owne embassadors unto them for to parle and treat of all affaires pertaineing in common as well to them as to him.
 Then went he himselfe into Bæotia, which countrey in colour and shew pretended these causes of anger and spight against the Romanes, that before I have mentioned, to wit, the murder of Barcillus, & the armies by Quintius levied against Coronea, occasioned by a massacre committed upon Roman souldiours: but in very truth this was the reason, The singular discipline & order F of that nation in old time, was going downward and endlong many yeeres and ages already, and the popular government of many, growne to decay and ruine, which can not possibly continue long without some chaunge and alteration of State. Well, to Thebes hee came, where all the principall and chiefe States of Bæotia came flocking from all parts to meet him: Where, in the generall Diet and Councell of that Nation (notwithstanding hee had founded founded the battaile and began the fray already by giving the first blow, in that hee had forced G the Romane garison neere Delium and Chalcis, which were no small signes nor doubtfull overtures of warre, yet hee began with the same kind of speech which hee first used in the parle and conference at Chalcis, and which his embassadors had followed in the generall assembly of the Achæans, namely, demanding that they would enter into amitie with him, without professing themselves enemies to the Romans, or pretending hostilitie against them. But there was no man there but soone found him, and saw him well enough: howbeit there passed an act and decree in favour of the king against the Romanes, under a vaine and slight pretext and colourable shew of words. Having gained this nation also, he returned to Chalcis, from whence he sent out his letters before to the States of the Ætolians, that they should meet him at Demetrias, where hee would conferre and consult with them of all their affaires to be managed; and thither came he H by sea at the day appointed. Aminander also was sent for out of Athamania to this consultation, yea and Anniball the Carthaginian (whose counsell was not required a long time) was present at this frequent Diet and assembly. Much parle and great opining there was as touching the nation of the Thessalians; and all there in place were of opinion, that they should be sounded how they stood affected: but about the manner and some circumstance thereof, they were of divers minds, while some advised it to be done and executed out of hand: others thought good to put it off from winter season (considering now they were in the mids thereof) unto the prime and beginning of spring: others againe said, that embassadors onely should be sent: and some hot-spurres there were, that gave counsell to goe against them with all their forces, yea and to fright and terrifie them if they made slow hast. Now when all the knot and difficultie of this deliberation consisted in this one point, Anniball was requested by name to deliver his mind and speake to I the cause in question: who turned the king and all that were present from other wandering cogitations, and induced them to the entier consideration of the totall warre; and to that effect framed his speech in this wise. If since the time that we passed over into Greece, my hap had bene to be called to any counsell, when as some question was touching Eubæa, the Achæans and the Bæotians, I would have delivered that advise then, which now I purpose to utter this day in the question concerning the Thessalians. Above all things my counsell is, that Philip and the Macedonians may by all meanes possible be wrought to this our association in the warre. For as touching Eubæa, the Bæotians and the Thessalians, who doubteth, but that they (as nations that stand not upon their owne bottoms and are of no force by themselves) will alwaies flatter them K that are present in place, and be readie to crave pardon upon the same feare that they ever shew when they are to take counsell & resolve? who doubteth (I say) but so soone as they shall see the Roman armie in Greece, they will turne to their accustomed obedience? and that it will be imputed to them no fault at all, that when the Romanes were so far off, they were not willing to try the force of you (a puissant prince in person among them) or of your armies? How much rather ought we then, nay how much better & more important would it be, to joyn Philip unto us than these? For if he once enter into the cause and be seen in action, he can not possibly start from us nor draw his head out of the collar: and moreover, he bringeth that power with him, which is not to be held for a simple succor & addition to mend our forces, but such as lately of it selfe without the help of others, was able to make head against the Roman puissance. Let me have this prince L on my side, and (be it spoken without offence of any man here) what need I doubt of the sequele and issue? especially when those, by whose meanes and assistance the Romans prevailed against Philip, I see now ready to enter the field against them? The Ætolians (I say) who as all the world knoweth vanquished Philip, shall now together with Philip, enter into armes and fight against them. Over and besides, Aminander and the whole nation of the Athamans (whose service in that warre, next to the Ætolians, stood the Romans in best stead) shall be of our side. Philip at that time (ô king Antiochus) sustained the weight and burden of the whole warre, when you late still and stirred not: now both of you together, two most mightie monarchs, with the puissance of all Asia and Europe, shall wage warre against one citie and people, which (to speake nothing of mine owne fortune good or bad) certainly in our fathers daies was not able to make their part M good with one only king of the Epirotes; how hardie soever they will be when they shall be matched with you both together. But what mooveth me to think, yea & assure me, that Philip may be wooen unto us to joine in this action? One thing is this, a common good and benefit, even the greatest bond that is of societie: and yet there is another besides it, namely, an inducement proceeding

The speech of Anniball.

A ceeding from you that be here of Ætolia: for Thoas your embassador (who is present in place) & among other matters that he was wont to alledge for to animate & move Antiochus to come into Greece, evermore assured him of this principally, & avowed that Philip grumbled, bit the lip, and fretted. That under the colour and shew of peace, there were imposed upon him hard conditions of servitude and slavery. And he verily, I mean Thoas, set out the fell anger of the king, and in all his words compared it to the wood rage of a wild beast bound with chaines, or being enclosed in some cage, would willingly breake the grates and barres thereof. Now, if hee be disposed thus, and of that courage, let us burst his bonds asunder, let us (I say) force open his yron cage, that his rage pent up so long may now break out upon the common enemies. And suppose that our embassage effect nothing at his hands, yet may we provide and take order, that if we cannot B work and win him to side with our selves, yet that he shal not combine & band with our enemies.
 Your sonne Seleucus is now at Lysimachia, who shall not so soone with those forces which hee hath about him, begin to invade and wast (by the way of Thracia) the confines of Macedonie, but he shall with draw and turne Philip cleane away (from giving succour to the Romanes) to the defence especially of his owne. Thus have you heard mine advise as touching Philip: now, for the whole course and managing of the warre what mine opinion was, you have not bene ignorant from the first beginning. If then, I might have had mine owne waies, and my counsell had been taken, the Romans should not have received newes & intelligences of the taking of Chalcis in Eubæa, nor of the forcing & winning of a litle pile upon Euripus; but they had heard by this, that all Tuscan, that all the coast of the Ligurians & of the *Cisalpine Gauls was up in arms and C on a light fire of war; and (which would have feared & frightened them most) that Anniball was in Italy. And now (things standing as they do) my advise is, that you send for all your forces both by land and sea. Let your carricks and hulks with victuals & provision follow after your armada and ships of warre. For in this place, like as wee are too few to performe any martiall exploits, so wee are too many, considering our small store of victuals. And when you have rallied and united all your forces together, divide your navie in two parts: the one you shall keepe in the rode of Corcyra, to impeach the Romanes, that they shall not passe in safetie and securitie, the other you shall cause to saile unto that coast of Italie which looketh toward Sardinia and Affricke. Your selfe in proper person, with all your land-armie shall march onward into the territorie of the Byl-lions: thence shall you have good means for the defence of Greece, as making the Romanes D beleve, that you are upon the point to passe the seas, yea, and being readie indeed to crosse over, if need should require. This generally is my counsell; mine, I say, who as I will not take upon me a singular skill in all kinds of war, so me thinks I should know how to war with the Romans, as having learned my skill thereby, as well to my cost as advantage, and as much with my good as harme. And looke whatsoever designements I have projected unto you, I promise and protest, that I will be faithfull and forward in the execution thereof: and the gods approve & blesse that course, which your selfe shall thinke the best. To this effect, in a manner, was the Oration of An-tiball directed; which all that were in place & heard it, rather praised for the present, than put in practise and effected afterwards. For no one thing was done of all that hee had said, save onely that Antiochus sent Polyxenidas for a navie & armie out of Asia; yes there were embassadors also E dispatched to the generall Diets of the Thessalians. And a day was appointed for the Ætolians and Aminander to meet the armie at Phææ, whether king Antiochus came straight after with his power. And while he staid there, expecting Aminander and the Ætolians, he sent out one Philip a Megapolitane, with two thousand men to gather up the bones and reliques of the Macedonians about Cynoscephalæ, where the warre with Philip was determined, and the quarrell decided by a famous battell: were it that therein he followed his own head and tooke a conceit, thereby to wind himselfe into grace and favour with the Macedonian nation, and to bring the king into obloquie and disgrace, because he had left his souldiours unburied; or that, as it is the vaine (or vanitie rather) engrafted in kings by kind, he set his mind and busied his spirits in matters, for appearance gay and goodly, but in effect fond and foolish. There he made a mount (as it were) of a F number of bones gathered together into one place, that lay scattering and strewed here & there: a thing (no doubt) that the Macedonians conned him no thanke for, and which Philip (you may be sure) tooke in foule scorne and despicious disdain. And therefore Philip, who at that time minded to take counsell of Fortune, and to bee directed by her, as shee inclined now, sent to Marcus Babini the Viz-pretour, and advertised him, how Antiochus invaded Thessalie, and if it

it pleased him to stirre out of his winter harbour, he would meet him, that they might conferre G both together what were best to be done.

While Antiochus lay now encamped before Pheræ, where Aminander and the Ætolians had joined with him, there came ambassadors from Larissa, expostulating, Wherein the Thessalians had so offended either by deed or word, that he should molest and trouble them with warre? and withall beseeching him to retire and withdraw his forces, and debate the matter (if he had ought against them) by his ambassadors. At the same time they sent five hundred men in armes, well appointed, under the governance of Hippolochus, to lie there in garrison, who because they could not passe thither, by reason that all the avenues were seized and kept by the kings forces, returned to Scotusa. As for the ambassadors of the Larissæans, the king made them a gracious answer, and said, That he was entred into Thessalie, not by way of hostilitie to distresse them, but in friendly manner to maintaine and establish the freedom of the Thessalians. Likewise he sent an embassage to Pheræ, to signifie so much to them and in the same termes. But the Pheræans giving him no answer againe, dispatched unto the king an embassage of their owne, one Panfanias, a principall man of their citie. Who after he had pleaded the fensible remonstrances to those, that had bene in the like case alleaged and laid soorth in the behalfe and name of the Chalcidians, in that Counsell holden neere the streights of Euripus, and besides, uttered some thing else with more boldnesse and courage; the king dismissed him, after hee had willed them to consider more of the matter, and be well advised, that they tooke not that counsel which anone they would repent, whiles they sought to bee too warie, provident, and forecasting for the future time. When this embassage was related at Pheræ, the citizens tooke no long time to deliberate, but soone resolved in the maintenance of their faith and loialtie to the Romanes, for to undergoe whatsoever hazard the fortune of warre should present unto them. Whereupon, both they addressed themselves to defend the citie with all their might, and also the king began to assault and batter the walls on all parts at once. And knowing well ynough (as in truth there was no doubt) that in the issue of that citie which hee first enterprised, lay the whole importance and consequence of all, either to make him despised ever after, or feared and dread of the Thessalians; therefore he terrified the besieged inhabitants, on every side, and by all meanes possible that he could devise. The first assault they sustained stoutly and manfully; but afterwards, seeing many of the defendants were either overturned and slaine, or grievously hurt and wounded, their hearts began to quaille: yet reclaimed by the rebukes and chastisements of their capitaines and leaders, and animated by their effectuell exhortations, to persist still in their purpose and resolution, they quit the utmost compasse of their wall (seemg at what default they were for want of men) and retired themselves more inward into the citie, into one part thereof, which was strongly fortified with a mure of lesse circuite & cloisture than the other. At the length overcome with travaile and calamities, and fearing, That if they were forced and taken by assault, they should find no mercie nor pardon with the conquerour, they yielded themselves. The king following the traine of victorie, delayed no time, but whiles the fright was fresh, sent foure thousand armed men presently to Scotusa, where the townesmen made no stay, but rendered the towne & themselves incontinently, having before their eies the fresh bleeding example of the Pheræans, who tamed by fine force of wofull miseries, were compelled to doe that at last which they obstinately refused at the first. Together with the citie it selfe was surrendered also Hippolochus and the Larissæan garrison under his hand. All of them the king sent away without any hurt or violence offered unto their persons: for he thought thereby to win the hearts and love of the Larissæans. Having accomplished these exploits within ten daies after his first comming to Pheræ, hee marched toward Crano with all his armie, and at his first comming woon it. Then hee regained and seized Cypæra and Metropolis, and the borroughes and forts about them: so as now all those quarters were subdued and put under his subjection, except Atrax and Gyro. Then he determined to assault Larissa, supposing, that either upon the fearefull terrour of other cities forced, or in regard of his demerite in dismissing the garrison so courteously, or by the present example of so many cities yielding unto him, they would not long persist in their obstinacie. And for to terrifie them the more, he commanded the elephants to march in the forefront of the vaward, and approached himselfe in a square battell, with foure sides, in such sort, as the hearts of many of the Larissæans waded in doubtfull suspence, betwene forced feare of present enemies, and kind regard of absent friends.

In

A In this time Aminander, with the whole youth and manhood of the Athamanes, became master of Peloneum. Menippus also with three thousand Ætolian footmen & two hundred horse went to Perthœbia, woon Mallæa and Cyretia by assault, and wasted the territorie of Triopolis. Having performed these exploits with great expedition and celeritie, they returned to Larissa unto the king, and arrived even then when as the king was in consultation what to doe with Larissa: for the counsell was divided into diverse opinions. Some thought it good to proceed forcibly, and not to deferre but assault the cittie walls with fabrickes and engines of batterie on all sides at once: alledging that the towne being situate in a plaine toward the champaigne field side, might be approached with ease and invetted every way. Others againe inferred one while, that there was no comparison between the strength of this citie and of Pheræ: otherwhile, B that it was now winter time, and a season of the yeere far unfit for warlike executions, and most of all others for the siege and assault of cities. As the king thus hung in the equall ballance of hope and despaire, the ambassadors of Pharfalus arrived, who as good hap was, being come to surrender up their towne, revived his spirits and mightily comforted his heart.

C M. Babinus in this meane while having parlied and conferred with Philip in the Dassaretians countrey, sent Appius Claudius by the common advice of them both, to the succour and defence of Larissa; who passed through Macedonie, and by long journies came to the top of those hills that commaund Gonni. Now this Gonni is a towne twentie miles distant from Larissa, seated just in the very streights of that forest and pafe called Tempe; who having taken up a larger circuit of ground to encampe in, than was proportionable to his number, and made more fires in C shew than need was for that companie, gave semblance unto the enemy (which was the thing he aimed at) that all the Romane forces were there, together with king Philip. King Antiochus therefore pretending unto his armie, that the unseasonable winter time approached, after he had stayed one onely day before Larissa, dislodged, and from thence departed, and so returned to Demetrias. The Ætolians likewise and the Athamanians repaired to their owne countries.

Appius, albeit hee saw that the siege was levied (which was the only cause of his coming) yet downe he went to Larissa to encourage and confirme the hearts of the allies against the time to come. And a two-fold joy there was, both because the enemies were gone and had quit their countrey, and also for that they saw the Romane garison within their walls. King Antiochus departed from Demetrias to Chalcis, where he fell in fancie and love with a damsell of that citie, D daughter of Cleopolemus a Chalcidian. Now after he had made meanes to the maidens father first by intercession of messengers and mediators, and after by importuning him in his owne person with earnest requests by word of mouth (who was very loth and unwilling to entangle and tie himselfe, in marching her so high above his own calling) at length so overcame the man, that he obtained his desire: and as if it had been a time of settled and confirmed peace, he proceeded to consummate and celebrate the marriage. And forgetting cleane, how at one time he had undertaken the charge of two affaires so important, to wit, the warre with the Romanes, and the deliverance of Greece, he passed away the rest of the winter in feasts and bankets, and in those delights and pleasures, which ordinarily (you wote well) follow upon the liberall drinking of wine; yet, and when he had thereby rather wearied his bodie than fulfilled his appetite, hee gave himselfe to sleepe without compasse. The like roiot and loosenesse of life tooke hold of the rest of the kings capitaines, by his example in all places, but in Brœtia especially, such as commaunded the garisons. Nay the very fouldiours were let loose and given over to take voluptuous waies, and not one of them would put on armour, keepe the watch, attend the guard, or doe any thing pertaining to the dutie and charge of a fouldiour. And therefore at the beginning of the spring, when he was come by Phocis and Cheronea, to the Rendez-vous, where hee had appointed from all parts his forces to meet, hee soone perceived that the fouldiours had spent the winter as licentious as their leaders, and kept no better order and streighter discipline. Then he commaunded Alexander the Acarnanian, and Menippus the Macedonian, to lead the armie to Stratus, a town in Ætolia. Himselfe having done sacrifice at Delphi to the honor of Apollo, went forward to Nau-pactum. And after the Diet holden of all the States of Ætolia, in the way which leadeth to Stratus, along by Chalcis and Lyfimachia, hee encountered his owne forces aforesaid, that came by the gulfe of Malea. Where Mnesilochus, a principall Acarnanian, but wrought and bought with many gifts and presents, not only himselfe woon that nation to take part, & to side with the king, but also had drawne to his owne mind and affection Clytus their Pretour, who at that time had the the soveraigne rule there, and might do all in all. He seeing that the Leucadians (who are the chiefe of all the Acarnanians) could not be easily induced nor brought to revolt, for the awe wherein they stood of the Romane fleet, which either was with Attillus, or about Cephalenia, went cunningly to worke with them. For having delivered his opinion in their generall Counsell, That the inland parts of Acarnania were to be well guarded and defended; and that as many as were able to beare armes should go forth to Medio and Tyrreum, for feare those places should be seized by Antiochus and the Ætolians: there were againe some who made answer and said, how there was no such neede that all should be raised and levied so tumultuously in haste; for a garison of five hundred men was sufficient. And when he had obtained that number of young and able men, he placed three hundred of them in garison at Medio, and two hundred at Tyrreum: his reach and drift was to have them put into the kings hands for hostages. And even at that time arrived the kings ambassadors at Medio. Whole embassage being heard, they laid their heads together and consulted in the publick assembly what answer to returne unto the king. Some were of opinion to continue still in the Romane societie: others were of advise againe, that the kings offer of amitie was not to be rejected. The counsell of Clytus was meane and indifferent between both, and therefore accepted: to wit, that they should adresse their ambassadors to the king, to intreat him that he would permit them to take a day of deliberation upon a matter of such consequence, in a full Diet of the Acarnanians. In this embassage Mnesilochus, and those of his faction were employed of set purpose: who having dispatched messengers covertly to the king, to advertise him to approach the towne with his forces, trised out the time themselves, and made no haste to set forward in their embassie. Whereupon these ambassadors were scarcely gone forth of the citie, when Antiochus was entered the borders, and anon shewed himselfe hard at the gates. And whiles they that wist nothing of this treason were affrighted, and in great trouble and turmoile called the youth hastily to arme, he was by Clytus and Mnesilochus let into the citie. Some willingly of themselves came running about the king: those also that were of the adverse part, for very feare joyined with him. Whom he seeing to be afraid and terrified, he entertained with gracious words, and so gently handled them, that in hope of his clemencie so much divulged and spoken of abroad, certaine States of Acarnania revolted & turned unto him. Then from Medio he went to Tyrreum, unto which place he had sent Mnesilochus and his ambassadors aforehand. But the treacherie and fainerie at Medio being discovered, made the Tyrreans more warie and carefull than otherwise fearefull: who made him this plaine direct answer without any double ambiguitie, that they would admit of no new alliance, without the advise and authoritie of the Romane Generals: so, they shut their gates, and disposed armed men upon their walls. Now it fell out very fitly and happily for confirming and encouraging the hearts of the Acarnanians, that Cn. Octavius sent by Quintius, having received a garison and some few ships of A. Posthumius, who by Aulus the Lieutenant had bene appointed Governour of Cephalenia, was come to Leucas, and much comforted the Allies, and put them in good hope: who also gave them to understand, that M. Acilius the Consull had alreadye passed the seas with his legions, and the Romanes were encamped in Thessalie. And for as much as this bruit caried a great likelihood of truth, by reason that the season of the yeere served now for navigation, the king after he had planted a garison at Medio and in other townes of Acarnania, departed from Tyrreum, and passing through the cities of Ætolia and Phocis, returned to Chalcis.

Much about this time M. Babius and king Philip, who had communed and devised together before (during the winter) in the Dassaretians countrey, having sent Appius Claudius into Thessalie, for to raise the siege before Larissa: and because the season then was unmeet and too soone for execution of any exploit, were retired to their wintering harbours, now in the beginning of the Spring joyined all their forces together, & came downe into Thessalie. (Now at that time was Antiochus in Acarnania.) And at their first comming, Philip began to lay siege unto Mallaea, and Babius to Phacium: which when he had forced in manner at the first assault, he won Phetius also with like expedition. From whence having retired himselfe to Atrax, he took Chyretias, and so consequently surprisid Eritium, and after he had planted garisons in these townes that he had thus recovered, he joyined with Philip againe, lying in siege before Mallaea. Upon the very comming of the Romane armie, when the townes-men had yeelded themselves either for feare of forces, or for hope of pardon, they marched jointly together with one armie,

A to recover those townes whereof the Athamanes were seized: to wit, Æginium, Ereicium, Gomphi, Silana, Tricca, Melibæa, & Pholoria. After this, they invested Pellineum, where Philip the Megapolitane lay in garison with five hundred foote, and forrie horse: but before they gave the assault, they sent a trumpet to Philip to give him warning, that he should not adventure to try the utmost hazard. But he returned this answer againe right stoutly unto them, that he would be content to commit himselfe to the Romanes or the Thessalians, he passed not whether, but put his life and estate into the hands of king Philip he never would. Now when it appeared that they were to proceed by force, and for that it seemed that Limnæa also at the same time might be assaulted, it was thought expedient that the king should go to Limnæa, and Babius stayed still to batter and force the towne of Pellineum.

B It fortuned at the sametime that M. Acilius the Cos, having passed the seas with a power of ten thousand foote and two thousand horse, and fiteene Elephants, commaunded certaine chosen Colonels of footmen to conduct all the infanterie to Larissa, whiles himselfe with the Cavallerie came to king Philip before Limnæa. At the comming of the Consull, the towne was yeelded incontinently: the kings garison was delivered, and the Athamanians withall. Then the Consull went from Limnæa to Pellineum, where the Athamanes yeelded first: and afterwards Philip also the Megapolitane rendred himselfe. And as he came downe from the fort, Philip the king chanced to meete with him, and in skorne and derision commaunded his men to salute him with the style of King, and himselfe also by way of mockage, came close unto him, and greeted him by the name of Brother Philip, skoffing & jesting in broad termes, far unfitting C to his royall majestie. Then was he brought before the Consull, and put in ward, and not long after sent bound to Rome. All the multitude besides of the Athamanians, as also of king Antiochus his souldiours, which were within the garisons of those townes that were surrendred about that time, were delivered unto Philip, who amounted to the number of three thousand. The Consull departed toward Larissa, to consult and take advise for the generall course of the whole warre. And in his way there met him embassadours from Pieria and Metropolis, for to render their cities. Philip having courteously and lovingly intreated above all other the prisoners of the Athamanians, that by their meanes he might win the grace and favour of that nation, and conceived some hope to conquer Athamania, led his armie thither, and sent his captives aforehand into their severall cities. Now they were of great account and reputation among their country men, and withall made report of the king his clemencie toward them, and how liberally and bountifully besides he had used them: And Aminander verily, whose presence and majestie had kept some of them in allegiance, fearing least he should be delivered into the hands of Philip (who long time had bene his mortall enemy;) and unto the Romanes, whom he knew to have just cause at that time to be offended with him for his revolt, departed out of his owne realme with his wife and children, and retired himselfe to Ambracia. Thus all Athamania became subject to king Philip, and at his pleasure.

The Consull sojourned certaine daies at Larissa, especially for to refresh his beasts, which first had bene sea sicke, and afterwards were tired with long travaile; and thus when he had renewed as it were, and repaired his armie with a litle rest and repose, he marched to Crato. At his coming thither, these townes, to wit, Pharsalus, Scotussa, and Pheræ, together with king Antiochus his garisons that lay there, were yeelded up unto him. And having put unto their choice, either to be gone or tarry still with him: as many of them as he saw willing (and those were about a thousand) he delivered unto king Philip; the rest he sent backe disarmed, to Demetrius. Then he regained Proerna and the fortresses and piles there, about it. Then began he to conduct forward his armie toward the gulf of Mallæa: and when he approached the freights, upon which the towne Thaumaci is situate, all the flower of the youth in their armour, quit the citie, and put themselves in ambush about the woods and passages, and from the higher ground charged upon the Romanes in their march. The Consull at the first sent certaine unto them, to parle neere at hand with them, and to see if they could skare them from such desperate outrage: but perceiving that they persisted still as they began, hee commaunded a Colonell with two ensignes of souldiours to fetch a compasse about, in such sort, that he gat betweene those armed men and the towne, and kept them from entrance; whereby he possessed himselfe of the citie, being void of defendants. Then they that lay in the forest in ambush, hearing an outcrie behind their backs of the town taken, fled backward out of all parts of the wood, & fell upon the sword. The Consull then then departed from Thaumaci, and the second day came as far as the river Sperchius, and so forward unto the territorie of the Hypataens, which he spoiled.

During the time of these occurrences, Antiochus lay at Chalcis, who by this time seeing that he had gotten in Greece, but the pleasure of one wintering, spent so deliciously in Chalcis, and a dishonourable marriage; began to blame the Ætolians for their vaine promises, and especially Thous; but also for a true Prophet, who foretold him of all things that then were come to passe: howbeit for feare that his cold slacknesse might not overthrow that quite, which his rash follie had begun and enterprised, he sent out his courriers into Ætolia, to give them warning to levie all their youth and assemble them together; and himselfe for his owne part had brought thither almost ten thousand footmen, who were made up full and furnished by them that after came out of Asia, and five hundred horsemen besides. To this place, perceiving that there repaired smaller numbers by many degrees than ever at any time before, and that they were but the Nobles onely and some few of their vassals, (who protested, that they had done their endeavour to levie out of their cities as many as possibly they could: but neither by authoritie, nor for love and favour, ne yet with absolute commaund, were they able to prevaile or doe any good with them that refused warfare:) and seeing himselfe thus forsaken on all sides, as well of his owne subjects who dragged behind in Asia, as of his allies who performed not those matters, in the hope whereof they had called him to assist them, hee withdrew himselfe within the streights of Thermopylae.

This mountaine divideth Greece in the verie middle, like as Italie is parted in twaine by the ridge of the Apennine. On the fore-part of this streight and forest of Thermopylae toward the North, lyeth Epirus and Perrhaebia, Magnesia and Thessalie, also the Phthioræ of Achæa, and the gulfe Mæalea: but within-foorth Southward, is discovered the greater part of Ætolia and Acarnania, Phocis, Locris, and Bæotia, together with the Iland Euboea joyning close thereto: behind it, is situate the country of Attica, running into the sea like a promontorie, and besides it Peloponnesus. This mountain taking his beginning at Leucas and the Ponant or Westerne sea, reacheth through Ætolia to the Levant or Easterly Ocean, and is so full of rocks & rough crags betwene, that no whole armies, no nor so much as single travellers lightly appointed, can find but hardly and with much adoe the waies and paths to passe through: the utmost browes and the hills of this mountain bending toward the East, they call Oeta; and the highest pitch & knap thereof, is called Callidromos; at the foot wherof, lyeth the vally leading toward the gulfe of Mæalea, wherein the plaine is not above threescore paces broad. And this is the only high and port-way by which an armie may march, if it be not otherwise empeached. And hereupon it is, that the passage is called * Pylæ: and of some (because there are found therein certaine naturall hot waters or baines) Thermopylae: even that verie place which is so famous and renowned for the memorable death of the Lacedæmonians, more than for any worthie battaile against the Persians. Here lay encamped Antiochus at this present (carrying nothing that mind nor resolution as those Lacedæmonians did) within the gates as it were of the streights, where he enclosed and stopped the passage besides, with strong defences: And when he had cast a double rampire and trench, yea and raised a mure and wall where need was (which to doe the place afforded him great plentie of stone lying every where) and had made all sure: presuming confidently that the Romane armie would never venture nor be able to breake through those barricadoes that way: he sent of those four thousand Ætolians (for so many were met together) some to keepe a garrison in Heraclea, situate even before the very gullet and streight; and others to Hypata: for that he made no doubt, but the Consull would assaile Heraclea, and many posts brought word, that all about Hypata was alreadie wasted.

Now the Consull having spoiled the territorie of Hypata first, and then of Heraclea, (where the Ætolian aids did no good and served to no purpose in the one place or the other) pitched his campe over-against the king, even in the verie mouth of the gullet, neere the fountaines of the hot waters aforesaid: both those regiments abovenamed of the Ætolians wer gotten within the towne Heraclea, and there kept themselves sure. Antiochus, who before he saw his enemies, thought all was fast enough and sufficiently fenced, began then to feare least the Romane souldiours would find out some privie pathes and waies, whereby they might passe and get over those high hills that commaunded his campe: for a rumour ran, that the Lacedæmonians in times past were

A were so enclosed by the Persians, and of late daies also king Philip was likewise compassed and environed by these very same Romans. Whereupon he dispatched a messenger to the Ætolians in Heraclea, willing them to doe him thus much service yet in theis his warres, as to seize the tops of those hills and to keepe them, that the Romanes might have no passage that way. Upon this message received, there arose some dissention among the Ætolians. Some were of mind to obey the king his will and commaundement, and to goe accordingly; but others thought better to tarric still at Heraclea, to attend upon fortune, and see what would happen: to the end, that if the king should chaunce to be vanquished by the Consull, they might have in readinesse their forces fresh and in heart, to succour and aid their owne cities neere at hand; for if his lucke were to defeat the Consull, then they might follow the Romanes in chafe, when they were disbanded and scattered asunder. Both parts, thus divided as they were, not onely persisted still in their severall designments, but also put the same in execution by themselves. For two thousand of them remained at Heraclea; the other two thousand parted themselves three waies, namely, to Callidromos, to Rhoduntia, and Tichius, (these are the names of three principall high hills;) and each companie tooke and held one. The Consull when hee saw that the Ætolians were possessed of these higher places, sent M. Porcius Cato and L. Valerius Flaccus, two of his lieutenants (who both had beene Consuls) with two thousand chosen men against these holds of the Ætolians, to wit, Flaccus against Rhoduntia and Tichius, and Cato against Callidromos: himselfe before that hee advanced his battaile against his enemies, made a briefe speech unto his souldiers in this manner: My souldiours, I see that the most part of you, even of everie qualitie and degree, are they that in this very province sometime served under the conduct, charge, and governance of T. Quintius in the Macedonian war. The streights of that passage then, neere the river Aous, were far more difficult to gaine and get over, than this is; for here are verie gates, yea and one naturall way (as it were) to passe through, as if all els were stopped up between two seas. There were more stronger defences and skonces against them at that time, and those planted in places more convenient and commodious. The armie of the enemies then, was both for number greater, & for men and souldiers much better; for therein were the Macedonians, the Thracians, and the Illyrians, all most fierce and warrelike nations: in this, are Syrians and Asiaticke Greekes, or halfe Asians, the vaineest kind of people of all others, & borne to serve. The king there, [namely Philip] a most noble warrior, exercised and inured ever from his youth in the neighbour-wars of the Thracians and Illyrians, and all the nations bordering upon him: but this Antiochus (to say no thing of all his life besides) is he, who being come out of Asia into Europe, for to make war upon the people of Rome, hath done all the long winter time nothing more memorable than this. That for to please his wanton lust hee hath taken to wife the daughter of a privat person; a man (I say) of low degree & base qualitie among other citizens: and this new married man, sed far and franked (as I may so say) with daintie suppers and delicate bride bankets, is come forth (forsooth) to fight a battaile. His whole strength and all his hope hath beene in the Ætolians, a people of all others most vaine, unconstant, and unthankfull, as yee have tried heretofore, and Antiochus findeth true at this present. For neither assembled they in great number, nor possible was it to keepe them together in the campe: nay, which more is, they mutine among themselves, and having demanded and required the guard of Hypata and Heraclea, they have defended neither the one nor the other. Some of them are fled to the tops of the mountaines; others have shut themselves within Heraclea. The king himselfe hath confessed plainly, that he was never so hardie as to meet in plaine field and affront the enemy, no nor so much as to pitch his campe in open ground; in that abandoning all that countrie before him, which hee vaunted and bragged that hee had taken from us and Philip, hee hath hidden himselfe among the rockes. Hee hath not encamped before the entrance of the gullet and streights (as the same goeth of the Lacedæmonians in times past) but pitched his tents farre within-foorth. And to bewray his cowardly feare, What difference is there between so doing, and housing himselfe within the walles of some citie for to bee besieged? But neither shall those narrow streights save him, no more than those steepe hilles defend the Ætolians, which they have seized. This one thing hath beene forecast and provided for on all sides, that yee shall have nothing to make head against, but your enemies. Now must yee resolve upon this point, That yee fight not onely for the libertie of Greece (and yet even this also were a brave and honourable tide, to bee said for to deliver the same now out of the hands of Antiochus and the Ætolians, which before you freed from king Philip nor that yee shall have no other reward and recompence for your G paines, but that which we shall find now in the kings camp, but also that the great provision and furniture which daily is expected from Ephesus, shall be your prise and bootie, and that yee shall hereafter make a way for the Romane Empire into Asia, Syria, and all those most wealthie and rich realmes, even as farre as to the Levant sunne. And what shall let us then, but that from Gades to the red sea, wee bound and limit our State and dominion, even with the very Ocean that environneth and compasseth the round globe of the earth? What shall hinder us, I say, but that all the nations of the world shall honour and worship the Romane name next unto the immortal gods? Prepare your hearts therefore and courages answerable to so high rewards, that with the leave and helpe of the gods we may to morrow fight a field. After this speech the assembly brake up, and the souldiours being dismissed, made readie their armor and weapons, before they took H repast or repose. And in the morning, by dawning of the day, the Consull put out the signall of battell, and set his armie in array, with a narrow and pointed front, according to thenature and strength of the place. The king seeing the ensignes of his enemies, led forth his forces likewise. Part of his light armours he planted before the rampier and trench in the forefront, then he placed the flower and strength of the Macedonians, whome they call Sarissophori, i. Pikemen, for the suretie and safeguard of his defences and fortifications. And to flanke these on the left side, he put the archers, the slingers of darts, and slingers of stones, hard upon the foot of the hill, that from the higher ground they might assaile and pelt the naked sides of the enemies. On the right flanke of these Macedonians, at the very edge and point of the mures and defences, which as they were enclosed and mounded with those places which reach to the sea, and are unpassable I by reason of the bogs, muddie marishes, quavemires, and quicksands, hee set the elephants with their ordinarie and usuall guard. After them his horsemen and men of armes. Then leaving an indifferent space between, he raunged the rest of his forces in the second ward or middle battailion. The Macedonians who were bestowed before the camp and the trench, at the first sustained the Romanes easily enough (who assailed on every side to make an entrie) for much helpe they had of them, who from the upper ground weighed bullets out of their slings, as thick as an haile forme, who launched darts also, and shot arrowes besides. But when as afterwards greater numbers of enemies preased upon them, and charged them with such violence as possibly might not be endured, they gave ground, and retired within their fortifications, keeping yett their array and their ranks whole. And then from the rampier they made (as it were) another palliade with their K long pikes that they held out afore them. Now the height of their campe-mure was so reasonable, that as it afforded some rise and vantage of ground for their owne men to fight upon it, so by reason of the length of their speares, they might reach the enemy under them. Inasmuch as many of the Romanes approching rashly, and venturing to clamber up, were runne cleane through, and either they had given over and done nothing, or els more of them had died for it, but that M. Porcius Cato having beaten from the top of Callidromus the Ætolians, and slaine a great part of them (for he surprised them suddainely at unwares, and most of them fast asleepe) appeared upon the hill that commaundeth the campe. Flaccus sped not so well at Tichius and Rhodiuntia, who laboured to get up those cliffes and holds, but to no purpose. The Macedonians and the rest that were in the kings hoast and campe, at first, when they descried a farre off L nothing but a multitude and number marching, imagined verily, that they were the Ætolians, who having discovered the battell and fight a good way off, were comming to aid them. But so soone as they beheld and discerned neere at hand the ensignes and armour of the Romanes, they tooke themselves in their owne error, and were upon a suddaine stricken with such feare, that they all flung their weapons away, and fled. But both their fortifications and defences in the way, and also the narrowness of the vale through which they were to bee pursued, hindered the Romanes in following the chase. And the elephants above all which were in the rereward, took up the ground so, as that the footmen could hardly passe by them, and the horsemen by no meanes possible: so afrighted were the horses, and caused more trouble and disorder among themselves, than they M did during the battell. Besides, the Romanes staid some time behind, whiles they rised and ransacked the campe. Howbeit, they had the enemy in chase that day as farre as Lyleum, killing and taking in the very way, not onely many horses and men, but also slaying the elephants which they could not take alive; which done, they returned to their owne campe, which that day had beeene assailed by the Ætolians, who were of the garrison of Heraclea: but that enterprise, as it was exceeding bold and audacious, so it tooke no effect at all. The Consull having at the releefe of the third watch the night ensuing, sent before his Cavallerie to pursue the enemy, advanced likewise the ensignes of his legions forward by breake of day. The king by this time had woon some ground, and gotten a good way before; for hee never gave over galloping with bridle in horfeneck, untill he had recovered Elatia. Where first he gathered together the broken ends of his armie thus disperfed in flight, and so having rallied a small and poore troupe of souldiours, and the same armed by the halves, hee retired to Chalcis. The Romane Cavallerie was not able to overtake the king himselfe at Elatia, but overthrew and cut off a great part of his armie, which either for wearinesse rested themselves dragging behind, or else were scattered one from the other, as missing their way in those unknowne quarters, going as they did without their guides: & setting aside five hundred which kept about the king, there was not one that escaped of the whole armie. Which was but a smal number, in proportion of 10000, (if they were no more) for so many (according to Polybius) we have written that the king conducted over with him for his part into Greece. What were they then to that great power, which (if we believe Valerius Antias) came with the king, for hee writeth that hee had in his hoast threescore thousand, and that fortie thousand were slaine of them, and above five thousand taken prisoners, with the losse of militarie ensignes two hundred and thirtie. Of Romanes there died in all a hundred and fittie.

was

As the Consull marched with his armie through Phocis and Beotia, the States and cities which were privie to the revolt, and partly culpable, stood without their gates with their infules and veiles in token of peace, and craved mercie, fearing they should have beene pilled and ransacked as enemies. But his hoast journeyed every day as in a peaceable & friend-country, doing no hurt or wrong to any earthly creature, untill they were come into the territorie of Corona: where the Statue or image of Antiochus erected in the temple of Minerva Itanea kindled their choler, and the souldiours were permitted to spoile the country lying about that temple. But bethinking themselves, that (considering the said Statue was set up with the publicke consent of all Beotia) it was an indignitie to deale so hardly with that territorie onely of Corona, the souldiours were immediately called in and reclaimed, and so they ceased the waiting and spoiling thereof. The Beotians onely had a checke and rebuke by words, for carrying so unthankfull hearts to the Romanes, of whom they had so lately received such high favours and benefices.

At the very time of the battell aforesaid, there rid at anker ten ships of the kings, in the gulf D of Malea neere to Thronium, under the charge and conduct of Isidorus. To which place Alexander the Acarnanian, being fled from the conflict, fresh bleeding and full of greivous wounds, brought newes of the unfortunate fight. Whereupon the ships in great feare for this late terror, made hast and away to Ceneum in Eubæa, where Alexander died, and was interred. But three other ships which were come out of Asia, and lay in the same rode, upon the newes of the defeature of the armie, returned to Ephesus. And Isidorus crossed the seas from Ceneum to Demetria, as if peradventure the king were fled thither. About that very time, A. Atilius the admirall of the Romane navie, intercepted and surprised great store of the kings provisions, which had passed alreadie the streights neere the Iland Andros. Some ships he sunke, others he boured and tooke: as for those that came himmost in the rereward, they turned saile, and shaped their course E into Asia. Atilius being returned to Pyræum (from whence he came) with a flecte of ships taken from the enemies, divided great store of come both among the Atheniens, and other allies also of that countrie.

Antiochus somewhat before the Consull his comming, loosed from Chalcis, and first fell with the island Tenus, and afterwards sailed to Ephesus. Against the Consull his arrivall at Chal-cis the gates were set open for him, and Aristotle the Captaine there for the king, quit the place upon the approachment of the Consull. In like manner other cities in Eubæa yielded without resistance. And so within few dayes (when all troubles were appeased and set in quiet order without the hurt and damage of any one citie) the armie was brought back to Thermopyla, and wan much more honor and commendation for the modestie used after victorie, than for the victo-rie it selfe.

From thence the Consull dispatched M. Cato to Rome, by whose certeine and sure relation, the Senat and people might have full knowledge of all the affaires that had passed. Who taking sea at Creusa (a port towne of Merchandise standing within the inmost gulf of Corinth) arrived at Patra, a citie in Achæa. From Patra, he coasted along the rivers of Ætolia and Acarnania,

namia, as far as Corphu, and so cut over to *Hydruntum in Italie, from whence he travailed by G land, and in exceeding great hast within five dayes came to Rome. Early in the morning before day light he entred the citie, and from the gate rode directly to M. Iunius the Pretour, who assembled the Senate betimes by the breake of day: and thither, L. Cornelius Scipio (who some dayes before had bene dismissed & sent away from the camp by the Consull) hearing at his first comming that Cato was gotten before him, and in the Senate, repaired, even as he was relating the newes. Then these two Lieutenants by the commaundement of the Senate were presented in the generall assembly of the people, where they declared the same which they had done before in the Senate house, as touching the deeds achieved in Ætolia. And ordeined it was, that a solemne procession for three dayes should be holden, and that the Pretour should sacrifice fortie head of greater beasts, in the honor of what gods he would himselfe.

And at the same time M. Fulvius Nobilior, who two yeeres before went as Pretour into the farther Spaine, entred the citie in pomp of an Ovation, or petie triumph. He caused to be borne before him of silver bigates 130000. And besides that silver in coine and readie monie, 12000 pound weight. Also in gold the weight of 127 pound. Acilius the Consull sent certeine messengers from Thermopylæ to the Ætolians at Heraclea, to advertise them that before he came they would now at last be wiser and bethinke themselves (after such experience of the king his vanitie and insufficiencie) for to deliver up Heraclea, and crave pardon of the Senate, either for their wilfull folly, or their blind error. Who used these and such like motives and inducements unto them, namely, That other cities likewise of Greece (during this warre) abandoned the Romanes and revolted from them, at whose hands they had received so many benefites: yet because that after the king was fled (upon whose assurance they had disloyally broken their allegiance) they stood not out still, nor persisted obstinately in their fault and folly, were received to mercie and protection. The Ætolians likewise albeit they followed not the king, but sent for him, and were rather conducters and leaders, than companions and associates in this warre, yet it they could take up in time and repent, they might be pardoned and saved. But no answer returned they tending to peace: nay it appeared, that the matter would come to a triall by armes, and for all the king was vanquished, yet the Ætolian warre was behind as wholly and enier as before time. Whereupon the Consull dislodged from Thermopylæ, and marched directly against Heraclea: yea and the very same day he rode on horseback all about the walls to view the situation of the citie. This Heraclea is seated at the foote of the mountaine Oeta: and though the towne it selfe standeth in a plaine, yet a fortresse it hath built upon an high ground, which as it overlooketh the citie, so it is so steepe on every side, that it is altogether inaccessible. After he had diligently beheld all things that were to be marked and knowne, he determined to assault the towne in foure places at once. Vnto L. Valerius he gave in charge to plant his platformes and to batter that side where the river Asopus runneth, & where the publick place of exercise is built. T. Sempronius Longus had commission to assaile the castle, without the walls indeed, but yet better inhabited & more peopled (as a man would say) than the towne it selfe. On that side which standeth toward the gulph of Malca, which part yeilded the hardest access, he appointed M. Be- bitus. And from another pretie river which they call *Melas, he set Appius Claudius opposite against the temple of Diana. Through the great industrie and earnest labour of these foure gallants, striving who could performe the best service, the worke went so well forward, that within few dayes the frames and platformes, the Rammes and all other engines of batterie meete for the assault of cities, were finished. For besides that the territorie about Heraclea, being a moorie ground and full of tall trees, afforded them plentie enough of timber to frame and performe all sorts of fabricks: the houses also in the entrie of the citie without in the Suburbs standing void, by reason that the Ætolians had put themselves within the walls, yeilded unto them not onely posts, beames, joists, planks and boards, but brick and tile, plaster, mortar, and stone of all sizes for divers and sundrie uses. So, the Romanes assaulted the towne rather with fabricks, ordinance and artillery, than by force of armes: but the Ætolians contrariwise defended themselves by maine strength and their weapons. For when as the walls should be shaken with the rammes, they caught not hold of them as the manner is with cords, and by plucking them aside, avoided their jures; but armed in great number, they carried fire with them to sing upon the terraces and the fabricks. They had besides divers vaults and arches in the walls, at which they could redily and fitly fallie out: and ever as themselves closed up the breaches of their walls, or

A made new for the ruinate, they would remember to make more of those vaults still, that in many places at once they might breake forth upon their enemies. Thus for the first dayes, while they were fresh in heart, they issued forth oftentimes & many together, & quit themselves right lustily: but afterwards in fewer numbers, & more slackly every day than other. For being evermore employed about many things at once, nothing so much tamed and wearied them, as watching. For whereas the Romanes had a great number of souldiours, and one garded after another successively by turnes, the Ætolians being so few, were constrained without any change, to continue in incessant labor night and day. Thus for the space of 24 dayes they had no rest nor respite, but day and night was all one unto them, maintaining fight still, and labouring without intermission against the enemies that assailed the citie in all foure quarters at once. When the Consull knew once that the Ætolians were weerie and overtoiled (partly by counting the time, and partly by that which he had learned of certeine fugitives) he used this pollicie & stratageme. About midnight he sounded the retreat, and having drawne all his souldiours at once from the assault, held them quiet in the camp untill the third houre of the day. After that, he began to give a fresh charge, and continued it unto midnight following, and so gave over againe untill the same houre before noone. The Ætolians supposing verily that the cause why they surceased the assault, was for very wearinesse (like as themselves were tired out) so soone as the Romanes had the retreat sounded unto them, departed every man from his ward and quarter, as if they also by the same signal were called away, & shewed not themselves in armor upon the walls before the third houre of the next day. The Consull having at one time given over the battérie aforesaid at midnight, C began at the *fourth watch a fresh assault again with all forcible means in three parts: and at one * Three of the side, he gave commaundement to T. Sempronius to keepe his men together, and intently to observe and wait for the signall: assuring himselfe that in the alarme by night, the enemies would run to those places from whence they heard the noyse. The Ætolians, many of them being found asleepe, had much to do to rouse themselves, & were loth to rise up from their sweet sleep, their bodies being so weary with toiling, moiling, and watching before. Some of them who were yet awake ran in the darke to the place where the assailants made a noyse. Their enemies laboured to get into the towne, some by mounting over the ruines and breaches of the broken wall, others by skaling & climbing with ladders. And against them the Ætolians ran from all parts, redy to succor and help. One quarter, whereas there stood houses without the citie, was neither defended nor assailed: but as there were some redy, & waited for the signall to give the assault, so there was not one of the other part for to resist and defend. Now began the day to peepe, when as the Consull put forth the signall, and the souldiers began to mount over into the citie, & found none to withstand them: some entred at the walls halfe broken downe, other scaled them with ladders where they stood whole & sound. And the cry was not so soone heard that the citie was taken, but the Ætolians left their gards on all sides, & fled into the Castle. The souldiers that had woon the towne were permitted by the Consull to rise and ranfack it: which was not done so much upon anger & despite, as in this regard, that the souldiers who had ben kept short & fasting thus long (notwithstanding so many townes recovered out of the enemies hands) might once at length in some one place tast the fruit of victorie. The Consull having called from thence about noone, the E souldiers unto him, divided them into two parts, whereof he commaunded the one to cast about the foot of the hills unto a rock or cliffe, which being in height equall to the castle aforesaid, was notwithstanding divided from it by a valley betweene, seeming as if it had bene sometime a part thereof and cut from it. Now these two points of the hills shot up so neere together in the head, that from the top of the one, a man might launce a dart into the castle or fortresse. The Consull with the other halfe of his souldiours staid beneath, expecting a signe and token from them that were to get up to the cliffe behind, redie thereupon to mount up from the towne side into the fort. The Ætolians that were within the castle, could neither abide at the first the sight of those that had seized the cliffe, nor afterwards the assault of the Romanes from the citie, both for that their hearts failed them & were daunted already, and also because they were unprovided of all necessaries for to endure any long siege & assault: considering that women & children & all the other impotent multitude unmeet to beare arms, were gotten thither in so great numbers, that the place was hardly able to receive & conteine, much lesse to keepe & maintaine them: and therefore at the first assault, they cast downe their weapons, and yeilded. Among other principall personages of the Ætolians, Damocritus also was delivered; hee, who in the beginning of the war when

T. Quintus

T. Quintius desired to see a copie of the Decree of the Ætolians for the sending for Antiochus, G answered, That he would shew it him in Italie, when the Ætolians lay there encamped. For this proud speech of his, the Romanes now conquerours, were the gladder that they had gotten him into their hands.

During the time that the Romanes assailed Heraclea, Philip also besieged and battered Lamia, according as it was before agreed between them: for neere unto Thermopylae, at what time as the Consull returned out of Bæotia, he met with him, of purpose to signifie his joy in the behalfe of him and the people of Rome, for their achieved victorie; and also to excuse himselfe by occasion of sickness, that he was not present with him in person in the managing of the wars. From thence they parted asunder, and took divers waies, for to assault these two cities (as I said) both at once: and distant they were one from the other neere 7 miles. And forasmuch as Lamia H was seated upon an hill, therefore the town discovered and overlooked all the country about; but especially on that side toward Heraclea, where, by reason that it seemeth a lesse compasse, it representeth a full prospect to the eye. When as the Romans and Macedonians laboring a vie and striving who could doe better, were day and night emploied either about their fabricks and pioneers worke, or else in skirmish and fight: the Macedonians found more difficultie than they, in this respect, that the Romans were busied in platforms, mantlets, & works all above ground; but the Macedonians were put to undermine: and oftentimes (as it falleth out in such stonie & cragie ground) they met with hard flints & rags not minable, and such as no yron or steel-toole was able to touch and pierce. The king seeing litle good done by this meanes, and his enterprize going but slowly forward, began to fownd the townesmen, and to tempt them to render the citie, I using the mediation therein of their chiefe citizens whome he parled withall: for this reckoning he made, that if Heraclea were forced before it, they within the citie would sooner yeeld unto the Romans than to him, and so the Consull should win all the thanke to himselfe for levying the siege. And nothing was he short of his count; for immediately upon the winning of Heraclea, a messenger came unto him from the Consull, willing him to surcease the assault and the siege; alledging it was more reason, that the Romanes souldiours who had fought in raunged battell with the Ætolians, should have the reward and recompence of the victorie. By this means Lamia was abandoned, and by the ruine of Heraclea her neighbour citie, avoided and escaped the like calamitie of her owne.

Some few daies before that Heraclea was woen, the Ætolians having assembled a Diet at Hypata, addrest Embassadours unto Antiochus, and Thoss among the rest, even hee, who aforetime had bene sent unto him. His commission and charge was, first, To request the king that once againe hee would rallie his forces as well by land as at sea, and in person passe over into Greece: secondly, If any other important affaires hindred him, yet that hee would send unto them both men and money. For as it touched his Highnesse, in honour, reputation and credit, not to see his allies abandoned; so it made for the safeguard and securitie of his owne realme and royall estate, not to suffer the Romanes (after they had once deffeated the Ætolians) to saile over into Asia at their ease and pleasure, with all their forces. These were no feigned devises, but true remonstrances indeed; and therefore prevailed the more with the king. Whereupon hee delivered money presently to the Embassadours, sufficient to defray the charges of the warre, and promised certainly to send men to serve both by land and sea. Thoss alone of all the Embassadours hee kept still with him, who was not himselfe unwilling to stay behind, because hee might be ever at hand to call upon the king for to performe his word and behest. But the winning of Heraclea killed the hearts cleane of the Ætolians in the end: and within few daies after that they had dispatched their Embassadours into Asia about the renewing of the warre and sending for the king, they laid apart all designments of armes, and addrest their Oratours unto the Romanes to crave peace. Who, as they began to make some speech, the Consull cut them off, and said, he had other matters of greater importance to thinke upon and to dispatch; and commaunded them to content themselves with a truce for ten daies, and to returne to Hypata; and with them he sent L. Valerius Flaccus, unto whom they should declare those things that they were about to deliver unto him, and whatsoever else they had to say. When they were arrived at Hypata, the chiefe and principall Ætolians assembled themselves in the lodging of Flaccus, consulting with him what course they were to take in their treatie with the Consull. And when they went in hand to alledge the auncient rights of the leagues, and to lay abroad their good demerits, demerits, and what they had done for the Romanes: Flaccus bad them lay a straw there, and speake no more of the priviledge of those covenants and accords which they themselves had broken; shewing unto them, that they should speed better and gaine more by a simple confession of their trespass, and in recourse only to praier and humble supplication; for as much as all the hope they might have of safetie, rested not in their owne desert and goodnesse of their cause, but in the meere clemencie and mercie of the people of Rome: promising for his part to assist them and second their petitions as well to the Consull as the Senate of Rome, since that thither also they must of necessitie send an embassage. This way seemed to them all, the best simply for their safetie, namely, to put themselves to the disposition and devotion of the Romanes: for they supposed by this meanes to drive the Romanes for very shame to have regard of them, and not to offer hurt or violent outrage to them, comming in the habit of poore suppliants: and yet withall, if any opportunitee of better fortune should in the meane time offer it selfe unto them, to be their owne masters neverthelesse and at their choise. When they were come before the Consull, Phaneas the chiefe of that embassie, made a long Oration, couching and framing his words sundrie waies right artificially, to mitigate and assuage the wrath of the conquerour, which he knit up and concluded with this speech, saying, That the Ætolians committed themselves and all that they had to the mercie and protection of the people of Rome. When the Consull heard those words: See you doe so then indeed (quoth hee) O yee Ætolians, and take heed I advise you that you deale herein bona fide. Then Phaneas brought forth and shewed a faire instrument of a Decree, wherein the same was engrossed in plaine termes. Since that (quoth he againe) you meane good earnest, and are at our disposition, I demaund that yee deliver unto me out of hand Dicaearchus a statesman of yours, and Atenates of Epirus, (who being entred into Naupactum with a garrison, had compelled the citie to revolt) also Aminander and all the Nobles of the Athamans, by whose counsell and suggestions yee fell from us and rebelled. Phaneas interrupted the Consull before he had well made an end of his speech, Wee yeeld not our selves (quoth he) to be your villaines and slaves, but as allies to be protected by you: and I am verily perswaded you know not what you do, to impose those things upon us against all the manner and custome of the Greekes. The Consull replied againe; In good faith, I passe not (quoth he) greatly what the Ætolians deeme well or ill done according to the fashions of the Greekes; all the whiles that I, after the custome of the Romanes, have that power and commaund over D them, who erewhile by vertue of their owne decree yeelded unto us, and heretofore by force of our armes have bene vanquished and subdued by us. And therefore, unlesse that bee executed which I commaund, yea and with speed, my will is, that presently here you bee bound hand and foot: and with that he commaunded chaines and gives to be brought forth, and the Listsours to come about them for to lay hold upon them. Then the stout courage both of Phaneas & the rest of the Ætolians, was well cooled and abated: and so at length they saw in what poore plight they were. And Phaneas made answer, That both himselfe and the Ætolians there present in place, knew well, that those things were to bee performed which were imposed upon them, but (quoth hee) there needs a Counsell of the Ætolians for to enact a decree thereof, and therefore hee requested the Consull to allow a surcease of armes onely for tenne daies. Then Flaccus began to speake for the Ætolians, and at his request the said abstinence was graunted, and so they returned to Hypata. When Phaneas had related in the privie counsell of those elect peeres of that nation called Apocleti, as well the demaunds that were commaunded, as what had like to have fallen upon themselves in person, the peeres sighed deeply and groned againe, to see their miserable condition; howbeit they were all of opinion, that the victour must of necessitie bee obeyed: and a generall parliament assembled of the Ætolian burgeoises out of all their townes and cities. When all that multitude was gathered together, and heard the same related againe, their hearts so fretted within them at the crueltie and indignitie of those lordly commaunds, that if they had been well settled in peace, yet such a fit of anger had been ynough to have put them into armes. And to stirre the fume and choler the more, the difficultie of effecting the things demaunded, helped well: for how possibly could they compasse to deliver Aminander, being as hee was an absolute king? But even then there was presented unto them by chauce a new hope. For E Nicander at that very time, comming from king Antiochus, filled the peoples heads with this vaine expectation, namely that the king made wonderous provision for warre, as well by sea as land. This Nicander having accomplished his embassage, and made returne againe into Ætolia, lia, within the compasse of twelve daies, after he was embarked, arrived at Phalera in the gulf of G Maleas: from whence having brought the monies which hee had, downe to Lamia, whiles himselfe with certain deliver men and lightly appointed, travelled toward Hypata in the evening, betwene the Roman and Ætolian campe, through pathes that he well knew; he chanced to stumble ere he was aware, upon the corps de guard of the Macedonians, and was brought to the king before supper was done, the table taken up, and the king risen. When Philip was advertised thereof, he shewed no other countenance, than if a friend or guest, and not an enemy was come; hee bad him sit downe at the board, and eat his meat. Afterwards hee kept him there with him still in the rouse, and voided all the rest, willing him in no case to bee afraid. He blamed greedily the bad courtes and designements of the Ætolians (which evermore lighted upon their own pates) who first had brought the Romanes, and then Antiochus into Greece. But for my part (quoth hee) since things done and past, may sooner bee blamed than amended, I am content to forget and put all under my foot, and will never bee the man that will seeme to insult over them in their distresse and adversitie. And so should the Ætolians likewise take up in time, and lay aside all their rancour and mallice to me: and Nicander especially ought to remember this day, on which by me his life was preserved. With that he sent him away with a good convoy, until he was past all danger: and this Nicander, as is before said, came to Hypata, even as the Ætolians were in deepe consultation about peace with the Romanes.

M. Acilius having either sold outright or given away to the souldiours the bootie of the country about Heraclea, and hearing that the counsell at Hypata nothing tended to peace, and that the Ætolians were run together to Naupactum, for to abide in that place the whole violence of the warre; sent Appius Claudius afore, with foure thousand souldiours to seize the tops of the mountaines, where as the passages were difficult; and himselfe ascended up to the hill Oeta, and sacrificed to Hercules in that very place which they call Pyra, by occasion that the mortall bodie of that god was there consumed with fire: from whence hee departed with his whole armie, and performed the rest of his journey well, and marched with ease. Being come to Corax (an exceeding high mountaine betwene Callipolis and Naupactum) he lost there many of his labouring beatts and sumpter horses, which together with their loades and fardels, as they went, tumbled downe headlong from the mountaine, and his men also were much troubled and encumbered. Whereby it was soone seene, with how lazie and idle an enemy hee had to deale, who had not betet and kept with a guard that difficult passage, to empeach and shut up the thoroughfare from the enemies. Howbeit, as much toiled and troubled as his armie was, hee descended to Naupactum. And having erected one fort against the castle, hee invested all the other parts of the citie, and divided his forces according to the situation of the walls. This siege hee found as toilsome and painefull, as that at Heraclea.

At the same time began the Achæans to lay siege to Messene also in Peloponnesus, for that it refused to be of their counsell and association. For these two cities, Messene and Elis, were exempt from the Achæan Diet, and accorded with the Ætolians. Howbeit, the Eleans, after that Antiochus was chased out of Greece, gave the embassadours of Achæa a more mild answer, to wit, That when they had discharged and sent away the kings garrison, they would consider of the matter what to do. But the Messenians having without any answer at all, sent the embassadours away, had levied warre; and fearing much their owne estate, seeing their territorie overspread with an armie, and every where burned, yea, and their enemies encamped neere unto their citie, addressed unto Chalcis their embassadours to T. Quintius (the very man who before had set them at libertie) to signifie unto him, That the Messenians were readie both to open their gates, & also to surrender their citie unto the Romanes, and not to the Achæans. Quintius so soone as he had heard their embassage, sent a messenger incontinently to Megalopolis, unto Diophanes, the Pretour there of the Achæans, to commaund him presently to retire his hoast from Messene, and to repaire unto him. Diophanes obeyed his commaundement, and having raised his siege, marched himselfe lightly appointed for speed, before the rest of his armie, and about Andania, a small town betwene Megalopolis and Messene, encountred Quintius. Unto whom after he had shewed the causes of the siege, he received at his hands a gentle rebuke only, for that he had enterprised a matter of so great consequence without his authoritie; with an expresse commaundement also to casse and discharge his armie, and not to disturbe and trouble the peace, made for the good and benefit of all. The Messenians likewise he charged to call home their banished persons into their

A their citie, and to joine with the Achæans in their general Diet and assembly. And if they either had any matters to refuse, or would willingly provide for themselves against the future time, hee willed them to make their repaire unto him at Corinth, and enjoined Diophanes immediately to summon the Diet of the Achæans for him, where personally himselfe would be. Where, after he had complained as touching the Island Zacynthus, that by fraud and trecherie they had come by and kept, he required that it should bee restored to the Romanes. Now this Isle had sometime appertained to Philip the king of the Macedonians, and he gave it unto Aminander, in consideration, that he might conduct his armie into the higher parts of Ætolia, through Athamania: in which expeditions and exploits of his, the Ætolians hearts were so abated and quailed, that they were constrained to seek peace. Aminander made first Philip the Megapolitane, governor of this Island; but afterwards, in time of that war wherein he banded with Antiochus against the Romanes, he called him away from thence to employ him in martiall affaires, and sent Hierocles the Agrigentine to succeed him in his place. This Hierocles, after the defeature and flight of Antiochus from Thermopylæ, and the expulsion of Aminander out of Athamania by king Philip, dispatched of his owne motion certaine messengers unto Diophanes, the Pretour of the Achæans, and for a summe of money agreed upon betwene them, betrayed the Island to the Achæans. The Romanes thought it great reason, that this Island should bee theirs, in recompence for the warres which they had maintained for as much as M. Acilius the Consull, & the Roman legions fought not at Thermopylæ for Diophanes, ne yet for the Achæans. Diophanes to these chalenges and demands sometime excused himselfe and the whole nation, otherwhiles stood to it, and avowed the action, and maintained the cause by a plea of right. Some there were of the Achæans there, that both protested, how from the beginning they utterly misliked the course, and also at this present much blamed the Pretour for his wilfull obstinacie. And by their advise and authoritie an act was set downe, that the whole matter should be referred and put to Quintius, to determine what he pleased. Now had Quintius this nature, if a man crossed and thwarted him, he was fierce and fell; if one yeilded and gave place, he was as gentle again, and pliable. And therefore, without shewing any signe of debate, either in language or countenance, thus he spake. If I thought (qd. he) and were perswaded in my heart, that it were good & commodious for the Achæans to hold the Island, and possesse this Island in question, I would advise the Senat and people of Rome to let you enjoy it. But like as a Tortoise, so long as she keepeth her selfe close within her shell (I see) is sure and safe enough, against all blowes and offence whatsoever; but when shee once putteth forth any parts, looke whatsoever is discovered and naked, the same is weake and subject to injurie: even so you Achæans, being enclosed round about with the sea, are able easily to adjoyne unto yourselves whatsoever lyeth within the precinct of Peloponnesus, & to keep the same also when you have laid it to you: but so soone as for a greedie desire of having more and encroching further, you goe beyond those bonds, you lye open without, and are exposed to all hurt and damage. Thus Zacynthus was delivered to the Romanes with the assent of all the Counsel there assembled, and Diophanes durst not say a word more to the contrarie.

At the same time, king Philip asked the Consull as he marched to Naupactum, Whether it was his pleasure, that he in the meane while should recover and regaine those cities which were revolted from the association of the Romanes? And having a graunt and warrant from him, hee led his forces against Demetrias, knowing well enough in what termes of troubles that city then stood. For being forlorne and in utter despaire, seeing Antiochus had forsaken them and no hope at all remaining in the Ætolians: they looked every day and night either for the coming of Philip their heavie friend; or else even the Romanes themselves a worse enemy, like as they had a more just cause of anger and indignation against them. A confused and disordered sort there were of king Antiochus his souldiours, who being but a few at first left there to lie in garrison, grew after to be more, and most of them unarmed; such as after the field was lost [at Thermopylæ] thither chanced to flie, and neither had strength nor heart enough to abide a siege. And therefore when Philip sent certaine messengers before unto them, to signifie, that there was some hope that they might be pardoned: they made them this answer, That the gates were open for the king, and that hee might enter at his pleasure. At his first entrance, certaine cheefe men of marke quit the citie and departed, and Eurylochus killed himselfe. The garrison souldiours of Antiochus (for so they had capitulated) were conducted to Lyfimachia through Macedonie and Thrace, accompanied with a convoy of Macedonians, for feare that any man should should do them harme. There were some few ships also in the rode of Demetrias, under the command of Isidorus, which together with their leader and captain were dismissed. After this, he regained Dolopia, Aperantia, and certeine cities of Perrhoebia.

During the time that Philip was employed in these affaires, T. Quintius having recovered the Iland Zacynthus, departed from the Diet of the Achæans, and crossed the seas to Naxos, which had bin beleaguered already two moneths, and was at the point to be forced and lost: which if it might have bin won by assault, it was thought that the whole nation and name of the Ætolians there, would have perished for ever. And albeit he had good cause to be highly offended and displeased with the Ætolians, in remembrance that they only checked and impeached his glorie, at what time as he set Greece free: and that they were nothing stirred and moved with his authoritie, when he (forewarning them that those things would happen which afterwards fell out just so indeed) would have discomfelled and skared them from foolish and furious designs: yet, supposing that it was a speciall part of his charge and worke, that no nation of Greece (now freed by him) should utterly be subverted and destroyed, he began to walke up and downe along under the walls, to the end that he might be seene, and soone knowne of the Ætolians. And anon the very foremost guards tooke notice of him, and noyed it was presently throughout all the ranks and companies that Quintius was there. And thereupon they ran from all parts up to the walls, every man stretched forth his hands, and with one accord and consonant voyce called by name unto Quintius, beseeching him to help and save them. And albeit he was moved at these their piteous cries with commiseration, yet for that time he signified by the turning away of his head, that he refused & denied them: asking withall, What lay in him to do them any good? But afterwards, being come unto the Consull, Know you not (quoth he) o M. Atilius whereabout we are, & what we have in hand? or if you be a man provident enough, esteeme you not that it mainly concerneth the common weale? He set the Consull by these words a longing, and caused him to geve more attentive care what he would say, and withall, Why do you not speake forth (quoth the Consull) and utter your mind what the matter is? Then quoth Quintius: See you not that after you have vanquished Antiochus, you spend and loose much time here in the siege & assault of two cities, when as now the yeere of your government is welneere come about? And Philip in the meane time without seeing a battaile or the ensignes of his enemies displayed, hath gained and joynd to himselfe not cities only, but so many nations already, namely, Athamania, Perrhoebia, Aperantia and Dolopia? But it is nothing so good and expedient for us, nor standeth it us so much upon, to take downe the Ætolians and pare their nailes, as to looke unto Philip that he wax not too great: and (seeing you and your followers have not gotten yet two cities in reward and recompense of victorie) not to suffer him to go cleere away with so many nations of Greece. The Consull accorded hereunto: but hee thought it a shame and dishonor for him to give over the siege and effect nothing: but afterwards, all the matter was put unto the disposition of Quintius. Who went againe to that side of the wall, where as a little before the Ætolians called and cried aloud unto him. And when as they intreated him more earnestly and with greater affection to take pitie of the Ætolian people, he willed some of them to come forth unto him. And immediately, Phantus himself with other principall persons of the Ætolians, went out unto him; unto whom lying prostrate and groveling at his feete: Your present fortune (quoth he) and hard estate wherein you are, causeth me both to temper my choler, and also to stay my tongue. Those things you now see are fallen out, which I foretold would come to passe. And not so much as this is left unto you, That the calamities false upon your heads can be truly said to have light upon them that have not deserved as much. Howbeit, since it hath ben allotted unto me as it were by destinie to be a foster-father (as I may so say) to nurse up Greece, I will not cease even to do you good, as to thankesse and ungratefull persons as you are. Send your Oratours to the Consull, to intreat him to graunt you a truce for so long, untill you may addresse your embassadors to Rome, by whome you shall wholly referre and submit your selves to the Senat: and I will not faile to be an intercessor & advocate to the Consull for you, & likewise unto the Senat. And as Quintius counselled them, so did they. Neither rejected the Consull their embassie, but graunted them abstinence of war for such a terme as within which they might have an answer of their embassage to Rome: so hee dislodged, the siege was raised, and the armie sent into Phocis. The Consull together with Quintius passed over the sea to Ægium, unto the generall Counsaile of Achæa. There was much treatie and

A and partie about the Eleans, and the restoring of the Lacedæmonian exiles: but nothing was effected in the one or the other. As for the Lacedæmonians, the Achæans were desirous to reserve that for themselves, and to win thereby a thanks, as proceeding from their speciall grace. And the Eleans, chose rather to come and be united to the Achæan Parliament of themselves, than by the mediation of the Romanes. The embassadors of the Epicrotes came unto the Consull, who (it was well knowne) carried out themselves sound and upright in the extirpating of the Romanie amitie: howbeit, they had not levied a soldiour for Antiochus. Charged they were to have relieved him with monie: and denie themselves they could not: but they had sent their embassadors unto the king. And when they put up a petition, that they might be accepted againe into the ancient band of amitie: this answer the Consull returned unto them, That he knew not yet whether to range them in the number of enemies, or peaceable friends, and therefore of the Senat should be judge; & therefore he referred their whole entier cause to Rome. And to that purpose a truce he graunted them of fourescore and ten dayes. The Epicrotes thus sent to Rome, presented themselves before the Senat, and when they stood rather upon these termes in recounting those things wherein they had not shewed any open hostilitie, than in clearing themselves of those matters that were laid against them; they received such an answer, as whereby they might be thought rather to have obtained pardon, than to have made good and justified their cause. The embassadors also of king Philip about that time had audience given them in the Senat, who came to congratulate with the Romanes, testifying their owne joy, and withling theirs for their victorie: and upon their request, that they might sacrifice in the Capitoll, and offer an oblation and present of gold in the temple of Imp. Opt. Max. the Senat gave them good leave. So, they presented and offered a crowne of gold weighing one hundred pound. These embassadors had not only a friendly answer & gracious dispatch: but also Demetrius the sonne of king Philip, who had lien as an hostage at Rome, was delivered unto them, for to bring home againe unto his father. Thus was the warre atchieved and brought to an end, which M. Atilius the Consull waged against king Antiochus in Greece.

The other Consull P. Cornelius Scipio, whose lot was to governe the province of Gaule, before that he took his journey to that warre which he was to make against the Boians, demanded of the Senat, that money should be assigned unto him, for to perforce those plaies and games which he had promised by vow, as Viz. pretour in Spaine, when he was driven to a great extremitie in a battell. This seemed to be a strange & unreasonable demand. Whereupon the LL. of the Senat ordained, That what plaies the Consull had vowed on his owne head without asking the advise and counsell of the Senat, the same he should exhibit and set forth either with the issue of the spoiles gotten from the enemies, (if haply hee had reserved any money raised thereout to that purpose) or else defray the charges out of his owne purse. These plaies and games P. Cornelius represented for the space of ten daies. And neere about the same time, the temple of the great goddesse dame Cybele (or Idæa) was dedicated. This goddesse being brought out of Asia, in the time that P. Cornelius Scipio (surnamed afterwards Africanus) and P. Licinius were Consuls, was conveyed from the sea side into the mount Palatine. The temple was set out to be built at a price (according to an act of the Senat) by M. Livius and C. Claudius the Censors, when M. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls. Thirteene yeeres after the bargain was made for the edifying thereof, M. Junius Brutus dedicated it and for the honor of this dedication, were the first stage-plaies exhibited, (as Valerius Antias mine author saith) called thereupon Megalefia. In like manner, C. Licinius Lucullus (one of the two Duumvirs) dedicated the temple of the goddesse Inuentus, in the great Race called Circus maximus. The same had M. Livius the Consull vowed sixteene yeeres before, even that very day in which hee defeated Asdruball and his armie. The same Livius in his Censorship, went through and bargained for the building thereof, whiles M. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls. And in the honour of dedicating this temple, the plaies were set forth: and all was done with more devotion, because there was a new warre intended against king Antiochus. In the beginning of this yeere in which these things passed, whiles P. Cornelius the Consull staid still behind at Rome, (for M. Atilius was gon forth already to warre:) it is found in records, that two tame oxen climbed up a ladder in the street Carinæ, to the tyle-roofe of a certaine house there. And the soothsayers gave expresse order, that they should be burnt quicke, and the ashes to be throwen into Tyber. Also it was reported, that at Tarracina and Amiternum, it rained stones sundrie times. Item, That in Minturnæ the temple temple of Jupiter and the shops about the market place, were blasted and smitten with lightning; G and in the verie mouth of the river Vulturnus, two ships caught fire from heaven, and were consumed. In regard of these fearefull prodigies, the Decemvirs by order from the Senat, went to the bookes of Sibylla and perused them; and out of their learning pronounced, that a solemne fast should be now instituted in the honour of Ceres, and the same to be observed and holden every fift year: also that a novendiall sacrifice for nine daies together should continue; and a supplication for one day: and that they who went in this procession & supplication, should wear garlands and wreathes of flowers upon their heads: lastly, That the Consull P. Cornelius should sacrifice to what gods, & with what beasts, the Decemvirs would appoint and pronounce. When the gods were pacified, as well by the accomplishment of the vowes accordingly, as by taking order for the expiation of those wonderous signes, the Consull tooke his journey into his province: from whence hee commaunded Cneus Domitius the Propretour (after hee had called his armie) to depart to Rome: and himselfe entred with his legions into the territorie of the Boians.

Within a litle of that time, the Ligurians (by vertue of a sacred law that they had) levied and assembled an armie, and by night assailed the campe unawares to Quintus Minutius the Proconsull. Minutius kept his souldiours in order of battaile untill day within his hold, having an eye and circumspect regard, that the enemie should not mount over the trench and defences in any place. And at the day-broke he sallied forth at two gates at once: neither were the Ligurians repulsed (as he hoped they should) at the first charge; for they sustained and held out the skirmish above two houres, with doubtful event on both sides. At the last, when band after band issued out, and still fresh soldiers succeeded in the rout of the wearied, for to mainteine fight, the Ligurians in the end (besides other distresses, lost for want of sleepe also) turned their backs. Of the enemies were slaine above foure thousand; of Romanes and allies, under three hundred. Two moneths after or somewhat lesse, P. Cornelius the Consull gave battell to the Boians and woon the day; slew 28000 enemies, (as Valerius Antias writeth) took 3400 prisoners, gained 124 militarie ensignes, 1230 horses, chariots 247: and of the winners (as hee saith) there died not above 1484. Where (by the way) how litle credit foever (as touching the number) we give unto this Writer, (for in that point there is none overreacheth more than he) yet apparant it is, that a right great victorie it was; both for that the campe was woon, and the Boians after that battell presently yeelded themselves; as also for that in regard of this victorie a joyfull procession was by order from the Senat holden, and greater beasts slaine for sacrifice.

Not much under or over this present time, M. Fulvius Nobilior returned out of the farther province of Spaine in pompe of an Ovation, and carried in shew 10000 pound weight of silver in bullion; of Bigates in silver coine 130000, and in gold 126 pound weight. P. Cornelius the Consull, having first taken hostages of the Boian nation, and disseized them of the one halfe of their countrey, to the inhabiting whereof the people of Rome, might if they would, send their Colonies; at his departure from thence toward Rome to an undoubted and assured triumph, licensed his armie, with commaundement to meet him there and give their attendance upon his triumph-day. The morrow after that he was come, the Senat had summons to assemble in the temple of Bellona; where, after he had discoursed of his actes and deeds atchieved, he required that he might be permitted to enter the citie riding in triumph. P. Sempronius Blasus a Tribune of the Commons for the time being, stepped forth & said, That his advise was that Scipio should not flatly be denied the honour of a triumph, but to put it off unto a farther day. And why? The warres (quoth he) of the Ligurians have alwaies beene joyned and linked with those of Gaul: which nations being so neere together, use ever mutually one to succour another. If P. Scipio (after the Boians defeated in battell) had followed the traine of victorie, and either himselfe in proper person with his brave conquering army passed into the territory of the Ligurians, or but sent part of his forces to Q. Minutius, who now for three yeers (or fast upon) hath ben detained within those quarters in a warre of doubtfull issue; we might have seene an end ere this of the Ligurian warre also. But now (forsooth) his souldiours are dismissed, and brought home to accompanie him and to solemnize his triumph; who might well have beene employed still and done good service to the Common-weale: yea and may doe yet (if the Senate be so disposed) by deferring the time of triumph, for to make amends and regaine that, which by over-hastinesse of triumph hath beene over-slipped. And therefore, in my opinion (quoth hee) they should doe well, to

A commaund the Consull to goe his waies back againe, and take his armie with him into his province, and to doe his best and utmost devoir to subdue the Ligurians also. For unless they be brought under and made subject unto the people of Rome, the Boians be yee sure, will not long be quiet: either we must have peace or warre at once, in both places. And so P. Cornelius in quality of Proconsull (as many others before him, who in their full magistracie triumphed not) may after some few months have his triumph. To this the Consull answered again and said, That neither the Province of the Ligurians was any part of his charge by lot, neither warred he at all with the Ligurians, ne yet demanded to triumph over them. As for Q. Minutius (quoth hee) I hope that shortly after he hath subdued them, he both will require his due triumph, and shall likewise obtaine the same. For mine owne part, I seek no more but to triumph over the Boians in Gaul, whom I have vanquished in plaine battell, beaten out of the field and campe; whose whole nation within two daies after the fight and their generall discomfiture, yeelded and rendred themselves into my hands; & from whence I have caried away hostages for assured pledge of future peace: nay, that which is much more than all this, I have had the killing of so many Gauls in open battell, and fought with so many thousands of Boians, as no Generall ever did before me: the better halfe of 50000 men are fallen upon the edge of the sword, & many a thousand taken prisoners; so as the Boians have none left, but old folke and young children. Can any man make a wonder then, why a victorious armie, leaving no enemie behind in the province, is come to Rome to honour the triumph of their Consull? Whose employment, if the Senat be disposed to use in any other service and province, Whether of these two waies thinke they, will make them more willing and readie, to put themselves into new daungers, and enter into other fresh labour and travell; either to pay them without delay & content them with the due and deserved hire of their former peril and pain, or to send them away with bare hope only, in stead of the substance, for to expect still without effect: since they have beene once already put by and disappointed of their first hope and expectation? Now for mine owne part, I obtained honour ynough that day, on which the Senat sent me (deemed & declared the best man in all the city) to receive that great goddesse & dame of Ida. This title alone, without any other addition of triumph, shall be sufficient to recommend to all posteritie for honesty and honor both, the image of P. Scipio Nasica. This said, not only the whole Senat themselves condescended generally to graunt him triumph, but also with their countenance and authoritie compelled the Tribunes of the Commons to give over their hold, & surcease their interposition of a negative voice. So P. Cornelius the Consull triumphed over the Boians. In which triumph he caused to be carried for shew in French chariots, armor, ensignes, & spoils of all sorts: also French vessels of bras & copper. He commaunded likewise to be led in pomp a number of horses taken, together with noble men and gentlemen captives. Of chains of gold he made a shew of 1470. Besides, there was born in pompe, of gold 245 pound weight: of silver unwrought and wrought into plate, not unworkmanly after their maner (& namely in sundry French vessels) 2340 pound weight: lastly of bigats in coin 234. To his soldiours that followed his triumphant chariot he gave 225 Asces apeece, double as much to a Centurion, & triple to an horsman. The next day after he called the people to a generall assembly, where after he had discoursed again of his exploits, & complained of the wrongs that the Tribune had offered unto him, in that he would have tied him to the war of another, with intent to defraud himselfe of the fruit of his own victorie, he called his soldiours, & discharged them quite.

Whiles these affaires thus went in Italie, Antiochus remaining at Ephesus, rested very secure and carelesse of the Romane warre, as if the Romanes had no purpose nor intention to passe over into Asia. This securitie of his was occasioned by many of his friends, who partly upon ignorance, and partly upon flatterie persuaded him so. Onely Annibal, who at that time was of greatest credite, and might doe most with the king, said unto him, That hee rather marvelled much why the Romanes were not already in Asia, than doubted of their comming. For a neerer cut (quoth he) it is by sea out of Greece into Asia, than out of Italy into Greece; and a greater motive to warre is Antiochus than the Aetolians. And as for their valour and power, as hardie they are and mightie at sea, as on land; and their fleet hath hovered a good while already about Malea. Moreover, I heard say of late, that new ships be arrived, and a new Generall come out of Italy, to follow and performe this warre. And therefore, let Antiochus feede no longer upon a vaine hope, and promise himselfe a permanent peace: for shortly hee must make account to fight with the Romanes in Asia, yea, and for Asia, both by sea and land; and no mean there there is, but that either himselfe must loose his kingdome, or take from them their soveraigne G siegnorie, who affect and pretend to be LL. of the whole world. He was the only man thought to forecast, & truly to foretell what would ensue. Whereupon the king himselfe in person, with those ships which he had readie rigged & furnished, sailed to Cherfonnesus, with intent to strengthen those places with good garrisons, if happily the Romanes should come by land. The rest of the navie he commaunded Polyxenus to prepare and put to sea. And all about the Island hee sent about his pinnaces and brigantines as espials to discover the coasts. C. Livius the Admirall of the Romane navie, was arrived at Naples from Rome with fiftie covered ships. At which place he gave commaundement, That the open vessels, which by covenant were due to bee sent from the allies of all that tract, should meet. From whence he sailed to Sicilie, and passed the streights by Messina. And when he had received sixe Carthaginian ships sent to aid him, and called upon H the Rhegines and Locrines, and other associates comprised in the same league & holding by the same tenure, for that shipping which of dutie they were to find, when he had also taken a survey of all his armada at Lacinium, he weighed anker, and put to the maine sea. Being arrived at Corcyra, which was the first citie of all Greece that he came unto, hee enquired in what termes the warre affaires stood? (for as yet all was not thoroughly quiet in Greece) and where the Romane fleet was? After he heard that the Romane Consull and king Philip, were about the pale of Thermopylae, and there lay in guard; that the fleet rid at anker in the port and harbour of Pyraeum, he thought it good to use expedition, and to make speed for all occasions whatsoever, and incont-nently determined to saile forward to Peloponnesus. And having at one instant wasted Samos and Zacynthus as hee went, because they chose rather to band with the Aetolians, he set saile for I Malea, and having a good wind, within few daies hee arrived at Pyraeum, where the old fleet ankered. At Scyllaun king Eumenes met him with three ships: who had been a long time at Egina, unresolved in himselfe, whether he should returne to defend his owne kingdome (for he heard that Antiochus made preparation at Ephesus for warre, as well by sea as land) or not to depart a foot from the Romanes, upon whose fortune depended his whole state. Aulus Avilius, so soone as he had delivered to his successor five and twentie close ships of war, loosed from Pyraeum, and came to Rome. So Livius with a fleet of eightie one ships, armed at their beakeheads with bra-sen pikes, besides many other smaller vessels, (which open as they were, had brasen heads, as is aforesaid; or if they were without such pikes, served for espials) sailed to Delos. Much about that time the Consull Acilius assailed Naupactum. At Delos, Livius for certaine daies was staid by K contrarie winds (for that quarter among the Cyclades is exceeding windie, by reason that these Islands are divided asunder, some with broader gulfs, some with narrower.) Polexenus being certified by the post-ships (set in diverse places to discover) that the Romane armada rid at anker neere Delos, dispatched messengers to the king, who leaving all matters which he enterprised in Hellespontus, returned to Ephesus, as fast as ever hee could make saile with his ships of warre, pi-ked at the head: and presently called a counsell, where it was debated, whether hee were best to hazard a battell at sea or no? Polyxenus was of opinion, That he should not slacke the time, but in any wise give battell and trie a fight, before that the fleet of Eumenes and the Rhodian ships were joined with the Romanes: for so in number they should not bee much overmatched, & for all other things have the better, as well for nimblenesse and agilitie of ships, as for varietie of aid. L souldiours. For the Romane ships, as being unworkmanly built, they are heave of steerage and unweldie, loaden they are and fraught besides with provision of victuals, as they are commonly that come into the enemies countrey. But as for your ships (seeing they leave all about them peaceable and quiet) they shall be charged with nothing but with men and ammunition. Besides, the skill of these seas and lands, & of the winds in these quarters, will be a great helpe unto you; whereas the enemies must needs be much troubled, for want of knowledge in them all. The deviser of this counsell had credite given unto him on all parts, and the rather, for that hee was the man himselfe to put in execution the same counsell. Two daies they made stay to set all things in order and readinesse, the third day they set forward with a fleet of a hundred saile, whereof seven were covered, the rest open, and all of the smaller making; and for Phocaea they shaped their course. The king hearing that the Romane armada approached, departed from thence (for that he was not to bee present in person at the conflict upon the sea) and went to Magnesia neere Si-pylus, for to levie land-forces. But his navie made saile to Cyslus, a port of the Erythraens, to attend the coming of the enemy there, as in a place more commodious. The Romanes, when the

A the Northren winds were once laid (for they were aloft for certaine daies, and locked them in) sailed from Delos to Phanae, a haven towne of the Chians, bearing toward the Aegaeon sea. From thence they cast about with their ships to the citie, and there having victualled themselves, they crossed over to Phocaea. Eumenes who was gone to Elaea toward his fleet, within few daies after, with foure and twentie covered ships, and more uncovered, returned to the Romanes; whom hee found preparing and marshalling themselves (a little short of Phocaea) for a battell at sea.
 Then set they all forward with a hundred and fiftie close covered ships, and more open and without hatches: and being with side Northren winds, at the first driven to the sea shore, they were forced to saile single in ranke one after another. But afterwards, as the violence of the wind began to be allayed, they assayed to crosse over to the haven Corycus, which is above Cyslus. Poly-xenus, as soone as he heard that the enemies were at hand, rejoiced that hee had occasion presented unto him of a navall battell: and himselfe stretched forth the left point of his fleet embartelled farre into the sea, willing the captaines of the ships to display the right wing broad, toward the land: and so with an even front, he advanced forward to the fight. Which the Romane Ad-mirall seeing, stricke saile, tooke down the masts, and laying together all the tackling of the ships in one place, attended their coming that followed after. By which time there were thirtie in a ranke afront, with which, because he would make them equal to the left wing of the enemy, hee set up the trinkets or small sailes, meaning to make way into the deepe, commanding them that followed still, to make head, and direct their prowes against the right wing neere the land. Eu-menes was the rere-admirall, and kept the rereward close together: but so soone as they began C to bee troubled with taking downe their tackling, he set forward with all speed and hast that hee could make: and by this time were they in view one of the other. Two Carthaginian ships led before the Romane navie, which were encountred with three of the kings ships. And considering the ods of the number, two of the kings came about one. And first they wiped away the oares on both sides, then they shewed themselves aloft with their weapons, and boarded her, and after they had either overturned or killed the defendants, they were masters of that ship. The other that was in single fight, and assailed but by one, seeing the other ship taken by the enemies, fled backe into the maine fleet, before shee was environned by the three enemies. Livius chasing hereat, and angrie at the heart, advanced forward with the Admirall ship afront the ene-mie: against her, those other two which had enclosed the Carthaginian ship aforesaid, hoping to D doe the like by this, came onwards which Livius perceiving, commaunded the rowers to let their oares hang in the water on both sides, for the more stay and steadinesse of the ship, and likewise to cast their yron hookes fashioned like hands, for to grapple the enemies ships, as they appro-ched and came neere unto them; and when they were come to close fight in manner of land-service, then to remember the valour of the Romanes, and not to hold the kings slaves for men of any worth. And with much more facilitie and ease, than the two ships before conquered one, this one for that gained two. By this time the maine fleet on both sides encountred on all sides, and fought pell mell. Eumenes who being in the rereward, came last in place, after the conflict was begun, perceiving that Livius had disordered the left wing of the enemies, made head against the right, where he saw them fighting on even hand, not long after the left wing began to flie. For Po-lyxenus, so soone as he saw himselfe without all question overmatched in valor of the soldiours, caused the trinquets and all the cloth he had to be let up, and purposed to flie amaine. Those likewise that were toward the land, and fought with Eumenes, within a while did no lesse. The Romans and Eumenes, so long as the mariners were able to plie their oares, and so long as they were in hope to annoy the taile of the enemies, followed the chase lustily ynough: but after that they perceived their owne ships (charged & heavily loaden with victuals) follow after to no purpose, & to lag behind, nor like to overtake them which were the swifter, because they were the lighters, staid at length their pursuit, after they had taken 13 ships both with their soldiours & mariners, & sunke ten. Of the Romane Armada there perished but one Carthaginian, which at the first encounter was beset with two ships. Polyxenus never gave over flight, but made way still, until he had recovered the haven of Ephesus. The Romans abode that day in the place from whence the kings armada came, purposing on the morrow to make fresh saile after the enemy. And in the mids of their course they met with those 35 Rhodian ships covered, conducted by Pisistratus their admirall, and taking those also with them, they followed the enemy even as far as Ephesus, where in the mouth of the haven, they rid in order of battell: by which bravado, having wroong as it were from the enemies mies a plaine confession that they were vanquished, the Rhodians and Eumenes were sent home. G The Romanes setting their course for Chius, first sailed by Phoenicus, an haven towne of Erythrea, and having cast anker that night, the next day they weighed, and arived within the Island, close to the citie it selfe, where having sojourned some few daies, especially to refresh their rowers, they passed forward to Phocæa. Where leaving foure quinquereme galeaces, the fleet arrived at Canæ, and because the Winter approched, the ships were laid up in their docks on drie land, and for their safetie were trenchd and paled about. In the yeeres end the Generall assemblie for election of magistrates was holden at Rome, wherein were created Consuls, L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Lælius. For now all men had an eie to the finishing of the warre against Antiochus

The next morrow were the Pretours also chosen, namely, M. Tuccius, L. Aurunculeius, Cneus Fulvius, L. Aemilius, P. Iunius, and C. Atinius Labeo. H

THE XXXVII. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the seven and thirtieth Booke.

Veius Cornelius Scipio the Consull, having for his lieutenant P. Scipio Africanus (according as hee had promised, that he would be lieutenant to his brother, if Greece and Asia were ordained to bee his province, whereas it was thought, that C. Lælius, for the great credite that hee was in with the Senate, should have had that province given him) tooke his voyage for to warre against Antiochus, and was the first Romane that ever sailed over into Asia, as capitaine and commander of an armie. Aemilius Regillus fought fortunately with the aid of the Rhodians before Mymusius, against the viall navie of Antiochus. The soune of Africanus taken prisoner by Antiochus, was sent home to his father. M. Acilius Glabrio triumphed over Antiochus, whome hee had driven out of Greece, as also over the Rhodians. Afterwards, when Antiochus was vanquished by L. Cornelius Scipio (with the assistance of king Eumenes, the soune of Sitalis king of Pergamus) hee had peace granted unto him, upon condition, that hee should quit and forgoe all the provinces on this side the mount Taurus. And Eumenes, by whose helpe Antiochus was overcome had his kingdome enlarged. To the Rhodians also, for their helping hand, certaine citties were given and granted. One Colonie was planted, called Bononia. Aemilius Regillus, who vanquished the captaines of Antiochus in a navall battell, obtained also a navall triumph. L. Cornelius Scipio, who finished the warre with Antiochus, had the like surname given him as his brother, and was called after Asiaticus.

When L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Lælius were Consuls, after order taken for the service of the gods, there was no matter treated of in the Senate, before the suite of the Ætolians. And as their embassadours were instant and earnest, because the terme of their truce was but short, so T. Quintius, who then was returned out of Greece to Rome, seconded them. The Ætolians, relying more upon the mercie of the Senate, than the justice of their cause, and ballancing their old good turnes done to the Romanes, to the late harmes and trespasses committed, used humble supplication. But so long as they were in presence before the Senatours, they were wearied with their interrogatories of all hands, who fought rather to fetch & wring from them confession of a fault, than any other answer; and when they were bidden to void out of the Senat house, they caused

A caused much debate within. For in the handling of their matter it was seen that anger bare more sway than pitie, because they were not so much offended with them, for being enemies, as they blamed them for an unruly, untamed, and unsociable nation. And after much hard hold for certaine daies together, they relaved at length, neither to graunt nor denie them peace. Two conditions were tendered and presented unto them, either to referre themselves wholly to the pleasure and disposition of the Senate, or els to deliver a thousand talents: and withall to hold those for friends or foes, whomsoever the Romanes reputed theirs. And when they were desirous to draw from the Senatours thus much, as to know in what points, and how farre forth, they should submit themselves to the discretion of the Senate; they could have no certaine answer to build upon. And thus without any peace obtained, they were dismissed, with expresse commaundement to void the citie that very day, and to be gone out of Italie within fiftene daies following. Then they fell to consultation in the Senate about the government of the Consular provinces. Both Consuls desired to have the charge of Greece. And Lælius was a great man with the Senat. Now when the house was minded that the Consuls should either cast lots or agree betweene themselves for their provinces, hee rose up and said, That it was more decent and besitting to put the matter to the judgement of that honourable court, than to the blind hazard of lots. To this Scipio for the present made answer, that he would consider better of it: and after he had conferred secretly with his brother apart (who advised him to be bold & put it to the Senat) he gave Lælius to understand, that he was content to do as he would have him. When this strange course and manner of proceeding (either new & unheard of before, or els after so long disuse of the practise ther-of, forgotten and taken up again) caused the Senat to arme themselves against a great strife and contention, then P. Scipio Africanus said, That if they would ordaine his brother L. Scipio to have the province of Greece, he would accompanie him in that voiage, in qualitie of his Lieutenant.
This one word of his (accepted of them all with a generall consent) staied all debate: for a great mind they had to make a trial, whether Anniball being vanquished could aid king Antiochus more, than Africanus the conquerour assist the Consull and the Romane legions. And all in a manner assigned Greece to Scipio, and Italie to Lælius. But the Pretours had their provinces set out to them by lot; L. Aurunculeius obtained the civill jurisdiction of citizens, and L. Fulvius of forainers: L. Aemilius Regillus was L. Admirall of the armada, P. Iunius governed Tuscanie, M.
Tuccius Apulia and the Brutij, and L. Atinius Sicilie. Moreover that Consull, who was to bee employed in Greece, had a commission graunted, besides that armie which he should receive of M. Acilius (and those were two legions) to furnish himselfe with a supply of three thousand foemen, and one hundred horsen of Roman citizens; also of five thousand foot and two hundred horse of allies that were Latines: and besides, graunted it was in the same commission, that when hee was arrived into his province, hee should passe over with his armie into Asia, if hee thought it so expedient for the Common-weale.

Vnto the other Consull was allowed an entier whole armie of new souldiours, consisting of two Romane legions, and fiftene thousand foot and sixe hundred horse of the Latine allies.
Q. Minutius had direction (by reason that hee wrote how he had performed in his province all that there was to be done, and that the whole nation of the Ligurians had yeelded subjection) to translate his forces out of Liguria into the Boians countrey, and to deliver the same to P. Cornelius the Proconsull. Out of that territorie which hee had taken away from them after they were vanquished, those citie legions were withdrawn, which had bene levied and enrolled the yeere before; and committed they were to the charge of M. Tuccius the Pretour, besides 15000 foot and sixe thousand horse of Latine allies: and all these forces were to be employed for to defend and keepe in obedience, Apulia and the Brutians countrey. As for A. Cornelius the Pretour of the former yeere, (who with an armie had the government of the Brutij) he was commaunded to deliver unto M. Acilius (if the Consull thought so good) the legions transported over into Æ-tolia, if he would remaine there still: but if Acilius would rather returne to Rome, then A. Cornelius with that armie, was to remaine in Ætolia. Thought good it was, that C. Atinius Labeo should receive of M. Aemilius, the government of Sicilie and his armie: and if it pleased him, to take up and enroll out of that verie province 2000 foot and 100 horse, for to supplie and fulfill the broken companies. P. Iunius Brutus had commaundement to levie a new armie for the government of Tuscanie, to wit, one Romane legion, and 10000 foot of Latine allies, and 400 horse. Also L. Aemilius the Admirall, was to receive of M. Iunius the Pretour of the former yeere,

yeere, twentie gallies, and the mariners and oars thereto belonging; and besides, to levie himselfe 1000 mariners more, and 2000 footmen: and with those ships and souldiours to saile into Asia, and to receive the fleet of C. Livius. As for them that were already in the government of both the provinces of Spaine and of Sardinia, they were to continue there still for one yeere longer, and to have the same armies at commaund. This yeere were two tenths of corn levied of Sicilie and Sardinia: and order was given for all the Sicilian corn to be sent into Ætolia to the armie: but out of Sardinia, that one part should be brought to Rome; and the other transported over into Ætolia, even to the same place that the other of Sicilie aforesaid.

Before the Consuls set forward into their provinces, it was thought meet, that the Pontifex should give order for the expiation of certaine prodigies: for at Rome the temple of Iuno Lucina was smitten with lightning; so as both the lanternes, yea and the leaved doores thereof, were foully disfigured. Likewise at Puteoli, the towne walles in many places, and one gate, was blasted with lightning, and two men besides were stricken dead therewith. At Nursia it was for certaine knowne, that the day being faire and cleere, there arose a stormie tempest, wherein also two men lost their lives. The Tusculanes reported, that with them it rained earth. And the men of Reate brought word, that within their territorie a female mule foled. These prodigies (say) were expiated: and the Latine festivall holydaies were celebrated anew, for that the dole of flesh was not given unto the Laurentines, which of duty should have been delivered. Moreover, a solemne supplication was ordeined, in regard of all errors and faults escaped in divine service and religious observances. Also out of the bookes of Sibylla, the Decemvirs declared and shewed, to what gods, sacrifice should be made: and ten young springalls free borne, & ten virgins likewise, whose fathers and mothers yet lived, were employed about the ministry of those sacrifices. The Decemvirs also by night sacrificed young sucklings. And P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, before hee tooke his journey, erected an arch in the Capitoll (over-against the high street that leadeth thither) with 7 gilded statues and 2 horses: and before that arch, he set up two celsures or lavers of marble. About this time, 43 principall persons of Ætolia, (among whom were Democritus and his brother) were conveyed to Rome, by two squadrons or cohorts sent of purpose from M. Atilius; and there were laid up fast in the prison called * The stone quarries: which done, the cohorts aforesaid were commaunded by L. Cornelius the Consull, to make returne to the armie. From Ptolomeus and Cleopatra (king and queene of Ægypt) there came embassadors, testifying their joy which they conceived in the behalfe of the Romanes, in these termes, That M. Atilius the Consull had chased king Antiochus out of Greece: exhorting also the Romanes to transport an armie into Asia: for that not in Asia only but likewise in Syria, all men were smitten with fear and amazed. As for the KK. of Ægypt, they would be ready to doe for their parts, whatsoever the Senat should set downe. Thankes were returned to the K. and Q. aforesaid, and order was taken, that to the embassadors for a reward should be given 4000 brasen Asles apeece.

L. Cornelius the Consull, having accomplished all things to be done at Rome, published an Ediēt in a generall assembly, That aswell those souldiours whom himselfe had enrolled for supply: as they who wer with A. Cornelius in the Brutians country, should all meet at Brundisium upon the Ides of * Quintilis. Moreover he nominated three lieutenants, Sex. Digittus, L. Apusius, and C. Fabricius Luscinus, for to gather ships together out of all the sea coasts into Brundisium. And when hee had prepared and set all things in good order, hee departed from the citie, clad in his rich coat of armes. There presented unto the Consull as he went forth, to the number of 5000 voluntaries, Romanes and allies together, who had served their full yeeres in the wars under the conduct of P. Africanus, and now wer exempt from soldierie, who all offered to go with him and to be enrolled as prest souldiours. Much at the time that the Consull tooke his journey (during the festivall Apollinare games in the honour of Apollo, upon the fift day before the Ides of Iuly) it chaunced, that in the day time when the aire was cleere and faire, there arose a suddaine darknesse during the eclipse of the sunne, by reason that the body of the moone was directly under the circle and rounde of the sunne. L. Aemilius Regillus also admirall of the warre, at the same time went to sea. L. Aurunculeius was charged by order from the Senat, to build thirte galeaces with five bankes of oars, and twentie gallies with three bankes, because a bruit was blowne and blazed abroad, that Antiochus upon the late battaile at sea, was about to prepare a much greater armada.

The Ætolians, after their embassadors were returned from Rome and had made relation, that there

A there was no hope of peace, albeit all their sea coasts (especially toward Peloponnesus) were spoiled and wasted by the Achæans, yet minding more their perill like to ensue, than remembring their losse received, seized the mountaine Corax, intending to impeach and stop the passage of the Romanes. For they made no question nor doubt, but that the next spring they would returne to besiege and assault Naupaetum. Atilius, who wist well what they expected, thought it better to go in hand with an enterprise unlooked for, and namely to assault Lamia: for thus hee thought, That seeing they had beene already brought to a great under and extremitie by king Philip, now they might be taken suddenly and surprised at unawares, because they stood in feare of nothing lesse. Whereupon, remooving from Elatia, he encamped first in the country of his enemies neere to the river Sperchius: from whence by night he dislodged, and advanced forth with his ensignes, and by the day breake had invested their walles round about. Great feare and hurley there was, as in an accident unlooked for: yet all that day they defended the city more resolutely, than a man would have beleeved and thought they could have done in so sodaine a daunger: while men stood at defence upon the wals, women set up ladders in many places, and brought the men weapons and darts of all sorts, yea and stouies up to the wals unto them. Atilius, after he had founded the retreat, brought backe his men into the campe about noone: and after they had there refreshed their bodies with meat and rest, he gave them warning (before he dismissed the Prætorium) that ere day-light the next morning they should be ready in armes: for that he would not come backe againe with them into the campe, before they were masters of the towne. At the same time as the day before, hee gave assault in many places: and for as much as the townsmens strength decayed, their darts and weapons failed, and above all, their hearts fainted, within few houres hee wanne the citie. After hee had made a riddance of the pillage, sold some part, and given away the rest, hee fell to take counsell what to doe afterwards. There was not one man of opinion to go against Naupaetum, considering that the Ætolians held and kept the pafe of Corax. Howbeit Atilius, to the end that he would not keepe the field in sommer without doing some exploit, and that the Ætolians might not enjoy that peace by the slacknes of the Roman souldiours, which obtaine they could not at the Senates hand, he purposed to besiege Amphissa: and so the armie was conducted thither from Heraclea, by the mountaine Oeta. When he had encamped himselfe under the towne walls, he began not to invest it round with men as he did Lamia, but with ordinance and engins to batter it. In many places at once he ran with the ramme against the wals: and albeit they were shaken, the townsmen went not about either to make redie, or to devise and invent any meanes of defence against that instrument or engin. All their hope was in trusty armour and hardie valour. And so often they sallied forth, that they disordered and troubled not only the guards of the enemies, but also those that attended about the fabricks and artillerie. Howbeit, in many places the wall was battered and breaches made: and even at that very instant newes came unto him, that his successor had landed his armie at Apollonia, and was comming by the way of Epirus and Thessalie. Now came the Consull with a power of 13000 foote, and five hundred horse. And by this time was he passed as far as to the vale and levell of Malea: and having sent certein afore to summon the citie Hypata, and received answer againe, that they would do nothing but by a publick decree of the Ætolians; because the siege of Hypata should not stay him, and Amphissa not yet woon, he led his forces against it, and sent his brother Africanus before. Ere they came, the Oppidanes had quit the towne, for by this time the wall in many places lay open and naked, and were all fled armed and unarmd into a castle which they had, imprenable. The Consull pitched his tents fixe miles from the towne.

Thither arrived the Athenian embassadors, and first they repaired to P. Scipio, who, as we have said, was gone before the maine armie, and afterwards to the Consull, intreating for the Ætolians. Of the twaine they received a gentler answer at the hands of Africanus, who seeking some honest occasion to leave the Ætolian warre, set his heart and eye wholly upon Asia and king Antiochus: and to this purpose he willed the Atheniens to persuade not only with the Romanes, but also with the Ætolians, to preferre peace before warre. And speedily, through the motion and persuasion of the Atheniens there was a solemne embassage of the Ætolians dispatched from Hypata. Induced they were the rather to hope for peace by the speech of Africanus (for to him they came first) who discoursed unto them, how that many nations and cities in Spaine first, and afterwards in Africke, had put themselves under his protection, and in them all hee had left greater greater testimonies of his clemencie and bountie, than of his warlike valour and martiall pro-wesse. Thus they had brought the matter (as they thought) to a good passe, and made it sure: but when they came before the Consull, they had the same answer of him, with which they were sent away from the Senate, and commaunded to avoid. The Ætolians wounded therewith anew, seeing they could win nothing neither by the mediation of the Athenien embassage, nor the gracious answer of Africanus, said they would make report thereof unto their States and countrymen. So, they returned from thence to Hypata, where they were to seeke what to do, and could not resolve: for neither had they whereof to raise a thousand talents: and againe if they should absolutely put themselves into their hands, they feared to feeble the smart thereof in their bodies. Therefore they commaunded the same embassadors to go againe to the Consull and to Africanus, and to exhibit a petition, that if they were minded indeede and veritie to graunt them peace, and not by vaine shew and semblance only to frustrate and delude the hope of poore suppliants, they would either rebate them a quantitie of that grand summe of money, or else accept so of their absolute surrender, that no free citizens might be touched thereby in his person.

 But nothing could be gotten at the Consuls hands, for to alter or relent any jot: thus was this embassage also sent away as it came, and nothing done. The Atheniens came after them in place, the principall man of whose embassage, Echedemus, seeing the Ætolians wearied with so many repulses, and lamentably to no purpose bewailing the miserable estate of their countrie; put them still in some new hope, and gave them counsell to crave truce for sixe moneths, that they might addresse their Embassadors to Rome, and receive an answer from thence: shewing unto them, that this delay could not augment their present calamitie, which could not worse be; but contrarywise, time and space comming betwene, might afford many accidents whereby their present miserie might be mitigated and alayed. So by the aduise of Echedemus, the same men were sent once againe, who had communed before with P. Scipio, and by his meanes obtined of the Consull a truce for that terme; which was the thing they craved. The siege being ray-sed before Amphissa, M. Acilius after he had delivered up his armie into the hands of the Consull, resigned his government, and departed out of the province: and the Consull likewise from Amphissa returned into Thessalie, intending through Macedonie and Thracia to conduct his armie into Asia.

Then Africanus entred into speech with his brother, and said: The journey which you enterprise L. Scipio, I for my part approve and thinke well of, but all resteth in the will and pleasure of Philip: who if he be fast and faithfull to the state and empire of Rome, he will graunt us passage, he will afford us victuals, he will furnish us with all things, which in so long a voyage are necessarie to the help and sustenance of our armie: but if he faile and forsake us once, you must make accompt of no safetie and securitie throughout all Thracia: therefore I am of aduise that the kings affection be first founded. And that will best be done, if the messenger who shall be dispatched unto him, may come upon him on a sodaine, and take him unprovided, and having no time to put any prepened plot in practise. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a most nimble and adive yong gentleman, was at that time chosen for the fittest person to performe this action: who taking fresh post horses all the way as he rode, with incredible celeritie made such speede, that from Amphissa (for thence he had his dispatch) in three dayes space, he arrived at Pella. The king was at a feast or banquet when he came, and wine he had taken full liberally. And finding him thus disposed to solace and recreate his spirits, he had no reason to suspect that he was minded and inclined to any change or alteration: and so for that time this guest was bidden welcome, and had good cheere made him. The morrow after, he saw the provision of victuals in great store readie for the armies, he beheld the bridges made over the rivers, and the high waies mended and prepared, where passage was difficult. With these intelligences he returned to the Consull, with as great speed as he went, and met him at Thaumacia. From whence, the armie in much joy, and with greater and more assured hope, entred into Macedonie; where all was provided to their hands. The king at their comming received them right stately, and at their departure conducted them on the way as royally. Very willing, redie and courteous he shewed himselfe: which Africanus much liked and highly commended, being a man, as in all other things singular, so in allowing of elegancie and humanitie, if it were without superfluitie and excesse, nothing nice and streight-laced. Thus they held on their journey unto Hellespontus, passing through Macedonie and Thrace, and Philip still accompanied them, and provided all things

A for their use afore-hand.

After the battaile fought at sea neere Corycum, Antiochus having had all the winter time free without any empeachment to furnish himselfe with forces both for land and sea, above all things studied and devised how to reparaire his fleet, for feare hee should bee quite diffized and dispossessed of the sea. And evermore this ran in his mind, that he had an overthrow, and yet the Rhodians fleet was away. For thus he cast with himselfe, that if they also should be present at the next conflict (and surely the Rhodians, thought he, will not for any thing be behind againe) hee then should have need of a mightie number of ships, to match the enemies Armada as well in greatnes as goodnesse. And therefore he had both sent Anibal into Syria for to take up the ships of the Phænicians, and also commaunded Polyxenidas to reparaire those vessels which he had already, and to make and rig others, with so much more diligence as his fight afore was lesse fortunate. Himselfe passed the winter in Phrygia, and seeking for aid out of all places, he sent out as farre as into Gallogræcia. The people there at that time were great warriours; keeping still the courages of Gaules, for that the race of that nation was not yet extinct and worne out. His sonne Seleucus he had left in Æolis with an armie to keepe the maritime cities in obedience, which Eumenes from Pergamus of one side, and the Romanes from Phocæa and Erythræ on the other side, sollicitated to rebellion. The Romane fleet, as I said before, wintered at Canæ. Thither in the mids almost of winter came Eumenes with two thousand foote, and a hundred horse. Who having given out unto Livius, that great prizes might be raised out of the enemies territorie about Thyatira, had so perswaded and wrought with him, that he sent with him five thousand souldiours: who being set forth to this rode and expedition, in few dayes drove away a mightie bootie. Amid these matters, there hapned a mu-tinie in Phocæa, by occasion of some that would have withdrawne and turned away the hearts of the multitude unto king Antiochus. The wintering of the fleet was chargeable to that ci-tie. The imposition of a tribute was heauie, in regard that they were put to the finding of five hundred side castocks, and as many coates for liveries: the scarcitie of come also was grievous unto them; for which default the ships and the Romane garrison abandoned the place and departed: wherupon that faction which in all their speeches and assemblies drew the common people to side with Antiochus, was rid of all feare. The Senate and the principall citizens of Phocæa were of opinion to continue to the last, in the association of the Romanes: but the persuaders and counsellors of a revolt were of more credit with the multitude.

The Rhodians were not so slow the summer past, but they were as forward now in the spring: for before mid-March, they sent out the same Pausistratus admirall of a fleet of six & thirtie saile.
 And by this time Livius loosed from Canæ, and sailed toward Hellespontus, with thirtie ships, and seven gallies of foure bankes of oares, which king Eumenes had brought with him, to the end that he might prepare things necessarie for the passage of the armie, which hee supposed would come by land. And first he fel with the bay or port which they cal, The rode of the Æchiæns, from whence he went up to Ilium, where, after he had sacrificed to Minerva, hee gave gracious audience to the embassages of the neighbors bordering, which came from Eleus, Dardanus, & Rhœtium, who committed their cities unto his protection. From thence he directed his course to the streights of Hellespontus, and leaving ten ships in the rode over against Abydus, with the rest of the fleet he passed over into Europe, to assault Sestos. As the armed souldiours approached their wals, the franke priests of Cybele called Galli, bestraught of their wits, presented themselves first unto them before their gates, in their solemn habit and vestiments, saying, That they being the servants and ministers of Dame Cybele the mother of the gods, were come by the instinct and commandement of that goddesse to beseech the Roman Generall to spare the wals and the citie.
 And not one of them had any harme done unto them. Anon, the whole bodie of the Senat with the magistrates came forth to yeeld the towne. From thence they crossed over to Abydus, where (after many parties, in which they had founded their minds, and could have no answer tending to peace) they addrested themselves to lay siege to the citie, and to assault it.

Whiles these things stood thus about Hellespont, Polyxenidas a Rhodian borne, but banished his country, and a captaine for king Antiochus, hearing that a Rhodian fleet was gone to sea, and that Pausistratus their admirall, had in open audience given out certaine proud and disdainfull speeches against him, entred into a privat quarell with him, tossing & devising in his mind night and day nothing els, but how he might by some effectuall and worthie deedes, checke and con-

pute those brave and glorious words of his. He dispatched therefore unto him as a messenger, G a man well knowne unto him, with credence and instructions to give him to understand, that himselfe would (if he might) stand both Paussistratus and his countie in good steed: and that Paussistratus (if it pleased him) had meanes to restore him againe into his native countie. When Paussistratus marvelled hereat, and was very inquisitive to know how this might be effected; and gave him his faithfull promise (at his request) either to joyne with him in the action, or els to conceale all and keepe counsell: then the messenger declared, that Polyxenidas would make over unto him the kings navie either entier, or the greater part thereof: and in consideration and recompense of this so great merit, he desired no more but that he might returne into his country. The importance of this matter was so great, that he neither beleaved his words, nor yet neglected and despised the same. So he went to Panormus, a place in the land of Samos, and there he abode to view & see the thing that was offered unto him. Couriers there H ran betweene, and never would Paussistratus give credit to the partie, untill Polyxenidas wrote a letter with his owne hand in the presence of his said messenger, that he would performe whatsoever he had promised, yea and sent the same letters sealed with his owne signe Manuell. By this sure pledge or gage, Paussistratus made full account that he had the traitour surely bound and obliged unto him. For thus he thought, that Polyxenidas living as a subject under the king, would never hazard the danger of such pregnant matter to appeere against himselfe, testified under his owne hand-writing: so from that time forward the meanes of this pretended and counterfeited treason was devised and agreed upon. Polyxenidas gave him to understand, that he would of purpose lay aside and neglect preparation of all furniture, that he would neither have rowers nor other mariners in any number about his fleet: moreover, under a colour of calking and calstretting he would lay up some ships on dry land: others he would send away into the havens neere at hand, and keepe some few riding at anker before Ephesus in the haven, and those (if he were forced to battaile) he would set out to fight. The same negligence that Paussistratus heard say Polyxenidas would use in his fleet, the same himselfe presently shewed in his owne. For some of his ships he sent to Halicarnassus for victuals, and other to Samos the citie, to the end that he might be in redinesse when the traitor gave the signall of assault. Polyxenidas still by false semblance increased the errors and vaine imaginations of Paussistratus: for some ships indeed he drew aland and laid up dry: and as if he ment to hale up more, he repaired and amendeth the docks. Oremen and mariners he sent not for out of their winter harbours to go to Ephesus, K but secretly assembled them to Magnesia. Now it fortuned that a certaine souldier serving under king Antiochus, who was come to Samos about some private affaires of his owne, was apprehended there for a spy, and brought to Panormus before the Admirall Paussistratus. Who, being demanded what they did at Ephesus; I know not whether for feare, or upon small loyalty that he bare to his prince and countrey, discovered all: namely, that the fleet rid in the haven rigged, decked and trimmed in redinesse: Item, that all the rowers and mariners were sent to Sipylus in Magnesia: Item, that some vessels, and those very few, were drawne up to land, and the docks and harbours were shut up close: and lastly, that never at any time before, the navie was so carefully looked unto, nor sea affaires so well managed. But the mind of Paussistratus was so possessed before, with foolish conceits and vaine hopes, that he would not beleieve these informations and intelligences for true. Polyxenidas having set all things forward and in good readinesse, by night sent for the rowers and mariners from Magnesia: and having in great hast shot to sea and set afloat those vessels which lay at one side upon the land, after he had spent the whole day, not so much in making provision, as trifling out the time for the nonce, because he would not have the fleet to be seene when it set forth, weighed anker and losed after the sunne was gone downe: and with 70 saile of covered ships, because he had a contrary wind, entered the Bay of Pygala before day, where resting all the livelong day for the same purpose as before, the next night he sailed to the neereft coasts of Samos. From whence he gave commaundement to one Nicander an Archpirate, to set saile for Palinurus, with five close covered ships, there to land; and from thence to march with his armed souldiers over the fields the neereft way to Panormus, and M to come upon the back of the enemies: himselfe in the meane while divided his fleet into two parts, and made way to Panormus, there to keepe the entrie and mouth of the haven on both sides. Paussistratus at first was troubled for a while at this unexpected occurrent: but afterwards, as one that was an old beaten souldiour, he quickly tooke hart againe, and calling his wits together, supposed

A supposed that he might more easily repulse the enemies by land than by sea; and led his souldiours in two squadrons unto the promontories which bearing out into the sea like two hornes, to force the haven: from which two capes or heads he supposed that he might easily set back and put by the enemies with shooting darts from both sides. But Nicander who was sent by land, impeached this disfine of his, so that he was forced sodainly to change his mind and alter that course, and therefore commaunded all his men to go a shipboord and away. Hereupon exceeding feare there was both among the souldiours and also the mariners, as if they were to take their flight by sea and not to fight, seeing themselves invironed at once both by land and sea. Paussistratus supposing the only way to escape and save themselves, was to make way through the mouth of the haven, and so to recover sea-roume; after he had seene all his men embarked, commaunded the rest to follow, and himselfe first plying and labouring hard with ores, skudded amaine with his ship to the entrance of the haven. Now when she was once past the streight and come into the open sea, Polyxenidas was there to welcome him with three Galeaces of five banks of ores, and so beset him. The poore ship was wounded with the yron pikes bearing out in the beake heads of the galeaces, and so bouged and funke withall. The defendants upon the hatches were overwhelmed with shot of darts, and among the rest, Paussistratus himselfe manfully fighting lost his life. The rest of the ships were bourded and taken, some before the haven, others within: and some there were that by Nicander were seized as they laboured to lose from the land, and to launch forth. Five ships only of Rhodes, and two of Cous, escaped cleere and fled, which made themselves way even among the thickest of their enemies, by the meanes of a C fearefull burning flame of fire that they had with them. For they ferme two long perches or poles bearing forward at the prow, like two sprit sailes, in every ship, carying yron pots and pans afore them full of light fire. The Gallies of Erythrea, meeting the Rhodian ships not farre from Samos as they fled, the which were comming to help them, turned their count backward into Hellepontus, unto the Romanes. About the same time Seleucus gained the citie of Phocaea by treason, entering in at a gate which the warders set open of purpose for him. And for feare, Cymæ and other townes of that coast revolted unto him.

Whiles these things thus passed in Eolis, and that Abydus had endured the siege for certain dayes by the defence of the kings garison that manned the walls: now that all were overtired and wearied, the magistrates of the citie (by the permission of Philotas captaine of the garison) D articulated with Livius upon conditions to render the towne. The only point whereupon they stood, and which stayed the conclusion, was this, for that they could not agree whether the kings souldiours should be sent away armed or disarmed. And whiles they debated hereabout, newes came of the Rhodians defeature, and so the oportunitie of gaining the towne slipped out of their hands. For Livius fearing, lest Polyxenidas pulled up with the successe of so great an exploit, would surprize the fleet that rid at Canæ, leaving presently the siege before Abydus, and the garding of Hellepont, put to sea afresh those ships that lay dry at Canæ. And Eumenes came to Elea: But Livius went to Phocaea with all his fleet, to which he had adjoynd two tireme gallies of Mitylenæ. But when he heard say it was kept with a strong garison of the kings, and that Seleucus was encamped not far off, after he had pilld the sea coast, and charged hastily his ships E with a good bootie, and those were prizes of men especially, he stayed no longer there than untill Eumenes might overtake him with his fleet; but directed his course streight to Samos. The Rhodians upon the first newes of this their overthrow, feared much, and withall mightilie sorrowed: for besides the losse of their sea-souldiours and ships, they lost also the very floure and strength of their youth: for as much as many yong gentlemen of their nobilitie, accompanied Paussistratus, among other motives, in regard of his authoritie, which was right great and for good desert among his countrymen. But afterwards considering how treacherously they were over-raught, and namely, by one of their owne citizens, borne among them, their melancholic turned into choler; and their sorrow into anger. Whereupon they sent forth ten ships immediately, and few dayes after other ten, under the conduct of Eudamus the Admirall over them all: F who albeit he were not for other feates of armes and martiall skill equall to Paussistratus, yet they supposed verily he would be a leader so much the more warie and circumspect, as he was the lesse hardie and courageous. The Romanes and king Eumenes first fell with the land Erythrea, where they stayed one night, and the morrow after gained the point of Corycus, a promontorie of the Tians. From whence when they purposed to crosse over to the neereft parts of Samos, not waiting ring for the sunne-rising, by which the Pilots might observe the disposition of the weather, they G hoisted up sailes against a very doubtfull and dangerous tempest: for the wind turned from North-east to full North, as they were in the mids of their course, whereby they began to be mightily tossed among the surging billows of the rough & angry sea. Polyxenus supposing that the enemies would take their course directly to Samos, there to joyne with the Rhodian fleet, departed from Ephesus, and first ankered at Myonesus: from thence he sailed to an Iland called Macris, to the end that as the enemies fleet sailed by, he might take advantage to set upon either some ships singled & severed from the bodie of the fleet, or play upon the tail and reregard ther-of. After that he perceived the whole fleet to be dispersed by force of the tempest, he thought first to take that occasion to fall upon them: but the wind rising still more and more, and raising greater waves, because he saw he could not possibly come neere to bound them, he cut over to H the Iland Ethalia, minding the next day to assaile the ships in the maine sea as they passed to Samos. Some small number of the Roman ships in the beginning of the night put into the haven of Samia, which they found void and empty: the rest of the fleet after they had bene tossed and tormented all the night long in the deepe, at length light upon the same harborough.

Where being advertised by the peasants of the country, that the enemies ships lay in the rode of Athalia, they fell to consult, whether presently to bid battaile & put it to the hazard, or expect the arrivall of the Rhodian fleet. Deferring therefore that enterprise (for so upon advertisement they were agreed) they traversed to Coricus, from whence they came. Polyxenus likewise, having staid at anker in vain, returned to Ephesus: & then the Roman ships, while the seas were thus cleere of enemies, sailed over to Samos. Thither also arrived the Rhodian fleet few daies after: and that it I might appeare how long looked for it was, they all presently set saile for Ephesus, with purpose either to trie an issue by a battell at sea, or else if the enemy refused the triall, to expresse and wring from him a plaine confession of cowardise: which was a materiall point and of great importance to moove the minds of the other neighbour-cities. Being arrived to the very haven mouth, they embattailed their ships & stood directly affront opposed unto it. And when they saw none make saile nor set out against them, the one part thereof rode ashore at ancre still in the very haven mouth; the other discharged the souldiours & set them a land. Vpon whom (as they were driving a mightie bootie which they had raised by harrying all the country over) Andronicus a Macedonian, who lay in garison at Ephesus, sallied forth, even as they approached the walles of the citie; and having eased them of a great part of their prey aforesaid, he chased themselves to the sea un- K to their ships. The morrow after, the Romans having bestowed an ambush about the mid-way between, marched in order of battaile against the citie, to see if peradventure they could traine forth the Macedonian again without the walles: but perceiving that no man durst come abroad for suspicion & feare of an await, they returned to their ships again; and when they saw their enemies would not abide them neither at sea nor on land, in the end the fleet sailed againe to Samos from whence it came. Thence the Pretour made out two gallies of Italian confederates, and as many Rhodians under the conduct of Epicrates the Rhodian Admirall, to defend and keepe the streights of Cephalenia, which Hibristas the Lacedæmonian together with the youth of the Cephalenes, infested with his roving and robbing, in so much as there could no ships passe by sea to and fro with victuals betweene Italie and that coast. At Pyrcæum Epicrates met with L. A- L emilius Regillus comming to succed in the Admiraltie: who hearing of the destitute of the Rhodians, and having himselfe but two Quinquereme galleaces, brought Epicrates backe with him into Asia with foure ships. There accompanied them also the open ships of the Athenians. And he passed over by the sea * Ægeum. Thither also arrived Timasocrates the Rhodian in the dead of the night with two Quadrireme gallies from Samos. Who being brought unto A- emilius, declared how he was sent to quiet and defend that sea coast, which the kings roving ships and men of warre by their often excursions from Hellepontus and Abydus, had made too hot for the hulkes and other ships of burden which used to passe that way. As Aemilius sailed from Chios to Samos, two Rhodian Quadrireme gallies were sent by Livius to meet him: and king Eumenes also with two Quinquereme galleaces presented himselfe unto him. Being all arrived M at Samos, Aemilius after he had received the navie of Livius, and sacrificed orderly as the maner was, called a counsell. At which C. Livius (for his opinion was asked first) spake and said, That no man giveth more sound and faithfull counsell than hee, who persuadeth another man to that which himselfe would doe in the same case. As for mee, my intent and purpose was, to got

* Archipelago.

A goe against Ephesus with the whole armada, and thither to bring with me the vessels of burden charged with heavie ballace of gravell and sand, and to sinke them in the verie haven mouth, for to choke it up. And to make this barre against the haven, it was a matter (said hee) of lesse difficulty, for that the mouth and gullet of the haven, was in manner of a river, long, narrow, and full of shelves and shallows. By which meane I should have cut off the benefite of the sea from the enemy, and make him loose the use altogether of his navie. But no man there besides himselfe thought well of this devise. King Eumenes demaunded, what they would doe then after this choking up and stoppage of the haven passage, by sinkeing the ships? whether they would depart from thence with their owne navie at libertie, to helpe their allies and terrifie and affright their enemies; or never the later still, keepe the haven (as it were) in siege with the whole fleet? For if they departed, who could make doubt but that the enemy would plucke up those dammes and barres that there lay drowned; yea, and with lesse adoe and trouble, open the haven againe, than it was stopped? and if they meant to tarie there nevertheless, to what purpose then was the haven shut up? But contrariwise, they within Ephesus (quoth hee) being in surety for any daunger from their haven, and having a most rich and wealthie citie of their owne, furnished with all things out of Asia, would passe the sommer season in rest and repose; whiles the Romanes flo-ting in the open wide sea, exposed to the violence of waves and lying at the mercy of tempests, should be driven to keepe a continuall guard, disturnished of all things, and rather tied up and debarred themselves, for being able to effect those things that were needfull to be done, than in case to impeach and shut up their enemies. Then Eudamus the admirall of the Rhodian fleet, opined for his part, and spake to the question, saying, That he rather disliked of that course, than C knew himselfe a better, or could advise what was to be done. Epicrates the Rhodian was of mind, to leave Ephesus for the present, and to send part of his ships into Lycia, for to associate unto them Patara, the capitall citie of that nation: shewing two things of great consequence, that hereby would accrue. For, both the Rhodians assured of peace, and secured from all daunger of those quarters that lie about their Island, might thereby attend wholly, and employ all their forces upon the regard of this onely warre against Antiochus: and also the Armada which was prepared in Lycia might be stopped & impeached, for ever joining with Polyxenus. This opinion imported, & prevailed most. Howbeit, thought good it was and agreed upon, that Regillus should present himselfe before Ephesus, with the whole fleet, to strike a terror into the enemies.
D And C. Livius was sent with foure Rhodian quadrireme gallies, and two Smyrnean open ships into Lycia, with direction to take Rhodes in the way, and with them there to communicate all his counsels. The cities which he passed by, namely, * Miletus, * Myndus, * Halicarnassus, * Cni- * dus and Cous, performed willingly whatsoever was enjoined and imposed upon them. Being arrived at Rhodes, hee declared unto the Rhodians the effect of his commission, and withall required their advise. They all approved the designe, and when hee had taken of them to the fleet that he had of his own, three quadrireme gallies more, he sailed to * Patara. At the first he had a merrie gale of wind, that set them forward directly toward the citie, and good hope they had with their suddaine terrour to doe some good with the inhabitants: but afterwards, the wind being come about, the sea rose, and the surging waves began to make it troublesome and daungerous; E howbeit they laboured so with oares that they gat to the shore side. But neither was there about the citie any safe bay to ride in, neither were they able to keepe the sea with anker without the haven mouth of the enemies citie, the sea was so rough, and the night so neere. So passing along by the wall side of the citie, they sailed to the port of Phænicus, lesse than two miles distant from thence, which was a safe rode for their ships from all daunger of sea, but high cliffs and rocks there were over their heads which commanded them, & those the townsmen quickly seized, with the assistance of the kings souldiours whom they had in garison. Against whom Livius sent out the aid-souldiers of the Ilians, and the nimblest and most deliver young men of the Smyrneans, notwithstanding the landing places were very difficult and untoward. These sustained the fight at first, so long as they shot darts, and made pettie excursions and profers rather of skirmishes, F than a direct battell, as being but few in number. But after that they ran out of the citie in great numbers, and that the whole multitude was issued forth, Livius feared least not onely those auxiliars should be environned and enclosed, but also the ships distressed and endaugered from the land: so he brought forth to fight, not the souldiours onely, but all the rable of the mariners also and the towers, armed and furnished with whatsoever weapons they could find. And even then also also there was a doubtfull and dangerous conflict, wherein besides certaine souldiours L. Apustus died in the medley of this suddaine and tumultuarie skirmish. Yet in the end, the Lycians were discomfited, put to flight, and chased into their citie. The Romanes likewise retired to their ships, carrying away with them no bloudlesse victorie for their part. From thence they shaped their course to the gulfie or narrow streight of Telmessus (which of one side toucheth Caria, & Ly-cia on the other) laying aside all hope to assaile Patara any more; and so the Rhodians were discharged and sent home. Livius after he had coasted along Asia crossed over into Greece, to the end, that having communed and conferred with the Scipios (who then abode about Theffalie) he might saile directly into Italie.

Aemilius when he had intelligence, that the designement intended in Lycia was given over, and that Livius was departed into Italie, being himselfe also returned to Samos (for that he was by violence of tempest repulled from Ephesus, without effect of his enterprize) thought it was a shame and dishonour, that the adventure was given upon Patara in vaine, and therefore determined in proper person to make a voyage thither with his whole fleet, and to assault the citie with all the force he could possible. And having passed along Miletus, and all that coast of the associates, they disbarked from the gulfie or creke of Bargillæ, and came a land neere Iassus. The citie was held by a garrison of the kings: and the Romanes wasted by way of hostilitie, the territorie about it. Then Aemilius sent certaine to parle with the cheefe citizens and the magistrates, to found them how they were disposed, & also to sollicite them to revolt: but being answered again that it lay not in their owne power to doe as they would, hee marched forward to give an assault to the citie. Now there were certaine Iassians, banished persons, in companie with the Romanes, who in great number befought and importuned the Rhodians, not to suffer a citie, so neere a neighbour and linked in blood unto them, for to perish and come to ruine, especially having no way offended: allcading, that the onely cause of their banishment was their loialtie unto the Romanes, and by the same violence of the kings garrison souldiours, were they also held in awe who remained in the citie, by which themselves had been expelled. For all the Iassians in generall were of one mind, most willing and desirous to avoid and shake off the servitude under the king.
The Rhodians were moved in compassion with their praiers, and joining unto them king Eumenes also, partly by shewing the consanguinitie and kindred betwene them, and partly by pitying and lamenting the distressed state of the citie (besieged, as it were, already by the kings garrison) they prevailed so much, that they forbore to assaile it. So they departed from thence, & because all other parts were peaceable, they sailed along the coast of Asia, untill they arrived at Loryma, a port or haven towne even against Rhodes. There in the Principia began first a secret whispering among the Colonels (which afterwards came to the ears of Aemilius himselfe) namely, That the navie was led away farre ynough off from Ephesus, where by right and of dutie hee was to warre; to the end, that the enemie being left at libertie behind their backs, might attempt to do what he list without controulment, against so many cities and States of the Romane allies, neere unto him. Aemilius was mooved herewith, and calling unto him the Rhodians, demanded of them, Whether the whole armada might ride conveniently within the haven of Patara? And when they answered No, he tooke that occasion to passe no further, but to give over the voyage, and so brought backe his ships to Samos.

In this same time Seleucus the sonne of Antiochus, after he had kept his armie all winter time in Aeolis, employing it partly in succouring his associates, and partly in sacking and pilling those whom he could not draw into association, intended to invade the confines of king Eumenes his realme, whiles he (together with the Romanes) was busied farre from home, in assailing the maritime parts of Lycia. And first hee approached Elæa in countenance of an enemie, with banner displayed; but afterwards, leaving to besiege the citie, after spoile made in hostile manner of the territorie, he marched forward to besiege and assault the head citie and capitall strength of all his kingdome * Pergamus. Attalus at the beginning seemed rather to brave and provoke him unto fight with his strong guards that hee had placed without the citie, and excursions with his horsemen and light armour, than to stand upon his guard and defence, and to receive the forces of his enemie: but at length, seeing by these light skirmishes that hee was in no respect able to match Seleucus, hee retired himselfe within his walls, and so the citie began to bee besieged. And much about the same time, Antiochus also being departed from Apamea, first lay encamped at Sardis, and afterwards, not farre from the campe of Seleucus, neere to the head or source of the river

* Caicus,

A * Caicus, with a mightie armie composed of diverse and sundrie nations. The greatest thereof terror in this armie was a redoubled regiment of Gauls, to the number of foure thousand, hired for wages, whome with some few other among them, hee sent out to waite and destroy all parts of the territorie about Pergamus. When newes hereof came to Samos, Eumenes at the first, being called away by this warre; (begun at home, even at his very dores) made hast with his fleet to Elæa; where finding in readinesse certaine horsemen and footmen both lightly appointed, by their sure convoy and safe conduct, hee came to Pergamus before the enemies had knowledge thereof, or enterprised any thing. Where once againe they began to make light skirmishes by way of excursions, for in truth Eumenes lay off, and was not willing to hazard the maine chaunce upon a throw. Few daies after, both the Romane and Rhodian fleet came from Samos and B were arrived at Elæa for to aid the king Eumenes. When Antiochus was advertised that they had landed their forces at Elæa, and that so many armades were met together in that one haven, and hearing with all about the same time, that the Consull was already with a power in Macedonie making preparation of all things for his passage over Hellespont: hee supposed now it was high time (before that he were pressed at once both by land and sea) to treat for peace, & therefore hee seized a certaine hill over against Elæa, to fortifie and encampe in. Where, leaving his whole power of Infanterie, he defended into the plaine, under the very walls of Elæa, with all his Cavallerie, to the number of sixe thousand horse. And sending an herald to Aemilius, hee gave him to understand, that hee was desirous to have a treatie of peace. Aemilius sent for Eumenes from Pergamus, and they both, together with the Rhodians, debated in counsell what to do. The C Rhodians refused not the offer. But Eumenes said it was neither honourable to parle of peace at that time, ne yet possible to conclude thereof, if they went about it. For being as wee are (quoth hee) pinned up within our walls and besieged, how can we receive from another, conditions of peace, saving our credite and honour? and who will hold that for a firme and assured peace, which we shall contract without the presence of the Consull, without the authoritie of the Senate, and without the graunt of the people of Rome? For I demand of you, when yee have made a peace, whether you will return presently into Italie or no? whether you will withdraw your fleet & armie? or rather wait and expect to know the Consull his mind and advise, the Senats pleasure and or-D dinance, and the generall assent of the people in that behalfe? It remaineth then after that is done, that you stay still in Asia, and that your forces being brought backe againe into their wintering D harbours, (after they have done with warfare) shall to consume and eat out our allies, by charging them with provision of victuals: and afterwards, if it shall so please the higher powers, & those that are in authoritie so to ordaine, we must begin that war anew, which now we are able (if we slacke not the time, nor stop the forward course wherein we are) before winter come, with the favor and power of the gods, to finish and bring to a finall end. This advise tooke place; and answer was returned unto Antiochus, that there could be no treatie of peace before the Consull his coming.
Antiochus having thus in vaine sought for peace, when he had first forraied and wasted the terri-torie of Elæa, and afterwards of Pergamus, left his sonne Seleucus there, and went himselfe in person to * Adramytteum, pilling and spoiling all the way as he journeyed, in all kind of hostilitie.
Now this territorie is a rich country, called, The champaine plaines of Thebe: much renowned E by the Poet Homer in his poeme; and in no one place besides of all Asia got the kings souldiers a greater bootie and more pillage. Thither arrived also to Adramytteum both Aemilius and Eumenes (having set a compass by sea) for the defense of the said citie. During this time, they sent for a thousand foote, and a hundred horse out of Achæa to come unto Elæa: all which forces were commaunded by captaine Diophanes. So soone as they were disbarked and landed, there were readie to receive them certaine men sent from Attalus of purpose to meete them, who by night conducted them to Pergamus. They were all old souldiours, and well experienced in feates of warre: and their leader Diophanes had bene brought up & trained under Philopemenes, the greatest warrior in those dayes of all the Greekes, who tooke but two dayes for to rest his horse and men, and to take view of the enemies gards, namely, in what places and at what time F they used customably either to come forward, or to retire. The kings souldiours were approched almost to the very foote of the hill, where the citie is situate. By meanes whereof they might forage behind at their will, and there was not one issued out of the citie so much as to launce a dart aloofe against the corps de gard of the enemies. After they were once so neere driven for feare, that they were faine to keepe themselves close within the walls, the kings souldiers without, began

began first to conteinne, and afterwards to neglect them. Many of them had not their horses so much as saddled and bridled, and some few were left in armes and in ordinance of battaile: the rest were gone aside and spread over all parts of the champaine: some went to play and tooke themselves to youthfull sports and wanton riot: others fell to feeding, pampering their bellies, and making good cheere under couvert shade, and many were laid along asleepe. Diophanes beheld all the manner hereof aloft from an high turret of the citie Pergamus, and presently gave commaundement to his souldiers to take armes and to be readie at the gate. Himselfe went to Attalus, and told him, that he purposed to assaile the enemies corps de gard. Attalus (although he were very loth) gave him leave; for he saw full well, that he was to fight with one hundred horie against three hundred: and one thousand foote against four thousand. Being out of the gate, he led him downe not far from the enemies corps de gard, waiting when some good opportunitie and occasion would offer it selfe. Both they within Pergamus of one side, deemed this to be follie rather than hardinesse; and also the enemies on the other side making towards them for a while, and perceiving them not to stirre, altered nothing of their usuall negligence, and that which more was, made a mockery and skorne of their small number. Diophanes kept his men still a good time, as if he had brought them forth only for a shew, to see and to be seene: but after he perceived once the enemies to be disbanded out of their ranks and raunges, he commaunded the footmen to make all the hast they could after, whiles himselfe leading the way first among his horsemen; ran with his whole troupe upon the spurre as hard as ever he could, and setting up a shout and cry aloud on all hands, as well with foote as horse, charged sodainly upon the enemies gards, ere they were ware of them. Man and horse both were greatly skared: and the horses especially having broken their collers and halters wherewith they stood tied, made foule worke and much trouble among their owne partie. Some few of the horses kept their standing still unafrighted, and even those they had much ado to saddle, to bridle, and to mount upon; with to great a terror came the Achæans, and with much more than so small a number could be thought to make. And as for the footmen in order arranged and well provided, they fell vpon those that were negligently dispersed abroad, ere they looked for them, and in manner halfe asleepe. Great execution and butcherie was committed upon them all the fields over, and they fell amaine. Diophanes having followed the chase as they ran away in scattering wise, so farre as he might well with safetie of himselfe, returned to the guard and defence of the citie, having won great honor to the nation of the Achæans by this exploit: for not only the men, but women also beheld this service, and looked on him from the walls of Pergamus. The next day after, the kings Corps de gards were better ordered and kept closer together, yea and retired halfe a mile farther from the citie, where they encamped themselves. The Achæans likewise much about the same time advanced to the very same place. Many houres together they looked one upon another who would begin first, expecting every minute when the charge should be given. But after the sunne was neere going downe, and that it was time to returne into the camp, they of the kings part began to ruffle their ensignes and guidons together, and set forward with their bands, ordered in manner of a march for the way, more like than marshalled for to fight a battaile. Diophanes sat still so long as they were within sight: but then he charged upon their rereward, with as great violence and furie, as the day before, and put them againe into so great affright and trouble, that they gave them leave to wound them on their backs, and not one would stay to make head and resist, but trembling for feare, and hardly keeping the order of a march, they were beaten into their camp. This boldnes of the Achæans forced Seleucus to dislodge and remove out of the territorie of Pergamus.

Antiochus after he heard say that the Romanes and Eumenes were come to the defence of Adramyteum, medled no more with the towne it selfe, but after he had laid the fields wast, departed from thence, and forced Peræa, a Colonie of the Mitylenæans. As for Cotton and Corylenus, Aphrodisias and Pryene, they were won at the first assault, and so he returned to Sardis by Thiaira. Seleucus remaining still upon the sea coasts, as he affrighted some, so he defended others. The Romanes fleet together with Eumenes and the Rhodians sailed first to * Mitylene, and back againe from thence, returned to Elea from whence she came. So they held on their course to Phocæa, and sel with an island called Bacchius, situate above the citie of the Phocæans: and after they had pilld and rifled by way of hostilitie the temples, which heretofore they had foreborne, and taken away the images (for the island was magnificently adorned and beautified therewith)

* Tire.* Mitylen.

A therewith) they crossed over to the citie it selfe, which they assaulted in divers quarters, according as they had divided their forces into three parts: but seeing that it might not be won with bare skaling and strength of armes, without planting engins of batterie and other fabricks; and besides, that three thousand armed men sent from Antiochus for defence, were entred into the citie, presently they gave over the siege: and the fleet retired to the Islands, having done no other exploit, but only pilld the territorie about the citie.

This done, it was thought good that Eumenes should have licence to depart into his owne kingdome, that he might provide for the Confull and the armie, all necessaries toward the passage over Hellepontus: also that the Romanes and Rhodian fleets should returne to Samos, and there remaine in gard, and have an eye unto Polyxenidas, least he removed from Ephesus and made some attempt that way. So, the king returned to Elea, the Romanes and Rhodians to Samos, where M. Amylius the Pretor his brother departed this life. The Rhodians, after his funeral obsequies performed, sailed to Rhodes with thirtene ships of their owne, one quinquere me galeace of Cous, and one other of Gnidos, there to lye in rode, readie to make head against the fleet, which as the bruit blazed, was astore and coming out of Syria. Two dayes before that Eudamus losed from Samos with the Armada, thirtene ships sent from Rhodes under the conduct of Admirall Pamphilidas to encounter the said Syriak fleet, taking with them foure other ships, which were for the gard of Caria, delivered from siege Dardala, and other petie forts which the kings souldiers assailed. Then it was advised that Eudamus should incontinently set forward on his voyage. And to that fleet which he had under his charge, he adjoynd also foure open ships. Being departed, he made saile in all hast that he possibly could, and arrived at the port called Megile: where he overtooke those that were gone before; from whence they came in one band and traine jointie together unto Phaselis, and then they judged it the best way, in that place to attend the coming of the enemy. This Phaselis standeth upon the confines betweene Lycia and Pamphylia. It lieth farre within the sea, and is the first land that sheweth it selfe, to them that saile from Cilicia to Rhodes; and from thence a man may ken and discover ships under saile a farre off: for which cause especially, this was chosen for a fit and convenient place, wherein they might encounter the enemies fleet. But by reason the aire was unhollome, and the season of the yeere unhealthfull (for it was midsummer) and the smells and stinking savours such, as they had not bene acquainted with many contagious diseases and maladies D which they foresaw not, began to spread commonly abroad, and especially among the mariners: for feare of which plague & mortallitie, they departed from thence, and passed beyond the gulph of Pamphylia: and being arrived in the river Eurymedon, they received advertisement from the Alpendians, that the enemies were already before Sida. Those of the kings side had sailed but slowly in regard of the adverse season of the winds named * Etesia, which keepe their set and certain time, like as those do which they call * Favonij. Now of the Rhodians there were 32 quadreeme Gallies, and 4 other trieme besides. The kings fleet consisted of 37, and those of greater burden and wastie: among which were three mightie Galleaces of * 7 banks of ores on a side, and four of * 6, besides 10 ordinary trieme gallies. There were others also that knew by a sentinell or watch-towre standing on a certain high place, how the enemies were at hand. The next morning by breake of day both these fleets set forth of the haven, as if they would have fought that very day. And after that the Rhodians had passed the cape, which from Sida hangeth over into the sea, then presently were they discovered of the enemies, & the enemies likewise descried by them. The left wing of the kings fleet, flanked with the maine sea, was commaunded by Anniball: and Apollonius one of his gallants and courtiers led the right: so as now they had raunged their ships broad in a front-ranke. The Rhodians advanced forward ordered in length, & casting their battaile into files. In the vaward the Admirall ship of Eudamus was foremost; Cargæus governed the reregard; and Pamphilidas had the conduct of the middle ward. Eudamus seeing the enemies battaile arraunged & redy for conflict, put forth into the open sea, commanding those that followed after in order to keepe their array, and so directly to assault the enemy: which at the first caused some trouble, for he was not so farre advanced into the deepe, that all the ships could be set in array along the land side: and besides, himselfe making too much hast, with five ships only encountred Anniball, for the rest followed not after him, because they were bidden to range affront. Now the rereward had no roume left them toward the land: and thus whiles they hastily were jumbled together, the fight by that time was begun in the right wing against

againt Anniball. But at one instant the Rhodians cast off all feare, as well in regard of the goodnes of their ships, as of their owne experience and usuall practise in service at sea. For their ships with great quicknesse and agilitie making faile into the maine sea, made rounge for every one that came after along the land side: and withall, if any one hapned to run upon a ship of the enemies with her piked beake head, either it rent the prow, or wiped away the ores, or passing cleere through, betwene the ranks and files turned againe and charged upon the poupe. But the thing which terrified the enemye most was this, That a great galeace of the kings which had seven bankes of ores on a side, was bouged and rooke a leake with one onely knocke, that it received by a Rhodian ship farre lesse: whereupon the right wing of the enemye doubtlesse enclined to flye away. But Anniball pressed Eudamus very much in the open sea, most of all with multitude of ships: for otherwise in all respects Eudamus had the ods and better hand of him by farre: and certainly he had compassed and enclosed Eudamus round, but that a flag was put out of the admirall, (by which signall the disperfed ships are wont to rally themselves together:) whereupon all those that had gotten the better of the enemy in the right wing, made haile to joyne in one for to succour their fellowes. Then Anniball also and the ships about him, tooke their flight: but the Rhodians were not able to make way after them and to mainteine the chase, by reason that their rowers many of them were sicke, and therefore the sooner weary. Whereupon they cast ancre in the maine sea, and stayed to eat and take some refectiō for to strengthen their bodies. And in this while Eudamus espyed and beheld the enemies how they hailed and towed by ropes at the taile of the open ships (that went only with ores) certaine other which were lame, maimed, sore brused and cracked: and might see 20 others not much foundier than they, to leave the rest and depart: whereupon causing an Oyez and silence to be made from an high turret in the fore-castle of the admirall, Arise my hearts (saith hee) and see a pleasant sight yonder and a goodly spectacle. So they all arose at once and beheld how the enemies were afraid, and what poore trust they made in haile to flye, and with one voice they all in a manner cryed out to follow after & pursue them. Now Eudamus his owne ship was shaken in many places and forebrused; whereupon he commaunded Pamphilidas and Chariclitus to make way after them, so farre forth as they thought they might without danger. And for a good time they held them in chase: but seeing Anniball approching neere the shore, and fearing least the wind would locke them within the enemies coast, they returned toward Eudamus, and drew along with them the great galeace which they tooke, and which at the first encounter was pierced, and with much adoe traigned it to Phaelis. From thence they retired themselves to Rhodes, not so joyous for this victorie, as blaming one another that they had not either funke or taken the whole fleet of the enemies, having so good meanes as they had to doe it. Anniball daunted with this one unfortunate battell, durst not even then passe along the river of Lycia, but desired to joyne unto the old fleet of the kings as soone as possibly hee could. To impeach him for effecting that, the Rhodians set out Chariclitus and twenty war ships with piked stems, toward Patara and the port of Megiste; and commaunded Eudamus to returne unto the Romanes to Samos with seven of the tallest ships in all that fleet whereof he had the command: to the end, that hee might induce the Romanes with his counsell and advise, yea and with all the countenance and authoritie that he had, force them to lay siege unto Patara and to assault it. The Romanes tooke great joy and contentment, first at the newes and report of this victorie, and afterwards at the returne of the Rhodians. And it seemed, if that one city stood not in their way to stay them, and that they were once rid of that care, they would without any let and emperachment, make all the sea coasts sure enough for any danger and damage from those quarters. But because Antiochus was departed from Sardis, the Romanes held them backe, and would not suffer them to abandon the guard and defence of Æolis and Ionis, for feare least the cities upon the sea side might be surprisid. And so they sent Pamphilidas with four covered ships, to the fleet that lay about Patara.

Antiochus gathered together not only the garrisons and aids of all the cities that were about him, but also addressed his embassadours with letters to Prusias the king of Bithynia, wherein he gave out hard words of the Romanes for their passage into Asia: namely, That their coming was only was for this, to demolish, put downe, and overthrow all kingdoms, & to set up the only Roman Empire, that none els might stand in the whole world. That Philip and Nabis already were subdued and deposed, and now himselfe was to make the third, against whom they were come. Neither would they make an end there but goe on still, like a continuall fire that burneth forward, ward, and take all afore them, and ever as they vanquished one, proceed to another that is next. And no doubt, they would make a bridge of him to passe onward into Bithynia, now that Eumenes hath gently taken upon his necke the yoke of voluntary servitude. Prusias was somewhat touched with these letters, but when there came others written from Scipio the Consull, and his brother Africanus especially, he was wholly averted from enterreining any such suspition. For Africanus besides the continuall custome that the people of Rome had, to advance and amplifie the majesty of KK. their allies and confederates, with all kind of honour; alledged for his part, the domestickall examples of his owne house and family: inducing Prusias thereby to enter into a desire to win his love and friendship. For he discourtled and said, That those princes and pettie KK. in Spaine, whome he had received into his protection, he leit behind him when hee went away, mightie monarkes: also, that he not only had placed and established Masissa in his fathers realme and throne, but settled him in the kingdome also of Syphax, who before had chased and expelled him: so as now he was not only the richest potentate and most wealthy king of all Africke, but also for majestie & puissant forces a paragon, equall to any other king in the whole world. As for Philip and Nabis, enemies they were and vanquished by T. Quintus, howbeit they remained kings afterwards within their owne realmes. And Philip verily the yere that is past, had his tribute forgiven him and his sonne an hostage delivered unto him: yea and some cities without the dominion of Macedonie, have received him as their king; and the Roman Generals have winked thereat and beene contented. And surely Nabis had beene likewise graced and honoured, but for his owne peevish folly first, and the faineurous falsehood afterwards of the Ætolians, which was his utter undoing and overthrow. But the chiefe thing of all that most confirmed the mind of king Prusias, was the coming of Livius unto him in embassage from Rome, he, who aforetime in qualitie of Pretour, had been Admirall of the navie. Who shewed and declared unto him, how the hope of victory was much more assured to the Romanes than to king Antiochus; and withall, how the Romanes would be the faster and surer friend of the twaine, yea and make more conscience of keeping amitie.

Antiochus being put besides all hope of the association with Prusias, departed to Ephesus from Sardis, to visite and see the fleet, which for certaine moneths had been rigged and in readinesse: & this he did the rather, because he saw that hee could not hold out with the Roman armie and the two Scipios the commaunders thereof, than for that his sea-service in it selfe at any time before sped well, or could assure him now of great & certaine successe. Yet some little dram he had of good hope for the present, in that his intelligence was, that a great part of the Rhodian fleet was about Patara, and king Eumenes also with all his own ships departed into Hellespontus, to meet with the Consull. Besides this, in some measure his spirit was puffed up with the remembrance, how the Rhodian Armada had beene defeated at Samos by a careful plot and practise contrived beforehand. Having laid these conceits for a ground, he sent Polyxenidas away with the navie, to hazard the fortune of a battell in some sort or other (it made no matter how:) whilst himselfe in person led his whole armie to Notium (a towne of the Colophonians, seated upon the sea, and distant about two miles from the auncient citie Colophon.) The citie it selfe he had a good mind to conquer and bring in subjection unto him: for being so neere unto Ephesus as it was, there could not any thing bee done either by sea or land but it was within the cite of the Colophonians, and by their meanes notified streightwaies to the Romanes. Now hee made full account that they would remoove their fleet from Samos to succour that afflicted citie of theirs, and so Polyxenidas might thereby take his time and good opportunitie to execute some notable exploit. Whereupon he went in hand to plant fabricles against Colophon, and having raised his rampiers, and cast trenches on both sides alike, even to the very sea, hee approached with mantelets & terraces, as well the one part as the other, close unto the walls, and under the rowles, plaid upon them with the push and peise of the ram. The Colophonians much troubled and affrighted with these daungers and distresses, sent their Oratours to Samos unto L. Aemilius, to crave in humble manner the aid and succour of the Pretour and people of Rome. Aemilius was much discontented and offended in his heart, that he had made so long abode at Samos and performed no service. Nothing lesse thought he than that Polyxenidas, whom twise already in vain he had chalenged and bidden battell, would now offer to fight. He reputed it also for a disgrace and shamefull indignitie unto him, that Eumenes his fleet assisted the Consull to waite over the legions into Asia, and himselfe was assigned and enjoined to succour and aid the citie of Colophon.

Colophon besieged, the issue whereof would be so doubtful and uncertaine. Eudamus the Rhodian, G who was the man that had detained and kept him still at Samos, when hee was desirous to passe over into Hellespont, yea, and all the rest were instant with him, shewing & declaring how much better it was, either to deliver his allies from siege, or to defeat the fleet againe, which had bene once vanquished, and so to put the enemy quite besides the possession of the sea; than with the abandoning of his confederates, and betraying Asia both sea and land into the hands of Antiochus, to depart into Hellespont (where Eumenes with his fleet was sufficient to hold him play) and to quit that part of the warre which was committed to his charge. Well, they lofed from Samos to provide victuals, for that all their owne provision was spent, and shaped themselves to crosse over unto Chios. That was the garner and storehouse of the Romanes; and the very place unto which all the ships of burden, and the hulkes sent out of Italie, used to set saile and direct their H course. So they set a compassse about, toward the coast of the Island that lay farthest off from the citie, opposite to the Northeast, in regard of Chios and Erythraea. And as they were about to passe over thither, the Pretour was certified by letters, that great store of corne was come out of Italie to Chios: that the ships which were charged with wine, were kept backe by contrarie and crosse winds. Likewise, reported it was, that the Teians had furnished king Antiochus his fleet with victuals plentifully and liberally, and had promised also unto him five thousand vessels of wine. Whereupon he shifted saile suddainly in the midst of his direct course, and made head for Teios, intending either with their good wils to serve himselfe of the provision prepared for the enemy, or else to hold them for no better than enemies. Having directed the prowes of their ships toward the land, they might describe as it were, a fiftene ships neer unto Myonesus. Which I the Pretour supposing at the first to bee of the kings fleet, resolved to make way after them: but afterwards it appeared, they were brigantines or pinnaces, and certaine small barks of rovers and men of warre. These rovers having harried and spoiled all the maritime coasts of the Chians, were upon their returne with great store of prizes and pillage: but when they discovered a fleet in the deepe sea a farre off, they made all the saile they could, and fled. Yare of sterage they were and good of saile, by reason that their vessels were more light, and made of purpose to tid way, and besides neerer they were to land. And therefore they had recovered Myonesus, before the fleet could come any thing neere unto them. The Pretor thinking verily to force them out of the haven, made after without direction of a skilfull pilot, & knowledge of the place. Now this Myonesus is a promontorie or cape betwene Teos and Samos, a very mountaine made in fashion K of a sleepe, broad ynough at the foot, but rising narrower still, and runneth up to the top sharpe pointed. On the maine or land side it hath one advenue by a streight and narrow path. From the sea it is founded upon rockes, beaten and eaten with the continuall firling waves of the sea, in so much, as in some places the cliffes that hang over, bear more into the sea than the vessels that lie under in the harbour, take up of the sea. The Pretor with his ships durst not approach neer unto those crags, for feare of being within the shot of the pirates, who were perched upon the top of those sleepe rockes, and so they spent that day and lay off. At the last, a little before night, they gave over that vaine enterprise without effect, and the morrow after arrived at Teios; and having lodged their ships within the harbour, which themselves call Geraisticus (and it lyeth out at the backe side of the citie) the Pretour set ashore, and sent out his souldiours to forray the territorie L about the citie. The Teians seeing how their lands were spoiled even under their very noses, addressed certaine Oratours to the Romane Admirall, arraied all in white, after the manner of humble suppliants. And as they would have seemed to excuse their citie, for having done or said any thing against the Romanes tending to hostilitie; hee both charged them directly, that they had releevd the fleet of his enemies with victuals, and also told them what quantitie of wine moreover, they had promised to Polyxenidas. But and if they could be content to doe the like by the Romane fleet, he would recall his souldiours from pillage, otherwise hee would repute them for his enemies. The embassadours aforesaid made relation of this heave answere. Whereupon the magistrates of the citie assembled the people together, for to consult and conclude about this matter what they were best to doe. Thither as it happened, was Polyxenidas arrived with the M kings armada; who having lofed from Colophon, when hee heard that the Romanes were departed from Samos, that they had chased the Pirates as far as Myonesus, & were now waiting & harrying the lands of the Teians, also that their ships ankered in the rode Geraisticus, himselfe also cast anker over against Myonesus, hard by an Island which the sailers and mariners call Macris, in a secret

A a secret bay hard by, escouting and espying from this neere harbour, what the enemies did and intended. And at the first in good hope he was to discomfite and defeat the Romane fleet, like as hee had beforetime the Rhodian armada neere unto Samos, by seizing the mouth of the haven, and empeaching their issue forth. For this bay was in all respects like unto the other, lying just betweene two capes, which meet so neere, and in manner enclose the mouth thereof, that hardly two ships at once can goe forth together. And to this purpose Polyxenidas intended in the night season to take possession, and make himselfe sure of the said streights, there to place ten gallies under either cape, which standing there at the vantage, should from both points flanke the broad sides of his enemies ships in their going forth; and withall out of his other vessels to disbarke and land armed souldiours, like as he had done at Panormus, and so at once to assaile them both by sea and land, and make an end of them for all. VVhich designement of his no doubt had taken effect, but that the Romanes, after that the Teians had promised them to doe whatsoever they should command, thought it more commodious for the receiving of their provision of victuals, to passe with their ships unto the other harbour which was before the citie, to the open sea. Some say that Eudamus the Rhodian, shewed the inconvenience and discommoditie of the other harbour, by occasion that two gallies fortun'd in that streight to bee so entangled, that they brake one anothers oares with justeling together. And among other motives the Pretour was induced to change the harbour, because from the land side there, hee should lie within danger, considering that Antiochus himselfe was not encamped farre off. Thus the fleet being brought about close to the citie side, the souldiours and mariners (without the C knowledge of any commanders) were disbarked, for to dispose and disperse the victuals and wine especially, to every ship. But about noon-tide a certaine peasant of the cuntry chanced to bee brought before the Pretour, who gave intelligence, That there was a fleet of ships which two dayes already rode at anker under the island Macris; and that but a while agoe, certain vessels of them were seene to weigh anker, as if they would hoise up saile and bee gone. The Pretour moved at this sodaine occurrent, commanded the trumpets to sound the alarme, and to give knowledge and warning, that in case any were stragling abroad in the fields, they should retire. The Colonels he sent into the citie to gather the souldiours together and the mariners, that they might repaire to ship-board. This alarme caused as great a trouble and confusion, as usually is seene in a sodaine skarefire, or when a citie is surpris'd by the enemies. Here was skudding D into the city to recall their fellows; there was running out of the citie to recover their shippes; not knowing who commanded, by reason of the dissonant noise of men and sound of trumpet: howbeit as hap was, at length they ran all toward the ships, but in such a hurlyburly and disorder, that they scarcely knew their own vessels; or if they did, they could hardly for the crowd and prease, get thither and embarke themselves. Neither had this affright passed cleere without danger both by sea and land, but that Aemilius gave direction to every one what to do, and put out of the haven first himselfe with the Admirall ship into the open sea, and there received every vessel as they followed one after another in their order, and ranged them all affront: and if Eudamus also with the Rhodian fleet had not staid at the shore to see good order, that the soldiers might be set aboard without hurrying in fearefull hast, and every ship goe forth as it was E fitted and made ready. By this meanes both the foremost of the vaward were arraunged in the sight of the Pretor, and the Rhodians also kept their order in the reregard in such sort, as they put themselves into the open sea in as good array, as if they had seene the kings fleet under saile. But they were betweene the two promontories, Myonesus and Corycus, before they descried the enemy. The kings armada came forward in long files, two and two in a ranke, who displayed and spread themselves also affront towards the wing in such wise, that they might be able to compassse and enclose the right wing of the enemy. VVhich Eudamus the arriere-admirall perceiving, and seeing withall that the Romans could not possibly make head alike and extend themselves as broad as the enemy, and were at the point already in the right wing to be environed, made fast with his owne vessels (for the Rhodian barks were of all other in the whole fleet swiftest by farre) and after he had fronted equally and marched wing for wing, he made head with his owne F ship against the very admirall of the enemies, wherein Polyxenidas himselfe was aboard. By this time the battell began between both the maine fleets, all at once from every part. Of the Romans side there fought fourescore in all, whereof two and twentie were Rhodians. The enemies armada consisted of fourescore and nine, all ships of the greatest wastie and making, and had among them them three galeaces of fixe banks of ores on a side, and two of seven. For goodnes and strength G of ships, as also for valiancie of souldiours, the Romanes farre surpassd the Rhodians. But for agilitie and nimblenes of their vessels, for skilfull knowledge of pilots, and expert cunning and redinesse of mariners, the Rhodians were as much beyond them. And those above all the rest that caried fire before them in their noses, troubled and skared the enemies most: and that stratagemie and devise which had bene their only help and meanes of safetie, when they were surprised and beset at Panormus, was now the thing that stood them in best steed to win the victorie. For the kings ships fearing the fire that threatened their very faces, turned aside, because they would not run afront with their proes: so as they neither could themselves smite & hurt the enemies with their brasen pikes in the beake head, ne yet avoid them, but expose their own broad sides open to receive all pusses and violence from them. If any one fortun'd to encounter and run upon them, he was sure to be paid and sped with fire that was slung and cast into her: and more running there was to quench the same, than otherwise to fight. Howbeit, the resolute valour of the Romanes souldiours (which ever in warre prevaileth most) was it that did the deede. For after the Romanes by fine force had broken and cloven the maine battailon of the enemy in the very midst, they turned about againe, and presented themselves behind, and plaid upon the backs of the kings ships whiles they fought afront and made head against the Rhodians: and thus at one instant the battailon in the mids, and the ships in the left wing that served king Antiochus, were beset round about, and sunke to the botome of the sea. The right wing as yet entier and sound, was more terrified at the losse and overthrow of their fellows, than for any proper danger of their owne. Howbeit, after they saw the other invetted, and the Admirall her selfe with Polyxenidas in her, to abandon her companions and to halfe up sailes, they likewise in haist set up all their cloth and small trinquet sailes (for a good forewind they had for Ephesus) and fled as fast away as they could. Two and fortie ships they lost in this fight: of which thirteene were bourded and taken for the use of the Romanes, the rest were either consumed with fire, or devoured of the sea. Two Romanes ships were shattered and broken to fitters, and some other hurt, bruised and cracked. One Rhodian chaunced to be taken by a notable and memorable adventure. For having with her piked beake head stricken a Sidonian ship, with the violence of the blow she shooke out her owne anker, which by one of the floukes tooke fast hold as if it had bene a grappling hooke by the pro of the other ship. The Rhodians much troubled herewith, gave over rowing straight, as willing and desirous to be loose and parted from the enemy: and whiles they were busie thereabout, the gable which the anker drew with it caught among the ores of her owne ship, and swoopt them cleane away, and so left one side of it naked, whereby the ship being much weakened and enfeebled, was taken by the other that was fittinen and tied fast unto her. Much after this manner was the battaile fought at sea neere Myonesus. Whereupon Antiochus was sore affrighted: for being thus dispossed of the sea, he distrusted himselfe that he should not be able to hold and defend the places farther off: and therefore commaunded the garison to retire from Lysimachia, for feare it should be surprised there by the Romanes. But this was but a bad peece of counsell, as the sequell and issue proved afterwards. For it had bene an easie matter not only to defend Lysimachia against the first assault of the Romanes, but also to hold out the siege all winter: yea and by drawing out the time on length, to bring the very assailants themselves lying in leaguer, to extreme necessitie and want of all things: during which space they might have taken some occasion and opportunitie, to find a meane and make way for peace. Neither did he only quit Lysimachia and leave it for the enemies after this unfortunate battaile, but also raised his siege before Colophon and dislodged, yea and retired himselfe to Sardis: from whence he sent into Cappadocia to Attarates for aid, and to all other places where he could, to gather more forces: and now was he set upon no designe, but to geve battaile, and to hazard all upon the fortune of the field.

After this Navall victorie, Regillus Aemilius sailed directly to Ephesus, where he embattailed his ships in array even before the haven, and when by this bravado he had at last wrung again from the enemies a plaine and evident confession that they had abandoned the sea unto him, he set saile for Chios, unto which he had intended to shape his course from Samos before the late battaile upon the sea. There he repaired and calked his ships which were shaken & cracked in the foresaid fight: which done, he sent L. Aemilius Scaurus with thirtie saile toward Helle-spontus to transport the armie. And when he had rewarded the Rhodian ships with part of the pillage,

A pillage, and honored them with the navall spoiles, he gave them the renvoie, and sent them home. But the Rhodians lustily out-sailed Scaurus, and prevented his ships to set over the forces of the Consull: and after they had performed that service also, then they returned to Rhodes.

The Romanes Armada sailed from Chios to Phocæa. This citie is seated faire within the gulle of the sea, builded so, as that it lieth out in length. The wall containeth in compasse the space of two miles and an halfe: and from both sides it groweth narrow still, and meeteth in the mids, resembling the forme of a wedge or * coin, which the inhabitants themselves call Lamp-ter, in which place the citie is a mile broad and a quarter with the vantage. From which canton or corner there is a banke of firme land running a mile on end into the sea like a tongue, which devideth the haven just in the mids, marked out (as it were) just by a certaine line.

B Where it joyneth to the narrow streights it hath two most sure harbours of both sides, and those lying two contrarie wayes. That which looketh toward the South, is called according as it is in deed, Naustathmos [namely, a ship-rode, or harbour] for it is able to receive a great number of ships: the other haven is neere unto the very Lampter aforesaid. When the Romanes there was once possessed of both these most sure and safe harbours, the Pretour thought good before he set in hand either to skale the walls, or to raise any fabricks and plant engines against the citie, to send certain of purpose to found the minds and affections of the principall citizens and the magistrates within. But after he perceived they were obstinately bent, & would not come on, he began to lay batterie against it in two severall quarters. The one part was not much peopled, and had but few dwelling houses in it; and the temples of their gods tooke up a good space there- of; and there began he first to approach with the ramme, and therewith to batter the walls, and shake the turrets: and by that time that the multitude ran thither in great numbers, and presented themselves readie to defend, the ramme was jurring also at the other part: So as now the walls were laid along in both places; and upon the fall thereof whiles some of the Roman souldiers presently gave the assault at the very breach, mounting & marching upon the ruines of the stones that were faine: others also assaid to gaine the top of the upright walls with skaling ladders. But the townsmen withstood them so stiffely, & with such resolution, that it was well seene they reported more hope of defense in armes and valor, than in the strength of their walls. Whereupon the Pretor seeing in what danger his souldiers stood, and fearing to expose & sacrifice them ere they were aware to the fury of these people so enraged like desperate and mad persons, commaunded

D to found the retreat. And notwithstanding the assault ceased and was given over, yet betooke not the townsmen themselves to rest and repose, but ran from all parts every one, to raise countermures, fill up the breaches, and repaire the ruines where the wall was downe. As they were wholly employed about this businesse, Q. Antonius sent from the Pretour, came toward them: who, after hee had reprooved and rebuked their wilfull obstinacie, and made remonstrance unto them, that the Romanes had more care and regard than they themselves of the citie, that by continuall assaults and batteries it should not utterly be destroyed: and how if they would be reclaimed and forgoe their outrageous folly, he would make them this offer, That they should yeeld under the same condition and in those very termes, as afore-time they had submitted to C. Livius when they came under his protection: At the hearing

E of that, they demanded and had five dayes space to consider of the matter: during which time they made meanes to receive some aid from Antiochus; but after their embassadors whom they dispatched to the king, had made relation, That there was no succour to be expected from him; then they set open their gates, having articulated and capitulated beforehand, that no outrage by way of hostilitie should be exercised & committed upon them. As the Romanes entered into the city with banners displayed, the Pretour declared with a loud voice, That his will and pleasure was they should be spared, forasmuch as they had yeelded. Whereat the souldiours on all hands set up a great cry, That it was an intollerable shame that the Phocæans (who were never true and loyall confederates, but alwayes dogged and malicious enemies) should goe away so scotfree, and not suffer for their sinnes. At which word (as if the Pretour had given them a signall of ransacking) they ran into all parts of the citie to rife and spoile. Aemilius at first stayed them what he could and reclaimed them againe, saying, That it was not the manner to sacke cities rendered by composition, but such as were forced and woon by assault; and even those also were at the disposition of the Generall and not of the souldiours. But seeing that they in their angrie mood of revenge, and covetous desire of goods, were of more power than the respective reverence rence of his person, his qualitie and commandement; hee sent out beaules and trumpeters G throughout the city, charging all persons of free condition whatsoever, to repaire before him into the market place, to the end, that no vilany and outrage might be done upon their bodies. And so the Pretor did his best to perform his word and promise, in whatsoever lay in his power: for he restored unto them their city, their lands, & their own laws. And for that the winter approached, he made choise of the two harbors of Phocæa to bestow his ships ther for the winter time.

Neere about that time, the Consull having passed beyond the borders of the Adrians and Maronites, received newes, that the kings navie was defeated at Myonesus, and Lyfimachia furnished of the garrison: and this latter tidings was more acceptable and pleasing unto him, than the other of the navall victory; and especially, when they came thither: where in very truth the city (plenteously stored with all sort of victuals, as if they had been provided of purpose against the coming of the army) received them courteously; whereas they made no other account, but to endure extremity of want and painful travel in besieging thereof. There they abode some few daies as it were in campe, untill such time as their carriages and sickly persons of their traine might reach unto them; such as they had left behind in all the forts and castles of Thrace, wearied with long journey and enfeebled with divers infirmities. When all were come and well refreshed and recovered, they put themselves againe in their journey, and marching through Cheronefus, they came to Hellespont: where, finding all things in readines for their transporting (such was the industrious care and diligence of king Eumenes) they passed over without trouble and molestation into the peaceable coasts of their allies and friends, without empeachment of any person, notwithstanding some ships arrived in one place, and some in another. And this was the thing that much contented the Romanes and mightily encouraged them, to see they had so free passage into Asia, which they made full reckoning would have been a matter of great difficultie and trouble. After this, they encamped and made their abode a certain time neere Hellespont, by occasion of those daies which happened then to be, wherein the Salij used to daunce with their scutchions called Ancilia; during which time they made scruple of conscience to take any journey [untill those Ancilia were bestowed againe in the temple of Mars.] By reason of which daies, P. Scipio also withdrew himselfe apart from the armie upon a more strict regard of conscience and religion, which touched him neerer than other, because he was himselfe one of the Salij, and was the cause that the army stayed behind and came not forward to overtake the campe.

And even then there happened to come unto the camp from Antiochus, one Heraclides a Biantine, having in charge to treat as touching a peace: and good hope he conceived to obtain the same with ease, by reason of the long abode and stay of the Romanes in that one place: of whome hee had looked for no other, but that as soone as they had set foote in Asia, they would have marched apace straightwaies against the kings campe. Howbeit this course he tooke, not to goe directly unto the Consull before he had spoken and conferred with Scipio, (and in deed such direction and charge he had from the king himselfe) in whome he had reposed his greatest hope: for besides his magnanimitic and noble courage, as also the satietie of glory and honour, whereof already hee had his full, (great inducements unto the king that hee would bee easily wrought and made most pliable to hearken after peace) all the world knew full well how soberly he had carried himselfe in his victories, first in Spaine and afterwards in Africke: and more than all this, a sonne of his was captive in the said kings hands. But where, when, and by what chance he was taken prisoner, writers agree not no more than in many things els. Some say, that in the beginning of the warre, he was beset and enclosed round within the kings ships, at what time as hee sailed from Chalcis to Oreum. Others write, that after the Romane army was passed over into Asia, hee was sent out in espiall with a troupe of Fregellane horsemen to view and discover the kings campe: and when the kings Cavallerie made out to charge upon them, hee made hast to retire, and in that hurrie his horse fell with him, and so hee and two other men of armes with him, was surpris'd, taken, and brought to the king. But this one thing is for certaine knowne, that if there had beene sure and firme peace betweene the king and the Romanes, nay if there had beene familiar acquaintance and hospitalitie betweene him and the Scipios, this young gentleman could not possibly have had more friendly entertainment, nor beene more kindly intreated, liberally used, yea and honorably regarded than he was. For these causes the Embassadour attended the coming of Scipio; and so soone as he was arrived, presented

A sented himselfe unto the Consull, requesting that hee might deliver his message and be heard. Whereupon in a frequent assembly he had audience given him, and thus hee spake: Whereas (quoth he) there have beene divers and sundry embassages passed to and fro as touching peace, and no good as yet done; I lay this for a ground and assure my selfe now to speed, because the former embassadours hitherto have effected and obtained nothing: for in all those treaties and disputations the question was about Smyrna, Lampfacus, Alexandria, Troas, and Lyfimachia, which is in Europe. Of which cities, the king my master hath already quit Lyfimachia, to the end you should not say, that he hath any one city at all within Europe: and as for those other in Asia, he is ready to surrender them also; yea and all the rest whatsoever, which the Romanes would recover out of the kings hands and dominions, in regard they had sometime sided and taken part with him. And for the charges which the Romanes have defraied about this warre, the king will be willing to disburse and make good the one moitie unto them againe. And thus much spake he concerning the articles and conditions of the peace. The rest of his speech behind, was bestowed in advertising and putting them in mind of the alternative revolution of this world and the affaires thereof; that as they should use their owne good fortune and prosperity with measure and moderation, so they ought not to presse down others in their adversity; but hold themselves contented within the bounds and limits of Europe, and that was a dominion sufficient (a man would thinke) and exceeding great: considering this, that it is an easier matter to win one thing after another by way of conquest, than to hold and keepe them all together when they are won. To conclude, if the Romanes were minded to dismember any part from Asia, so they would make an end once, and limit out the same within certaine precincts without any further doubt and difference, the king for the love of peace and concord, would suffer the Romanes in their immeasurable desire and appetite, to surmount and outgoe his temperance and moderation. But those matters which the Embassadour supposed were of great importance and effectuell to obtaine peace, the Romanes made a pish at it, and lightly regarded: for they judged it but meet and reason, that the king should discharge all the expences they had been at in this warre, considering through his default it first arose: also that he ought to withdraw his garrisons not only out of Ionia and Æolis: but also, like as all Greece hath beene made free and delivered, so the Greeke cities likewise in Asia ought to be enfranchised and set at liberty: which possibly might not be unlesse Antiochus were disleized of the possession of all Asia on this side the mountaine Taurus. The Embassadour perceiving well, that there was no reason to be had in the assembly, assayed privately to sound and to win the heart and good will of Scipio, according as hee had in charge from the king. And first this way he went to worke and said, That the king was minded to send him his sonne againe freely without rancome: then (ignorant as hee was both of Scipio his nature and the manner of Romanes) hee promised him a mighty masse of gold, yea and to be made equall companion in the government of the whole kingdom (the kings name and royall style onely reserved) in case he would be an instrument and meanes to effectuate peace. To these motives and offers Scipio returned this answer, That you neither know the Romanes all in generall, nor my selfe in peticular unto whom you were sent, I lesse marvell, seeing you are altogether ignorant of the state of him who hath sent you hither. For if yee had meant to have sought for peace at our hands, as of men who were in care for the doubtfull event and issue of the warre, yee should have held and kept Lyfimachia still, for to have empeached our entrance into Cheronefus, or else yee should have made head against us in Hellespontus, and staid our passage into Asia: but now seeing yee have graunted passage into Asia, and suffered your selves not onely to be bridled and curbed, but also to bee yoked, and like beasts to beare and draw too; since I say there is no remedie but ye must endure to be under our subjection, what equall and indifferent meanes of treatie is there left for you? Now, as concerning my sonne, I will accept it as a great present, and becomming the munificence and liberalitie of a king, in case hee send him to me againe. As for the other matters, I pray God I be never driven in regard of mine estate, to have that need: for surely I carrie a mind that will never find the misse and want thereof. And for these great offers that the king maketh unto mee, hee shall find me thankfull unto him, if it please him for any private benefit unto mee done, to require at my hands a private favour and pleasure againe: but as touching the State and publicke weale, he shall pardon me; I will neither receive ought from him, nor bestow any thing upon him. And all that I can doe for him at this present, is to give him good and faithfull counsel. Goe your waies therefore and tell him from me, That his best course is to abstaine from war, and not to refuse any condition of peace whatsoever. But G all this nothing moved the king, who made reckoning that any hazard and fortune of war would bee good and safe for him, since that there were lawes imposed upon him already, as if hee had been quite vanquished and overcome. Whereupon, without any more parle of peace for this time, hee bent his whole mind and employed his studie about provision and preparation for warre.

The Consull having given order for the execution of all his plots and designes, dislodged from thence, and marched first to Dardanum, and after to Rhœteum: the inhabitants of both which citties came forth to meet him upon the way in great multitudes. From thence hee went forward to Ilium, and encamped in a plaine under the very walls: then hee entred into the towne, and ascended up into the castle, where he offered sacrifice unto Minerva, the patronesse of that cittie. The Ilians entertained them with all shew of honour, as well in deed as in word, acknowledging that the Romanes were descended from them, and the Romanes againe were as joious and glad to see the place of their first originall and beginning. From thence they removed, and the sixth day after arrived at the head or spring of the river Caicus. Thither also Eumenes the king (who at first assaied to bring his fleet backe from Hellepontus, to winter before Elæa, and afterwards, when he could not for certaine daies double the point of Leçtos, by reason of the contrarie winds, went a land) because he would not faile but bee present at the beginning of these great affaires, made hast the next way with a small power to the campe of the Romanes. From the campe he was sent backe to Pergamus, to give order for purveyance and provision of victuals: and after he had delivered out corne to those whom the Consull had appointed to receive it, he returned againe to the same leaguer. The Consull his purpose and intent was to be provided aforehand of victuals sufficient for many daies, and together in one traine to go against the enemy, before the winter surprised them.

Now the kings campe lay about Thyatira: where Antiochus hearing that P. Scipio was carried sick to Elæa, sent certain embassadors of purpose, to present and deliver his son againe unto him. At which present of his, he tooke not only great contentment in his spirit, as a father might doe for receiving his deere son, but much easement also and comfort to his sicke bodie. After he had satisfied himselfe at length with much embracing of his son, Yee shall (saith he) recommend me unto the king your maister, and tell him from me, that I thanke him most heartily, and that I have no good thing at this time to send to him again, but only this, That I advise him to take heed that hee enter not into the field to give battell, before hee hath heard for certaine, that I my selfe am returned to the leaguer. Vpon relation hereof, Antiochus albeit hee was in campe sevenie thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse and above strong (which puissant power otherwhile animated, and fed him with the hope of good issue of battell) yet mooved with the authoritie of so great a personage as Scipio was, in whome hee reposed his whole refuge against all doubtfull events of the fortune in warre, hee retired backe, and passed over the river Phrygius, and pitched his campe about Magnesia neere unto Syulum. And fearing, least (if he should bee minded to make long stay and abode there) the Romanes would assaie to force his defences, he cast a trench, sixe cubites in depth, and twelve in bredth; and this trench hee environned with a double banke and course of strong stakes and pales, and upon the inward circuit and enclosure he opposed a mure with maine turrets, for the more easie empeachment of the enemy, when hee should passe over the trench. The Consull supposing the king to bee about Thyatira, marched continually, and upon the fifth day came downe into the plaines of Hircania. And when hee understood, that the king was dislodged and departed thence, he followed him by the trackes, and on this side the river Phrygius encamped foure miles from the enemy. Where about a thousand horsemen shewed themselves (for the most part * Gallogrecians, some Dacians, with certeine archers on horsebacke of other nations entermingled among them) who in great hast having passed over the river, charged upon the corps de guard of the Romanes. At the first they put the Romanes to some trouble, finding them out of order and array: but as the skirmish grew hotter and continued longer, and the number of the Romanes soone increased, (by reason their camp was so neere to yeeld them succours) they of the kings side beeing now wearied and not able to make their part good against so many of them, began to retire: and certain of them before they could take the river, were overtaken by those that followed the chase, and killed outright. For two daies after they stirred of no hand, for neither the one nor the other went over the river. The

A third day after the Romanes all at once passed over, and encamped about a mile and an halfe from the enemies. But as they were pitching their tents, and busied about fortifications and defences, three thousand chosen horsemen and foot together from the kings campe, came upon them with a great trouble and affray. The number of them that were in guard, was lesse a good deale; howbeit of themselves alone, without calling to helpe and aid the souldiours from their worke about the fortification and defence of the campe, they not onely at first received the charge with equall valour, but also afterwards, as the fight increased, put the enemies to flight, when they had killed some hundred of them, and taken prisoners almost as many. For the space of foure daies next ensuing, both armies stood embattelled on either side before their campe. And upon the fifth day the Romanes advanced forth into the middle of the plaine. Antiochus came not forward with his ensignes, insomuch, as the hindmost were not an hundred foot off from the trench. The Consull perceiving that he fell off and would no battell, called a counsell the next day, to bee advised and resolved what hee were best to doe, in case Antiochus would not be fought withall. For considering that the winter approached, the souldiours were either to lie in the field under their tents, or els if they minded for the winter season to retire unto their garison townes, the warre must be put off untill the next summer. Now the Romanes never made so small reckoning of any enemy as of him. Whereupon, throughout the whole assembly they called upon the Cos, with one voice to lead forth to a battell out of hand, and take the souldiours whiles they were in this heart, readie if the enemies would not come out into the field, to passe over ditch and rampier, and breake into the campe amongst them; making account, that they were not to fight with so many thousands of enemies, but rather to make a slaughter and butchery of so many beasts. Whereupon Cn. Domitius was sent to discover the way, and to view the place where was best entring upon the trench and rampier of the enemies. After he had brought certaine relation of all things, it was thought good the next morrow to approach neer unto their campe: and on the third day the ensignes were displayed forth into the midst of the plaine, and they began to raunge the armie in battell array. Antiochus likewise supposed it was not expedient to lie off and haile any longer, for feare least in refusing still to fight, hee should either abate the courage of his owne men, or increase the hope of his enemies, and therefore came abroad with all his forces, and advanced so farre forward from his campe, that it appeared well he meant to fight. The Romane armie stood embattelled in one manner of forme, as well for men, as munition and armour: for of Romanes there were two legions, and of Latine associates as many, and every legion consisted of five thousand foure hundred. The Romanes put themselves in the main battell, and the Latines kept both the points. The Hastati were placed with their ensignes formost in the vaward. After them the Principes in the middest, and the Triarii in the rereguard. Without this complete battell thus marshalled, the Consull set to the right point the auxiliarie souldiours of Eumenes, mingled together with the targatiers of the Achæans, to the number almost of three thousand, whom he raunged equally afront, and beyond them more outward he opposed about three thousand men of armes; whereof eight hundred were sent from Eumenes, the rest were the Cavallerie of the Romanes. Without all these in the utmost place, he put the Trallians and Candiotes, who in all made up the number of five hundred. As for the left wing, it seemed to need no such succours, by reason it was flanked with the river and high steepe bankes, howbeit in that side there were planted foure troupes of horsemen. Thus you see all the forces that the Romanes had besides two thousand Thracians and Macedonians medled and blended together, who followed as voluntaries, and were left for the guard of the campe, and sixteene Elephants; which they bestowed in the arrereguard for the defence of the Triarii. For, over and besides that they were not like to hold out against the kings Elephants, which were in number sixtie and foure, you must consider that those of Africke are not able to match them of India, say they were in number equall: either because in bignesse the Indians exceede the other (as in truth they are much greater by ods) or surpasse them in courage and stomacke. But the kings armie was composed of divers nations, different as well in armes as in souldiours. Hee had of Macedonians sixteene thousand footemen, heavily armed after their manner, called Phalangia; these made the maine battaile, and in the front stood divided in tenne squadrons, parted and severed one from the other by two Elephants placed betwene. Withinforth behind the foremost, the battaile was displayed in two and thirtie rankes of souldiours. This was the strength of the kings armie, and as in other respects, so especially in regard

gard of the Elephants surmounting aloft over all the souldiours, represented to the eye a fearful G and terrible sight. For besides that they were high and loftie of themselves, their crested head-stalls with plumes upon them, their turrets upon their backs, and in every turret foure men standing in glittering armour, besides the maister and governor himselfe, made the apparence and shew far greater. On the right wing, he placed close unto the Phalangites, a thousand and five hundred horsemen of the Gallogreeks: unto whom he adjoined three thousand lances in compleat armour, mounted upon bard horses, and those men of armes they themselves called Cataphracti. To these were added another wing of a thousand horsemen, which they named Agema. Medes they were, elect and chosen men, together with more horsemen of the same region, mingled of many nations one with another. Close unto them in the arrieregard was set a troupe of sixteene Elephants. On which side also in a wing somewhat farther drawne out stood H the king his owne cohort, bearing the name of Argyraspides, by occasion of the silvered shields which they bare. After them followed 1200 Dacians,* archers on horseback. Then, three thousand footemen lightly armed, and composed partly of Candiot, and partly of Tralleans, in number almost equall, and 2500 Mysians attended upon the archers. And the utmost side and taile of that wing was guarded with foure thousand Cytician slingers and Elymean archers forced together. On the left wing likewise there stood fast unto the Phalangites aforesaid 1500 horsemen Gallogracians: and two thousand Cappadocians armed after the same manner, sent from king Ariarathes. Then the Auxiliaries of all sorts 2700; besides three hundred lances in compleat harness upon barbed horses armed at all pieces, and 1000 other horsemen. As for the I Cornet of the kings, it was more lightly armed, as well themselves as their horses: but their setting out and furniture otherwise, all one. And these were Syrians for the most part, with Phrygians and Lydians together. Before this cavallerie went the chariots of foure wheeles, and drawn by as many horses, armed with sharp and trenchant hookes like sith blades, and the camels called by them for their swiftnesse Dromedaries. Upon these were mounted the Arabian archers, who also were armed with keene swords foure cubits long, that sitting as they did so aloft, they might notwithstanding reach their enemy. Then after these were set another multitude equall to that in the right wing, whereof the foremost were certaine horsemen called Tarentines, and after them 2500 Gallogracian horse. Likewise of Neocretians a thousand: and of Carians and Cilicians one with another 1500 armed alike. As many Trallians: and three thousand K targuatiars. These were Pisidians, Pamphylians and Lycians: and last of all the succors in the arrieregard of Cirtians and Elymeans, in like number as they that were placed in the right wing, with sixteene Elephants also distant a pretty way asunder. The king himself in person had the conduct of the right point of the battaile, and ordeined Seleucus his sonne and Antipater his brother sonne to commaund the left. The maine battaile in the mids was committed to the leading and governance of three capitaines, to wit, Minio, Zeusis, and Philip the maister of the Elephants. There was a certaine mist arose in the morning, and as it waxed farther day gathered aloft into thick clouds, and made the weather darke: besides by the South wind it resolved into a small drizzling raine, which wet and drenched all. This did little harme to the Romanes: but contrariwise, was much hurtfull to the kings side. For, albeit the aire was dim and darke, yet by reason that the Roman battailons tooke up no great compasse of ground, they could for all the aire L was overcast, discerne from one end to the other: and the moisture that fell, dulled nothing at all (to speake of) either the swords or javelins of them that were heavily armed: whereas the kings armie being embattailed so broad, had much ado, and hardly could see from the middle of the maine battaile to the wings of each hand, and much lesse discerne from one skirt and flanke of the battaile to the other. Moreover, the dropping weather slugged their bowes, softened their slings and loupes of their darts. Their sithed chariots also, wherewith Antiochus made full account to breake the arrayes of his enemies, turned to the disorder and fright of themselves. Now these chariots aforesaid were in this manner armed for the most part: certaine sharpe M pikes they had about the spire-pole, bearing forward from the spring-tree, ten cubits in length, like unto hornes, with which pointed pikes they would pierce through whatsoever they encountered. Also at each end of the said spring-tree there were two blades stood out, the one of just and even heighth with it, the other lower and bearing downward to the ground: the former was devised to cut through whatsoever came neere the side therof, the other to reach and teare them that were fallen to the earth, or came under the chariot. Semblably at

A at both ends of the axeltree without the nave of the wheele there were two such like hookes fastened and bended divers wayes. These chariots thus armed the king had placed in the front of the battaile as we said before, because if they had bene set either in the middle or the reregard, they should have bene driven through their owne battailons. Which Eumenes perceiving, one that knew well enough the manner of that kind of service, and how dangerous it was, in case a man rather frighted the horses than charged them directly by ordinary warlike force: hee commaunded the Candiot archers and slingers, with some other horsemen that launched darts, to runne forth not thick in troupes, but skattring as farre asunder as they could, and at once from all parts to discharge their shot upon them. This forerunning tempest (as it were) so maddened the horses partly by galling, wounding, and pelting them with darts, arrowes, and stones, B discharged from all sides at them, and partly with the strange and uncouth noyse which they made, that suddenly as if they had bene unbridled and without their geeres, they flang out every way, and ran at random: which violence of theirs the light armed souldiers, the nimble slingers, and swift running Candiot avoided easily with a trice. And the horsemen withall following the chase, redoubled the fright and hurrey amongst the horses, yea and the dromedarie camels too; which likewise were unruly and set a madding: and this hurlyburley, the manifold cries from the multitude all about, helped well forward. Thus were the chariots chased in the middle of the plaine betwene both armies: and when these vaine buggs were once rid out of the way, then the alarme and signall was geven on both parts, and they charged one another in battaile wise. But as foolish an occurrent as that was, it caused anon a discomfiture C and overthrow indeede. For the auxiliaries and aids behind-foorth which were placed next unto them, terrified with the feare and affright of the chariots, fled, and left all naked and dis-furnished even to the bard horses. In such sort, that when the arrieregard was put in disarray, the Romane Cavallerie entred upon the foresaid horse, and charged them so hotely, that part of them was not able to endure the first shock and encounter: some were put to flight, others were borne downe with the poise and waight of their harness and weapons. And presently thereupon the whole left wing of the battaile began to recule. And after that those succours were disbanded and in disaray which were betwene the Cavallerie and the heave-armed footemen called Phalangites, the disorder and feare went as farre as to the mids of the maine battaile: where so soone as the ranks and files were broken and shuffled together, by D reason of the entercourse of their owne fellows among them, they had no use at all of their long pikes, which the Macedonians call Sarissæ. Then the Romane legions advanced their ensignes, and launched their darts against those disordered ranks huddled together. The very Elephants that were placed betwene, nothing troubled and affrighted the Romane souldiers, as who had bene used in the Affricane warres, both to avoid the furious rage of those beasts, and also either with their javelins to flanke and hurt them overthwart, or else if they could come neere unto them, to hough them and cut their ham-strings with their swords. By this time now was the front of the maine battaile defaied and beaten downe: and the arriere-gard behind environed and cut in peeces: when as the Romanes withall, might perceive their owne fellows flying from the other part, and heare the crye of those that were affrighted, E even almost as farre as to their campe. For Antiochus keeping the right wing, seeing in the left point of the Romanes no other defense (by reason that they trusted upon the river) but onely foure troupes of horsemen, and those also by drawing themselves close to their fellows, to leave the banke side voyd and naked, charged that point with his Auxiliaries and lances upon bard horses, and not onely made head and pressed them afront, but from the river also set a compasse and enclosed them; and flanked that wing so long, untill the horsemen were first discomfited, and then the footemen next unto them, were put to flight, so as they ranne amaine toward their campe. M. Amylius a colonell, and sonne to M. Lepidus, who a few yeeres after was created the High-Priest, had the charge of the campe: he with his whole guard came forth, and where as he saw them to flee, there he opposed himselfe, and F first commaunded them to stand, and afterwards to returne to battaile, checking and rebuking them for their beastly feare, and shamefull running away. Moreover, hee proceeded to minatorie words, saying, That in case they would not be ruled by his direction, they should runne headlong like blind beetles upon their owne mischiefe: and in the end, he gave a signe to his owne company, for to lay upon the foremost of them that thus fled, and caused the multitude that followed, with dint of sword and drawing blood of them, to turne their face G againe upon the enemies. Thus the greater feare overcame the lesse: for seeing danger before and behind, first they staid their flight, and afterwards returned to the battell. Aemilius also with his owne regiment (which for the guard of the campe had 2000 tall and valiant men in it) withstood the king right stoutly as hee followed hore in chace upon those that fled. Moreover, Antalus (brother of king Eumenes) in the right point of the battaile, who at the first charge had discomfited the left wing of the enemies, perceiving that his fellows fled in their left point, and hearing a great stirre about the campe, came to the rescue in good time with 200 horsemen. Antiochus, when he saw them turne head againe whose backs ere-while were toward him, and begin to fight afresh, & perceived withall a number comming against him, both out of the camp and also from the battell, turned his horse head and took himselfe to flight. By this means the Romans obtained the victory of both the wings, & passed directly to the rising of the kings camp over the dead bodies, which in the main battell most of all were massacred & lay by heaps: where the strength and flower of the hardiest men ranged close together and the weight besides of their heave armor, would not give them leave to flee away. The horsemen of Eumenes were the first of all others: that pursued the enemies: after them, the rest of the Cavallery followed the chace all over the fields, and ever as they overtook any of the hinmost, killed them out-right. But that which troubled and plagued them in their flight more than all besides, was their chariots, elephants and camels, intermingled among them as they fled; for so much as being once disbanded and put out of their ranks, they tumbled one upon another like blind men, and were brused and crushed under the beasts feet which came sunning upon them. Great execution also there was committed in the campe, yea and more in manner than had beene in the medley: for the first that fled, and those that fought in the vaward, tooke their way most of them to the campe, and upon assured confidence of this multitude, the garrison within fought more valiantly, and held out longer in the defence of the hold. The Romans being thus stayed in the gates, and kept out of the rampier which they thought verily to have forced and won at their first assault, when they were once at length broken through and gotten in, made the more bloody carnage amongst them, for very anger and despight that they had kept them forth so long. It is said, that there were slaine that day about fittie thousand footmen and 4000 horsemen, 1200 taken prisoners, together with fittie elephants with their governours. A number of the Romans were hurt and wounded, but there dyed not in the field above 300 footmen and 24 horsemen: and of the regiment of king Eumenes not past five and twentie. And for that day verily, the conquerours after they had ransacked only the tents and pavillions of their enemies, returned to their owne camp with great plentie of pillage: but the next morrow they fell to spoiling the bodies of the dead and gathered their prisoners together. And upon this victory, there came embassadours from Thyatira and Magnesia unto Syphilus, for to surrender and deliver up their cities.

Antiochus, who fled accompanied with some few, having gathered unto him many more in the way, who rallied themselves unto him, arrived at Sardis about midnight with a small power of armed men; and hearing that his sonne Selenus and some other of his friends were gone before to Apamea, himselfe also at the fourth watch departed thence with his wife and daughter toward Apamea; after hee had committed the charge of guarding the citie Sardis unto Zeno, and appointed Timon governour of Lydia. But the inhabitants of the said city and the garrison souldiours within the castle, despised these governors, and by generall consent addressed embassadors unto the Consull.

Much about the same time also, there arrived embassadors from Tralles, and Magnesia (which standeth upon the river Mæander) and likewise from Ephesus, to yeeld up their cities. For Polyxenidas (advertised of the issue of this battaile) had abandoned Ephesus; and having sailed with the fleet as farre as Patara in Lycia, for feare of the Rhodian ships which rid in guard within the harbour of Megiste, disbarked and put himselfe ashore, and with a small company marched by land into Syria. The cities of Asia were surrendered into the hands and protection of the Consull, and submitted to the people of Rome. By this time now was the Consull possessed of M Sardis, and thither repaired unto him Scipio from Elæa, so soone as ever hee could endure the travell of journey.

At the same time there came an herald from Antiochus unto the Consull, who by the mediation of Scipio, made request and obtained thus much, That the king might send his oratours and

A and embassadours unto him. And after few daies Zenis (who had beene governour of Lydia) together with Antipater (Antiochus his nephew, or brothers sonne) arrived. Who first dealt with king Eumenes and communed with him, whome (by reason of old jarres and quarels) they supposed verily to be the greatest enemy unto peace, and that he would never abide to heare thereof: but him they found more reasonable and enclining to peaceable tearmes, than either the king their master or themselves hoped & looked for. So by the means of Scipio & him together, they had access unto the Consull; who at their earnest petition, granted them a day of audience in a frequent assembly, thereto declare their commission & what they had in charge. Then Zeus (quoth Zenis) we are not so much to speake and deliver ought of our owne selves, as to aske and be advised of you (Romans) what course to take and by what meanes of satisfaction we might expiate and satisfie the trespass of the king our master, and withall obtaine grace and pardon at your hands who are the victours? Your manner alwayes hath beene of a magnanimous and haucie spirit, to forgive kings and nations by you vanquished: How much more then is it decent and becoming you to doe the like; yea, and with a greater mind and more generous and bountifull heart, in this victory and conquest, which hath made you LL. of the whole world? For now it behooveth you to lay downe all debate and quarrell with mortall men here upon earth, and rather like the immortall gods in heaven, to provide for the good and safety of mankind, and them to pardon and forgive. Now was it agreed upon before the coming of the embassadours, what answer to make unto them; and likewise thought good it was that Africanus should deliver the same, who spake by report in this wise: Wee Romanes, of all those things which are in the power of the immortall gods, have that measure which they vouchsafed to give us: as for heart and courage which dependeth upon our owne will and mind, wee have borne (and ever will) the same without chaunge and alteration in all fortunes: neither hath prosperitie raysted and lift it up aloft, nor adversitie debased and put it downe. For prooffe hereof, I might produce your friend Annibal as witnesse, to say nothing of others, but that I can report mee to your owne selves. For after wee had passed over Hellefpont, even before wee saw the kings campe and armie, when the hazard of warre was indifferent, when the issue doubtfull and uncertaine, looke what conditions of peace wee then offered on even hand, and whiles wee were equall one unto the other, and stood upon tearmes of advantage, the same and no other wee present unto you at this time, now that wee are conquerours. For beare to meddle with him Europe: depart wholly out of Asia, so much as is on this side Taurus. Moreover in regard of the expenses defraied in this warre, yee shall pay fittie thousand Talents of silver, according to the computation of Eubœa: five hundred in hand, two thousand and five hundred at the assurance & making of the peace, by the Senat and people of Rome; and a thousand talents yeerely for twelve yeeres next ensuing. Also yee shall make payment unto Eumenes of foure hundred talents, and the remnant behind of the corne and graine which was due unto his father. And when wee have contracted and concluded these covenants, to the end that we may rest assured that ye will performe the same, we demand for a gage and sufficient pawning that yee deliver into our hands twentie hostages, such as wee shall like well of and chuse. And for as much as wee can never bee persuaded that the people of Rome shall enjoy long peace there, where Annibal is, we demand above all things to have him in our custodie. Also you shall deliver into our hands Tboas the Ætolian, the principall authour and firebrand of the war with the Ætolians, who caused you to take armes against us, upon assurance that he gave you of them; and likewise armed them upon the trust they had in you, Nem, together with him you shall deliver Mnasimachus the Acarnanian, together with Philo & Eubulidas the Chalcidians. The king shall now contract peace in worse estate than he was, by reason that he maketh it later than hee might have done. But in case he hold off still and delay, know he well thus much, That the roiall majesty and port of kings is with more difficultie abated and taken down from the highest pitch and degree unto the midst; than from that mean estate, cast downe headlong to the lowest. Now these embassadours were sent from the king with this charge, to accept of any articles of peace whatsoever. And therefore it was decreed that embassadors should be directly sent to Rome. The Consull devided his armie into garisons for to winter, some in Magnesia upon the river Mæander, others in Tralleis & Ephesus. After few daies the hostages above said, were brought to Ephesus from the king, and embassadours also came who were to goe to Rome. Eumenes likewise went to Rome at the same time that the kings embassadours: and there followed embassages more over over of all the States of Asia.

Whiles the affaires of Asia passed thus in these tearmes, there were two pro-consuls returned out of their severall provinces, both in manner at once, upon hope to obtaine triumph, to wit, Q. Minutius out of Liguria, and M. Acilius out of Aetolia. When the exploits were heard, as well of the one as the other, Minutius was flatly denied triumph, but Acilius had it graunted with great consent of all men: who rode into the cittie triumphant over king Antiochus and the Aetolians. In which triumph there were carried before him two hundred and thirtie ensignes, three thousand pound weight of massie silver in bullion; of coine in Atticke Tetradrachmes one hundred and thirtene thousand; in Cistophores two hundred and eight and fortie thousand. In plate many vessels engraved and chased, of great weight. Hee carried also in pompe the implements of the kings house all of silver, with rich & sumptuous apparrell. Also crownes of gold five and fortie presented unto him by cities associate: besides all sorts of rich spoiles; and moreover hee led divers noblemen prisoners, and last of all sixe and thirtie captaines, as well Aetolians as those who served under the king. As for Democritus, a great commander of the Aetolians, who some few daies before had broken prison & escaped by night, he was by his keepers that made fresh suit after him, overtaken upon the banke of Tybris: but before he could be attached by them, he fell upon his owne sword, and ran himselfe through. Onely there wanted those that should have followed after his charriot; otherwise the triumph had beene magnificent and stately, both for the pompous shew, and also for the honour and renoume of exploits atchieved. But the joy of this triumph was blemished with heave tidings out of Spaine, of a losse and overthrow received of the Portugales, in the countrey of the Vascetanes, neere the towne Lyco, under the conduct of L. Aemilius: where sixe thousand and one hundred of the Romane armie were left dead in the place, and the rest discomfited and beaten backe into their campe; which they had much ado to defend and hold, and were forced to retire in manner of flight, and by long journeys recovered the peaceable quarters of their friends. And this was the newes out of Spaine.

From out of Fraunce the embassadours of the Placentines and Cremonians, were brought by the Pretour L. Aurunculeius into the Senat: where they made much mone and complaint for default and want of inhabitants, whereof some were devoured by the edge of the sword in wars, others consumed by maladie and sicknesse, yea, and certaine of them departed out of their colonies for wearinesse they had of the Gauls their neere neighbours. Whereupon the Senat ordained C. Lelius the Consull to enroll, if hee thought so good, sixe thousand families, for to be distributed among those Colonies aforesaid: and L. Aurunculeius the Pretour to create three Commissaries called Triumvirs, for the conducting of the coloners and inhabitants aforesaid. And created there were, M. Attilius Serranus, L. Valerius Flaccus the sonne of Publius, and L. Valerius Tappus the sonne of Caius.

Not long after, against the time of the Consuls election which approched neere, C. Lelius the Consull returned out of Fraunce to Rome, and he not onely by vertue of the act of the Senat made in his absence, enrolled certaine Coloners to supplie the want in Placentia and Cremona, but also proposed a bill, and according to it the LL. of the Senat ordained, That two new Colonies should be conducted into the land that appertained to the Boians. And at the very same time were letters brought from L. Aemilius the Pretour, as touching the battell at sea fought neere to Myonessus: which letters also gave intelligence, that L. Scipio the Consull had transported his armie into Asia. For joy of the said navall victorie, there was ordained a solemn procession for one day: & in regard that the Romane armie was then first on foot in Affricke, the said procession continued another day with supplication to the gods, that this voiage might turne to the prosperitie and joy of the Commonweale. And the Consull was enjoined at each procession and supplication, to sacrifice twentie head of greater beasts. After this ensued the solemn assembly for the chusing of Consuls, which was holden with great strife and contention. For M. Aemilius Lepidus stood to be Consull, a man growne into an ill name, and hardly spoken of among the people, in that hee had left his government and charge in Sicilie for this occasion, and businesse onely, without making suite unto the Senate and craving leave so to do. Together with him were competitor in election, M. Fulvius Nobilior, Cn. Manlius Volsus, and M. Valerius Messala. But Fulvius was chosen alone, because the rest had not sufficient voices of the Centuries, and he the morrow after nominated Cn. Manlius for his colleague, and gave the repulse unto Lepidus; for Messala kept silence and held his tongue. Which done, the Pretours were elected namely,

A namely, the two Quinti Fabij, the one surnamed Labio, the other Pictor (who had been consecrated that yeere for the Flamin Quirinall) M. Sempronius Tuditanus, Sp. Posthumius Albinus, Lucius Plantius Hypseus, and L. Babius Dives.

During the time that M. Fulvius Nobilior and Cn. Manlius Volsus were Consuls, Valerius Antias writeth, That there was a rise rumour raised at Rome, and held for certaine, that L. Scipio the Consull, together with P. Africanus, were called forth to a parley with king Antiochus, as touching the enlargement and deliverie of young Scipio the sonne of Africanus, and by that meanes were both of them arrested and taken prisoners: also that when these cheefe commanders were under arrest, the kings armie incontinently advanched against the Romane campe, the same was surprisid and forced, and the whole power of the Romanes utterly defeated. By occasion whereof, it went currant also, that the Aetolians began to looke aloft, refused to obey, and shooke off their alleageance: also that their princes and cheefe States were gone into Macedonie, Dardanie, and Thrace, to levie & wage auxiliarie forces: moreover, that A. Terentius Varro, and Marci Claudius Lepidus were sent out of Aetolia, from A. Cornelius the Propretour, for to report these newes at Rome. Last of all, to make up the tale, he addeth and saith, that the Aetolian embassadours among other things, being examined in the Senate about this matter, and demanded of whom they heard and understood that the Romane Generals were taken prisoners in Asia by king Antiochus, and the whole armie overthrowne answered directly, That they had advertisement thereof by their owne embassadours, who had beene with the Consull. But because I find no other authour besides him that maketh mention of this rumour, I dare not, for any thing that I can say of my selfe, report it for a certaine truth, ne yet omit it as a meere fable or lowd lie.

The Aetolian Embassadours were permitted to come into the Senat house; and being induced (in regard of their owne cause and present condition) to confesse a truth, and as humble suppliants to crave pardon and forgiveness either for their fault, or mesprission and error; began with a bedroll of their favours and good turnes done unto the people of Rome, yea and in manner to upbraid the Romans with the valour which they shewed in the warre against Philip. But with their arrogant and insolent language they offended the eares of the Senatours: and by ripping up old matters done and past (time out of mind and utterly forgotten) they handled their owne cause so, & brought it to this passe, that the LL. of the Senat began to call to mind much more harme and mischief contrived and practised by that nation, than kindnesse & courtesies received at their hands; inso much as the Aetolians having need of their mercie, incurred their heave displeasure, and provoked them to anger and hatred. Being asked this question by one of the Senators, Whether they would referre & submit themselves to the censure and judgement of the people of Rome? and likewise of another, If they could be content to hold them for their friends or enemies whome the Romans so accounted? they answered not a word: and thereupon immediately were commaunded out of the Court: and presently all the Senat began to crie out with one voice, That the Aetolians were all still for king Antiochus, depending wholly & only upon that hope, and therefore they ought to war against them as undoubted enemies, and to take downe and tame these proud and fellonious hearts of their owne. Over and besides all this, another thing there was that incited and kindled the stomacks of the LL. against them, because at the very same instant when they seemed to require peace at the Romanes hands, they warred against Dolopia and Athamania. So there passed a decree of the Senat, (& the same was moved by M. Acilius, who had vanquished and subdued Antiochus and the Aetolians) That they should void that very day out of the city of Rome; and within fiftene dayes next ensuing, out of all Italy. A. Terentius Varro was sent to safe-conduct them on the way: and this warning they tooke with them, That if ever after there came any Embassadour from the Aetolians, without the warrant, license, and permission of the chiefe Generall who governed that province, or not accompanied with a Romane Legate, they should be taken and reputed all of them for no better than enemies. In this manner were the Aetolians dismissed and sent away.

After this the Consuls proposed unto the Senat, as touching the government of the provinces. And thought good it was, that they themselves should cast lots for Aetolia & Asia. Vnto him whose lot it should be to governe Asia, was appointed that armie which L. Scipio had. And for to furnish it fully out and make up the decayed bands, hee was allowed to have foure thousand footmen of Romanes with two hundred horsemen: of allies that were Latines, eight thousand foot, and foure thousand men of armes, and with these forces he was to make war against Antiochus.
The

The other Consull had assigned unto him that armie which was in Ætolia: and libertie he had for supplie of that broken armie, to levie the same number of citizens and allies that his companion in government had enrolled. To the same Consull was graunted a commission likewise to set in order, furnish, and take with him those ships which the former yeere were prepared and rigged, and not only to make warre with the Ætolians, but also to saile over into the Isle Cephalenia. And withall, the said Consull had in charge to returne home to Rome for the election of Magistrates, if he might so do conveniently with the good of the Common-weale. For besides the annuall Magistrates (who were to be chosen one under another) it was agreed upon, that Censors also should be created. But in case his affaires detained him, that he might not returne in person, then he was to give advertisement, and signifie so much to the Senate, that he could not possibly be present at the time of the foresaid Election. So Ætolia fell by lot to M. Fulvius, and Asia to Cn. Manlius. Then the Pretours fell to draw lots for their provinces. Sp. Posthumius Albinus had the jurisdiction over citizens and forreiners both: M. Sempronius Tuditanus governed Sicilie: and Q. Fabius Piclor the Quirinnall Flamin, Sardinia: Q. Fabius Labeo was admiral of the navie at sea: and L. Plautius Hypseus was allotted to the rule of high Spaine, and L. Baebius Dives of the lower. For Sicilie one legion was appointed, together with that fleet which was already in that province. Also there was order given that the new Pretour should impose two tenthes of come upon the Sicilians, and send the one into Asia, and the other into Ætolia. The like imposition was laid and exacted upon the Sardinians, and the said come to be conveyed into the same armies that the Sicilian come was. A supplie was graunted unto L. Baebius for Spaine of a thousand Rom. footmen, and fiftie horse: besides fixe thousand Latine foote, and two hundred horsemen. Vnto Plautius Hypseus for the higher Spaine were allowed a thousand Romane footmen: with two thousand Latine allies, and two hundred horse. Besides these supplements, both the provinces of Spaine were allowed each of them one legion. The magistrates and governours of the former yeere continued still in place of command for one other yeere, to wit, C. Lelius with his armie, and P. Annus also the Propretor in Hetruria with those forces which were in the province. M. Tuccius likewise in the Brutians countrie and Apulia.

But before the Pretours went forth into their provinces, there happened a variance betweene P. Licinius the Arch-Pontife or chiefe Prelate, and Q. Fabius Piclor the Quirinnall Flamin, like unto that which sometime fell out betweene L. Metellus and Posthumius Albinus. For at what time as Posthumius the Consull was upon his departure and journey to his fleet in Sicilie, together with C. Lucilius his colleague, Metellus the Archbishop for the time being, kept him back upon occasion of certaine sacrifices to be celebrated: semblably, when as Fabius the Pretour would have gone into Sardinia, P. Licinius the high priest detained him. Much strife and hard hold there was hereabout, as well in the Senate house, as before the people. Inhibitions passed to and fro. Cautions and pledges were distrained: fines they imposed one upon anothers head: the Tribunes were called unto on both sides for to interpose their authoritie, and they appealed both unto the people. In fine, religion, and the regard of holy rites tooke place, and caried it cleare, and the Flamin was enjoined to obey the chiefe priest: and by order and expresse commaundement from the people, all fines were taken off and forgiven. And when the Pretour for very anger and spite that he was debarred from his province, would have surrendered and resigned up his government, the LL. of the Senat impeached and terrified him by their absolute authoritie, and ordeined that he should minister justice, and exercise civill jurisdiction betweene aliens. After that the musters were ended within few dayes (for many souldiours were not to be levied and enrolled) both Consuls and Pretours tooke their journey into their provinces. After this, there arose a bruit concerning the occurrences and affaires in Asia, blowen and spread abroad I wot not how, nor from what head and author it proceeded: but after few dayes, there came certaine messengers with letters from the Generals of the Romane armie, sent of purpose to the citie, which caused not so great joy presently ensuing upon the fresh feare aforelaid (for why, they were no more afraid of Ætolia by them already conquered) as dashed quite the same and opinion that went of Antiochus, whom in the beginning of this warre they supposed would have bene a dangerous enemy unto them, as well in regard of his owne puissance, as for that he had the direction and conduct of Annibal in the warre: howbeit, they thought good to alter nothing, either as touching the sending of the Consull into Asia, or diminishing his forces, for feare they should have warre with the French.

Not

A Not long after M. Aurelius Cotta, a lieutenant of Scipio, came to Rome with the embassadors of king Antiochus, and likewise king Eumenes and the Rhodians. Cotta reported & declared first in the Senat, and afterwards in a full assembly of the people (by order & commaundement from the LL. of the Counsell) what affaires had passed in Spaine. Whereupon ordeined it was, That there should be holden a solemne proceffion for 3 daies together: and order was given, that 40 head of greater cattaille should be killed for sacrifice. This done, the Senat assembled for to give audience to king Eumenes, first above all other matters: who briefly in few words having rendered thanks to the LL. of the Senat, for that they had delivered him and his brother from siege, and protected his realme against the wrongs and outrages offered by Antiochus: also having testified his joy by way of gratulation for their prosperous & fortunat affaires achieved both by land and sea: namely, in that they had discomfited & put to flight K. Antiochus, and driven him out of his campe that he could not keepe the field; and withall disseized & dispossessed him first of Europe, and afterwards of all that part of Asia which lieth on this side the mountain Taurus: he concluded and knit up all with this, That as touching his owne demerits and employments about their affaires, he had leiffer they tooke knowledge by their owne generals, captains and lieutenants, than from his mouth. They all approved wel of this speech of his, and willed him to speak boldly without bashful modestie in that case, What he thought in equitie & reason the Senat & people of Rome was to yeeld unto him by way of just recompense: assuring him that the Senat would do it more willingly and liberally (if possibly they could) according to the worth of his desert. The king answered thus again, That in case any other had made him that offer, & given him the choise of his own rewards, he would gladly have used the counsaile of that right honorable court of the Roman Senat (so he might have the meanes & libertie to aske their advise) to the end that he would not be thought, either to exceede measure in covetous desire, or passe the bounds of modestie in craving a recompense. But now considering they are themselves to give that reward, much more reason it is that their munificence & bountie to him and his brethren should be referred to their own arbitrement & discretion. The LL. of the Senat were nothing moved at this language of his, but urged him stil to speake himself in his own cause. And after a certaine time that they had strived a-vie, the LL. in courtesie & kindnes, the king in modestie & shamesfastnes, yielding one unto the other reciprocally, in such amiable and mutuall manner as hardly can be expressed, Eumenes departed out of the temple. The Senat persisted nevertheless in their resolution, saying it was very absurd & undecent that the king should be ignorant upon what hopes he was come, and what he purposed to make suite and petition for: and himself must needs of all others know best what was meetest & most expedient for his own kingdom: yea, and was far better acquainted with the state and affaires of Asia than the Senate was. And therefore no remedie, but he must be called again, and compelled to declare and deliver what his will, desire and mind was to have. Hereupon the king was brought back into the temple by the Pretour, and urged to speake. Then at last, My LL. (quoth he) I would have persisted still in silence, but that I knew that anon ye wil call the embassage of the Rhodians in place; and that after audience given unto them, I must neither will nor choose but make some speech of necessity: and verily with so much more difficultie shall I speake, because their demaunds will be such, as if they would seeme not only to require nothing prejudiciall and hurtfull unto me, but also (which more is) matters little or nothing pertinent to themselves. For plead they will and maintaine the cause of the cities in Greece, saying, They ought to be set free and at liberty: which being once obtained, who can make doubt, but ready they will be to withdraw from our obeisance, not only the cities which shall be freed, but also those which have bene homagers and tributaries unto us of old time? yea and will keepe them as subjects in very deed and wholly at their devotion, whome being thus bound and obliged to them by so great a benefit, they call by the name of Associates, and would make the world beleve they repute for no other? Yet forsooth (I wot well) in affecting and aspiring to this so great power and puissance, they will carry it so cleanly and make semblant, as though this in no wise touched and concerned them: but that it is besitting you alone, correspondent and answerable to other former deeds of yours. But be yee well advised, and let not their glosing words deceive you; take you heed (I say) that yee goe not with an uneven hand nor beare your selves equally, whiles ye depresse and abase too much some of your allies, in promoting and advancing others beyond all measure; and about all, beware that they who have lift up their speare and borne armes against you, be not more kindly intreated & in better condition,

The Oration of King Eumenes
in the Senate

condition, than your loving friends and faithfull confederates. For mine owne part, in all other things I would gladly be thought of every man, rather to keepe within my compasse; yea and yeeld somewhat of my right whatsoever it is, than to strive too much in the maintenance and holding thereof: but in the question of your friendship, of my affection and love towards you, and of the honour which shall come from you, I cannot endure with patience that any one should out-goe and surmount my selfe. This I account the greatest inheritance left unto me by my father, the first (of all those that inhabit in Greece and Asia) who was entertained in your amitie, and continued in the same alwaies most fast, most constant and sure even to his dying day: who not onely shewed sound affection and loyall heart unto you, but also was in person employed in all your warres which yee made in Greece, as well on land as at sea; assisted and aided you with all kind of provisions, in such sort, as none of all your allies besides was any way comparable or came neere unto him. And finally, as he earnestly exhorted the Boeotians to accept of your society, he sunk down, swooned in the very assembly, and not long after yeilded up his spirit and dyed. His footsteps have I troden, and followed his good example. For affection verily and studious desire to honour you, I could not have more than he had (for I suppose it was impossible to surpass him therein:) but in kind pleasures, effectuell services, offices, courtesies, and favours, to surmount and goe beyond him; the goodnes of fortune, the occasion of times, king Antiochus and the warre in Asia, have ministred ample and sufficient matter unto me. Antiochus (king of Asia and part of Europe) gave me his daughter in marriage, and with her endowd me with the repossesseion of those cities which had revolted from us. Hee fed me moreover with great hopes of encreasing my dominion in time to come, if I would have sided with him against you. I will not glory and vaunt of this, that I have done nothing to offend and displease you: I will rather rehearse those pleasures and services which are becoming the ancient amity and friendship betweene our house and you. In forces as well for land as sea, I have friended and helped your Generals in such wise, as I forbid all your allies besides to doe the like: furnished them I have with victuals on the land, with provisions at sea. In all the battailes and conflicts by ships (which were many and in sundry places) I was present in person. I underwent all travails, I adventured all perils, and no where favoured my selfe and thought much of my paines: nay, that which is the greatest calamitie and misery that followeth wars, I was besieged, and endured it: enclosed I was and shut up within Pergamus, to the utter hazard of my life and of my realme and royall dignity. And after I was delivered from that daunger and the siegeraied, albeit Antiochus of one side and Selencus on another, lay encamped about the principall fortress of my kingdome, I quit mine owne affaires and laid all aside, to come with my whole fleet into Hellespont, and there to meet with L. Scipio your Consull, and to aid him in transporting and waisting his armie into Asia. And when your forces were passed over, I never afterwards departed from him: there was not a Romane souldiour more resiant ordinarily in your campe than my selfe and my brethren. No expeditions, no rodes, no exploit of horse service was there without me. In battaile have I stood on foot and guarded that quarter which the Consull hath appointed me to keepe. I will not say (my LL.) what one person there is that hath done so good service for you in this last warre as I my selfe, and who is any way comparable unto me: nay, I dare make comparison with all states and princes whatsoever, whome you esteeme and honour so highly? Masanissa before he was your friend, was your professed enemy: hee came not to you with his aids in the time of his upright fortune, and whiles his kingdome flourished in good estate; but when he was banished, driven out of his kingdome, and turned out of all, he fled into your campe, accompanied onely with a small troupe and corner of horsemen: Yet nevertheless, because he stood fast to you and bare himselfe in all loyalty, and shewed his prowess in your behalfe against Syphax and the Carthaginians in Affricke, you not onely restored him to his fathers kingdome, and placed him again in the royall throne, but you laid unto his dominion the richest part of the realme of Syphax, and made him the most puissant and greatest prince of all the kings in Affricke. What reward then, nay what honour are we worthy to have at your hands; wee (I say) who never were enemies, but ever friends? My father, my selfe, my brethren, have borne armes in your quarrell by land, by sea, not only in Asia but farre from our own home and native soile, in Peloponnesus, in Boeotia, in Aetolia, during the warres with Philip, with Antiochus, with the Aetolians. What recompence demaund you then? may some man say. Forasmuch as (my LL.) you will have it so, and it is your pleasure that I should speake my mind, good reason

A reason it is that I obey. This shall stand for all; if you have dispossessed Antiochus of all on this side Taurus, with this intent, to hold those lands your owne selves; none better than you, and whom I would wish rather to bee my neighbours and to confine upon mee: neither can I beleeve, thinke me, of any meanes in the world more important to the safetie and strength of my kingdome. But in case your purpose be to depart and to retire your forces from thence, I dare be bold to say, That of your allies, (and put them all together) there is not one more worthy than my selfe to have and hold that which you have woun by conquest. But an honourable deed it is and magnificent, to set free and deliver cities out of thraldome and servitude. True, and I my selfe am of the same opinion; provided alwayes, that they have attempted nought by way of hostility against you. But in case they have taken part and sided with Antiochus; how much more standeth it with your wisdom, nay with equity & reason, to be respective of your allies who have so well deserved at your hands, than to regard your enemies. This oration of the king much pleased the LL. of the Senat, and soone it was seen by their countenance that they would deale bounteously and liberally with him, yea and gratifie him in what they might. Then audience was given to a brieve embassage of the Smyrneans, who by occasion that some of the Rhodians were absent, came betweene and delivered their message. Highly were these Smyrneans commended, in that they chose rather to endure all extremities, than to yeeld themselves unto king Antiochus. Then the Rhodians entred in place: and the chiefe man of their embassie, after he had declared the first occasion and beginning of the amitie which they had with the people of Rome, and shewed withall the good deserts and services which the Rhodians had performed in the warres, first against Philip and then against Antiochus, went on and spake as followeth. Right honourable, there is nothing more difficult and troublesome unto us, in all the businesse that we have in hand than this one thing, that there is some variance and matter to be debated betweene us and Eumenes, the only K. of all others, with whom especially every one of us in private, and (that which toucheth us more) our city in publicke, doth entertaine the bond of friendship and mutuall hospitalitie. Howbeit no repugnancie is it in our affections (my LL.) but even the course of this world and nature it selfe (the mightiest thing of all) which disjoyneth us and causeth difference: this maketh us (being men free born) to defend and maintaine the freedom of all others: this is it, that mooveth KK. to be desirous for to have all in servitude and subjection under them, and at their commaund. But howsoever it is, our modestie and the reverent regard we have of the kings person hurteth us more, than either the debating of our cause with him is otherwise difficult unto us, or the deciding thereof like to be intricate and troublesome unto you. For in case it were so, that you could not honour and reward a king, your ally and friend, for his good service done in this warre (for recompence whereof yee now sit in consultation) by no other meanes, unlesse yee deliver free citties into his hands, to serve in bondage; then were it hard for you to resolve; for feare least either yee should send away a prince (your friend and confederate) without guerdon and honour; or seeme to chaunge that laudable enterprise of yours which you have begun, to stain and blemish your glory now (which you have acquired by the warre against Philip) with reducing so many citties and states into servitude. But your happie fortune causeth you right well of this difficultie and necessitie, that you need not feare either to empaire your credite and favour with your friends, or to endamage your reputation and honour among men. For (the gods be thanked therefore) you have achieved a victory, no lesse rich than glorious, and sufficient (if I may so say) to discharge all your debts, and set you cleare with all the world. For Lycæonia, Phrygia both the great and the lesse, whole Pisidia, Chersonesus, and in breefe, all the confines of Europe are under your dominion. Of all which provinces, if you lay but one by (which you will your selves) for king Eumenes, you shall mightily enlarge and amplifie his kingdome: but, give him all, you will make him egall to the greatest princes and monarchs that are. You see then by this, that you may recompence and enrich your allies out of the conquests gotten by warre, and nathelesse hold on your good custome that you have begun, remembering alwaies what title you pretended first in your warre with Philip, and now lately with Antiochus: considering withall, what you did then after Philip was vanquished, and what is required and expected at your hands, now: not so much because you have used it already, as for that it was meet and decent you should so doe. Many causes there bee (and those colourably just & lawfull) to enter into arms: one pretendeth this, another that; some in right of lands and territories, others of villages; some lay claime to towns and cities, others challenge the possession.

possession of ports and havens, and one tract or other of the sea coasts. As for you, before you G enjoyed these things, you desired them not: since then yee have now compassed the whole earth, and are LL. of the world, you cannot possibly cover the same any more. Warred you have and fought for honour and glorie, in the sight of all the nations of the earth, who now this long time behold and regard your name and empire, no lesse than they doe the gods immortall. And I wor not well, whether those things which we hardly come by, be not with more difficultie holden and kept afterwards, than they were purchased. You undertooke to deliver and rid out of the servitude and oppression of kings, and to maintaine in libertie, a most auncient and noble State, renowned for their worthie and famous acts, and right commendable for their singular learning and knowledge in all sciences. For your honour it is, having once received all this nation into your safeguard and protection, to defend and preserve the same for ever. And thinke not, that those cities onely H are more Greeke which are built and seated upon the auncient soile of Greece, than their colonies which have bene drawne from them, and in times past went from thence into Asia: for the change of aire and place hath wrought no alteration, either in the nature and complexion, or the manners and fashions of the people. As for us, endeavoured we have to doe better and better, and each citie hath entred into an honest contention and religious emulation to outgo and surmount their forefathers and first founders in all good arts and commendable vertues. There be many of you who have been in Greece, many have visited the cities of Asia, and setting aside this onely, That we are farther distant and remote from you; there is no difference and ods betwene us and them. The Massilians, whom (if possible it had bene, that an inbred temperance might be altered and overcome with the strength and nature, as it were, of the soile) so many wild, barbarous, and untamed nations, environning them round about, would have made cruell and fa-vage long before this day; wee heare say and understand to bee in that request and estimation (by good right, and their desert) among you, as if they dwelt in the very middest and heart of Greece: for not onely they retaine still the very naturall language of their own, they keepe them to their old fashion of apparell and attire, and carrie the same port in their gesture and countenance, but also above all things they have kept and observed their customes, their manners, their lawes and naturall disposition pure and entire, notwithstanding the frequent commerce with those, in the middest of whom they converse and inhabite. Well, the mountaine Taurus at this day is the limit of your empire and siegnorie one way: and therefore whatsoever lieth betwene you and that bound, you must not thinke it remote, but looke how farre your armes have reached, so farre let K your lawes and jurisdiction extend. Let Barbarians, who know no other lawes than lords hefts, have their kings, since they take such pleasure in them, and much good may they do their hearts: as for the Greekes, they must doe as they may, and are not (wee confesse) in so good case as you, howbeit they carrie with them as brave a mind as your selves: and the day hath been, when they were monarchs, when they conquered by their owne sword a mightie dominion, and held the same when they had it. Now they are content with that empire where it now is, nay, they wish it may remaine and continue there for evermore, where it is settled at this present. They shall bee well apaid, and thinke they are well, to maintaine their libertie by your force of armes, since they have no meanes of their owne to defend the same. But (will some man say) there be certaine cities L that held a side and banded with Antiochus: I answer againe, So were others before that took part with Philip, so there were that combined with Pyrrhus, as for example the Tarentines: and to say nothing of other States, which I could name and rehearse, even Carthage it selfe enioieth freedome, and is governed by her owne lawes. Consider then my LL, what a precedent therein yee have set downe to your owne selves, and how yee ought to confinne and uphold so good an example. You must resolve to denie that unto the covetous desire of Eumenes, which you would not graunt to your owne ire against the Carthaginians, which they had most justly deserved.
 And as for us Rhodians, with what valour and loialtie wee have served and aided you, as well in this warre, as in all others which yee have had in those parts and quarters, wee report unto your owne selves, and leave it to your judgement. And now in time of peace, wee here present unto you that counsell, which if you will accept and approve, all the world will believe and say, That you have borne yourselves more honourable in the usage, than in the achievement of your victorie. This Oration seemed to fit well the greatnesse and majestie of the Romanes.
 When the Rhodians had done, the embassadours of Antiochus were called in. Who after the usuall and stale manner of those that crave pardon, confessed the king was in fault, and humbly besought

A besought the LL. of the Senate to have more regard of their own accustomed gracious clemencie, than remember the kings trespassse, who had paid sufficiently for it already: and finally, that they would ratifie and confirme by their authoritie, the peace graunted by L. Scipio their L. Generall, according to those conditions, which by him were capitulated and set downe. So both the Senate thought good to admit of that peace, and also within few daies after the people gave their assent and established the same. And this accord was solemnly confirmed in the Capi-toll, with the kings Procurator or agent, to wit, Antipater, the cheefe of the embassage, who also was Antiochus his brothers sonne. This done, the other embassages of Asia had audience, & were all dispatched with this one answer, That the Senate would send ten deputies or commissioners, according to the auncient custome of their auncestours, to heare, decide, and compose all the affaires of Asia. But the finall conclusion of all should be this, That whatsoever pertained to the dominion of Antiochus on this side the mountaine Taurus, should be assigned to king Eu-menes, excepting the countries of Lycia and Caria, so farre as the river Maender, all which must lie to the signorie of the Rhodians. As touching the other cities of Asia, which had been tributaries to Antiochus, those also were to pay tribute to Eumenes: but such as were sometime homagers to Antiochus, those should bee enfranchised and remaine free. The ten Commissioners whome they appointed were these, to wit, Q. Minutius Rufus, L. Furius Purpureo, Q. Minutius Thermus, App. Claudius Nero, Cn. Cornelius Merula, M. Iunius Brutus, L. Aurunculeius, L. Acnilius Paulus, P. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Aelius Tuberus. These men had plenarie power and full commission to take order and determine as they thought good, in all the occurrences that were presented in C these affaires. But they had direction from the Senate, as touching the principall points: Imprumis, That all Lycaonia and Phrygia, both the more and the lesse, that Mysia, with the kings cha-ces and Forrests, that the cities of Lydia and Ionia, except those that were free at the day of the battell fought with Antiochus, and expressly by name Magnesia neer Sipylus, together with Candia, which is called Hydreia, and all the territorie of Hydreia lying toward Phrygia; moreover, Telmessus and the forts of the Telmessians, reserving only that territorie which belonged to Pto-lomeus the Telmessian: that all these countries, I say, and citties above written, should bee given and graunted to king Eumenes. Item, That the Rhodians should bee enfeofed in Lycia, without the foresaid Telmessus, the forts and territorie, appertaining sometime to Ptolomeus Telmessius: which parcels, I say, were reserved as well from Eumenes, as the Rhodians. Item, To the Rhodi-D ans was graunted that part of Caria, which lieth beyond the river Maender, neere unto the isle Rhodes, together with the townes, villages, fortresses, and lands bounding upon Pisidia; except those townes which were free the day before the battell with king Antiochus in Asia. The Rhodians, when they had given thanks to the Senate for these gratuities, were in hand with them for the citie Soli in Cilicia: they alleaged, that they likewise as well as themselves, were descended from Argos; by occasion of which confraternitie and neere alliance, they loved together as brethren by nature: in regard whereof, they made petition, that over and besides other donation, they would doe them this extraordinarie favour, as to exempt that citie also from the servitude and subjection of king Antiochus. Then were the embassadours of king Antiochus called for, and treated withall about this matter, but to no effect. For Antipater stood stoutly upon this E point, and pleaded hard, That the accord was past already, and might not be revoked or altered: and that against the tenour of the articles and covenants therein comprised, it was not the citie Soli, but all Cilicia that the Rhodians demanded; and never would they rest till they were gotten over the mountaine Taurus. Then were the Rhodians called back againe into the Senate, unto whom the LL. of the Senat, after they had made relation how earnest the kings embassadour was with them upon the point, added thus much moreover & said, That if the Rhodians deemed in very deed that the matter concerned the honor of their citie and State, the Senat would worke all possible meanes to cause the kings embassadours to relent, how stiffe and obstinate soever they stood. For this courtesie, the Rhodians thanked them much more hartly than for all the rest before, and said withall, that they would yeeld and give place to the arrogant spirit of Antiochus, ra-F ther than seeme to give any cause or occasion of troubling the peace. And so as touching the citie Soli, there was no alteration made.

Whiles these matters were thus debated and passed, the embassadours of the Massilians brought intelligence, that L. Babius the Pretour, being in his journey towards his province of Spaine, was entrapped and enclosed by the Ligurians, and many of his traine killed outright in Oooo ij the

the place, that himselfe mortally wounded fled without his listours and sergeants into Massilia, G and within three dayes left this life. The Senate upon this advertisement ordeined P. Iunius Brutus the Propretour in Hetruria, to go in person into the farther Spaine, and governe the same as his owne province: but first to leave Hetruria and the armie there unto one of his Lieutenants whom he pleased to make choise of. This decree of the Senat, together with letters from Spurius Posthumus the Pretour of the citie, was sent into Hetruria: and so P. Iunius departed as Propretour into Spaine. In which province L. Aemylus Paulus (who afterwards was a right glorious victorie of king Perseus) having the former yeere fought unfortunately, now alittle before the arrivall of this succesor gave battaile to the Lusitanians with an armie rallied and assembled in hatt, in which the enemies were put to the worfe and driven to flie. One thousand eight hundred of them well armed were left dead in the field, three thousand three hundred taken prisoners, H and their camp forced and ransaked. The bruit that went of this victorie set all matters of Spaine in greater quietnes.

The same yeere, upon the * third day before the Calends of Ianuarie, L. Valerius Flaccus, M. Attilius Serranus, and L. Valerius Tappo, the three Triumvirs, by order from the Senate, planted a Latine Colonie at Bolonia; and three thousand people were thither sent to dwell. Every gentleman by calling that served on horseback had 70 acres of ground set out unto him, and the rest of the coloners sitie apeece. The land divided thus among them had bene conquered from the Boians in Gaule: and those Gaules first had dispossessed the Tuskans of the same.

This yeere there were many men of marke and name that sued to be Censors: and this competition as if it had not bene of sufficient importance it selfe to move matter of debate, I was the occasion of a contention and variance much greater. The competitor was these, T. Quintus Flaminius, P. Cornelius Scipio, the sonne of Cneus: L. Valerius Flaccus, M. Porcius Cato, M. Claudius Marcellus, and M. Atilius Glabrio, even he who had vanquished Antiochus and the Ætolians at Thermopylae. To this man last reherfed the peoples favour and affection most inclined, by reason of many congiaries and largesses which he had given amongst them in publick, by means whereof many a man was obliged and bound unto him. The rest, being so many and nobly descended withall, tooke it to the heart, and could not endure that such a person as hee newly risen and come up, and a gentleman of the first head, should be preferred before them: whereupon P. Sempronius Gracchus, & C. Sempronius Rutilius, two Tribunes of the comminatie, K commended action against him to answer at a day, laying to his charge, that there remained a surplusage of the kings monie and other pillage gotten in the camp of Antiochus, over and above all that which he either caried and shewed in triumph, or brought in accompt into the citie chamber. Many and sundrie depositions there were to prove this enditement, as well of lieutenants as of colonels. But M. Cato above all other witnesses was most noted: whose great authority acquired in the whole course of his life (which he had passed hether to in all upright conversation & constant gravitie) was much empaiied and discredited now, with his white robe that he bare on his back. He being produced as a witnes, depofed & gave evidence, that he had seene certaine plate as well gold as silver, among the rest of the pillage found in the kings camp, which he never could set eye on in all the triumph abovesaid. In the end, Glabrio because he would bring some displeasure particularly, and most of all upon Cato, said he would give over his suite L for the Censorship, since that there was another competitor as newly come up as himselfe, (whereat the Nobles indeed tooke indignation inwardly, although they said nothing) who pursued the cause so against him, even with incredible and inestimable perjurie. Well, a fine was set upon his head of a hundred thousand asses. And twise was the matter traversed, whether the mulct should be taken off or paid. But when the third day was come, and the partie in trouble (Atilius) had quite surceased to sue for the dignitie, the people would not give their voyces as touching the payment of the fine abovesaid, and the Tribunes also themselves let fall their action. So T. Quintus Flaminius, and M. Claudius Marcellus were created Censors.

About the same time the Senate sate without the citie in the temple of Apollo, in regard of L. Aemylus Regillus, who had vanquished the Admirall of king Antiochus in a battaile at sea; M where he had audience given. And when he had declared what exploits he had done, namely, against how puissant Armadaes of the enemies he had fought, and how many ships of theirs he had either sinke or taken; the LL. of the Counsell with one generall consent and accord, graunted unto him a navall triumph. And hee triumphed upon the Calends of February. 11

A In which triumph, there were borne in shew fiftie crownes save one, of beaten gold: but nothing that store of coine as such a royall triumph required, onely there were caried in pompe 34700 Attick tetradrachmes, and 132300 cistophores. After this (by decree of the Senate) there were processions celebrated in consideration that L. Aemylus Paulus had brought his affaires in Spaine to happie issue.

Not long after L. Scipio came also into the citie, who because he would not be inferiour to his brother in the honorable addition of his name, caused himselfe to be surnamed Asiaticus. He discoursed before the Senate, and in the publick audience of the people, as touching his worthie acts. Divers there were who construed the thing thus and said, That the warre was greater in name than difficult unto him in the managing: for with fighting one onely memorable battaile, the matter was atchieved and ended, but the glorie indeed of that victorie was begun unto him and prepared for his hand at Thermopylae. But if a man should judge hereof aright, and according to a truth, the battaile at Thermopylae may rather be accompted an exploit against the Ætolians than king Antiochus. For what great forces I pray you had king Antiochus there in field of his owne? But in the last battaile smitten in Asia, the whole power and puissance that he had in all Asia, stood there to be seene, yea and all the aids and succours which he could levie out of the nations as farre as to the utmost parts of the East. Great cause therefore they had both to render much praise and thanksgiving to the immortal gods, in as ample manner as possibly they could devise (for vouchsafing unto them so brave a victorie as it was, and the same with such ease and expedition) and also to graunt a C triumph to the Generall. He triumphed upon the last of Februarie, even the very day that maketh the leape yeere. This triumph of his was much greater than that other of his brothers, in regard of the magnificent pomp and shew represented to the eye: but if one call to mind the substance of the things themselves, and compare the dangers, the conflicts and difficulties of the one warre with the other; there is no more equalitie betweene them, than if a man should in comparison of captain with captain, set Antiochus to match with Anniball. He shewed in triumph two hundreth thirtie foure field ensignes and standers: hee caried before him the portraicts of two hundreth thirtie foure townes and cities: a hundreth thirtie four teeth of yorie: two hundreth thirtie foure crownes of gold: 237300 pounds weight of silver: 234000 Attick tetradrachmes: 331070 cistophores: 140000 Philip-peecees of gold: of silver plate, D and that was all graven and chased, a thousand foure hundred twentie foure pound weight: of golden plate as much as weighed 1024 pound. Moreover there were led before his chariot thirtie two great commanders; either gouvernors of provinces under the king, or attendant in his court. Every souldier serving on foot, had given unto him * 25 deniers: every centurion had * 15 sili. 7 d. ob. double so much; and the gentlemen or knights triple. After the triumph done, the souldiours had their pay double in money, yea and the portion of corne likewise was doubled. He had moreover given them alreadie a double proportion in Asia, presently upon the end of the battaile. A yeere it was almost after his Consulship expired ere he triumphed.

And much about one and the same time, both Cn. Manlius the Consull entred into Asia, and Q. Fabius Labeo the Pretour repaired to the fleet. Moreover the Consull had worke enough and wanted not matter of warre within Fraunce. The seas were quiet after that Antiochus was defeated and subdued: Fabius therefore studied which way to take, and how to employ himselfe and his forces at sea, because he would not be thought and reputed idle in his province: so hee resolved at length to put over with his fleet into Crete. Now they of Cydon warred at that time against the Gortynians and the Gnosians: and the voice went that there was a great number of Romanes and Italians, captives, living in slavery and bondage in every quarter of that yland. Hee looked therefore from Ephesus and set saile for Candie, and so soone as he was arrived and set a land, hee sent his messengers about to the cities, willing them to abandon their armour and surcease from warre, and to search and seeke up throughout all their cities and territories those captives and prisoners abovesaid, and to bring them to him: and moreover, to send their E embassadours or agents, with whom hee would treat concerning the affaires that in common touched as well the Candiots as the Romanes. The ylanders made small regard of these his messages: and unlesse it were the Gortynians, there was not one that delivered the captives. Fabius Antias hath recorded, That out of the whole yland there were rendered to the number of foure thousand; because the inhabitants were frighted with threats of warre. And that this was 11 the cause why Fabius although he performed no other exploit, obtained of the Senat a navall triumph. From Crete, Fabius returned to Ephesus; from whence hee fet forth three ships to the coast of Thracia, and commaunded that the garrisons of Antiochus should quit Aenus and Maronia, to the end, that those cities likewise might be set free and enfranchised.

THE XXXVIII. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the eight and thirtieth Booke.

Marcus Fulvius the Consull besieged the Ambracians in Epirus, and received them upon composition to mercie. He subdued Cephalonia, vanquished & brought under his subjection the Etolians, and made peace with them. The Consull Cn. Manlius his colleague, overcame the Gallogreeces, the Tolistobogians, the Tectosages, and the Trocmians, who were passed over into Asia under the conduct of Brennus: the only people that within the mountaine Taurus yielded not obedience to the Romanes. Their first beginning and rising is set down: also the time when as they seized first of those places which they hold. Here is recounted also the example of the rare valour and chastitie of a woman, who being the wife of a certaine king of the Gallogreeces, chanced to be taken prisoner: and when a Centurion had forced and abused her body, shee killed him with her owne hands. The Consuls held a sising of the citie: in which by computation were numbered 258328 souls of Roman citizens. Amicitie was contracted with Ariarathes king of Cappadocia. Cn. Manlius triumphed over the Gallogreeces, notwithstanding the contradiction of those ten Commissioners, by whose advice and assistance he had obtained the accord and alliances with Antiochus, and pleaded his owne cause himselfe in the Senate against them. Scipio Africanus was indicted, as some say, by Quintus Petilius Aferius a Tribune of the Commones: as others, by Nervius. For that he had defrauded the citie chamber of some part of the pillage which hee got from Antiochus. When the day was come that he should make his answer, hee was called up to the publicke pulpit and place of audience, and with a loud voice said unto the people: My masters, you that are citizens of Rome, This very day have I won Carthage: and with that hee ascended up into the Capitoll, and the people accompanied him thither: and from thence, because hee would avoid those hard and iniquitous coses of the Tribunes, and be no more troubled with them, he retired himselfe to Liturnum, as it were into voluntary exile: and whether he ended his dayes there or at Rome, it is not well known: for his tombe and monument was to be scene in both places. L. Scipio Asiaticus (the brother of Africanus) was accused of the same crime of embezzling the publicke treasure and robbing the common-weale, and thereof condemned: but as he was led to prison, and should have beene laid up in bonds and yrons, Tib. Sempronius Gracchus a Tribune of the Commones (who before-time had bene an adversarie and enemy unto the Scipiores) interposed himselfe and rescued him: and for that pleasure done, hee took to wife the daughter of Africanus. When the Pretour sent the treasures of the citie to seize upon all his goods for the use of the citie, so farr off they were from finding any remnant or token of the kings riches and money, that they could not meet with as much as would satisfie the fine wherein hee was condemned. And when his kinsfolke and friends had contributed and raised an infinite masse of money for him, hee would not receive the same: and as much onely was redeemed and bought againe, as might serve for his necessities to find and maintaine him.

During the time of the warres in Asia, the affaires also in Aetolia were in small rest and quietnes: which troubles arose first from the Athamanians, who after that Aminander was dispossessed of his kingdome, were held in obedience by garrisons under the captaines of king Philip; and they bare themselves so proud, insolent, and outrageous in their government, that the Athamanians found a great misse of Aminander, and were desirous of him againe. Now remained hee at that time as a banished person in Aetolia; and upon letters received from his

A his owne nation (containing the state wherein Athamania then stood) he conceived some hope to recover his crown again: wherupon he sent the messengers back to Argitheia (the chiefe city of Athamania) unto the principall men of the countrey, with this credence, That if he might be assured of the affection & love of the people, he would procure the aid of the Etolians & come into Athamania, accompanied with the elect personages (and those are the counsell of that nation) and Nicander the Pretor. When he understood and perceived that they were prest and redy to doe him all service, he advertised them eiesoones upon what day he would enter with his armie into Athamania. At the first there were but foure persons that conspired against the Macedonian garrison, and these tooke every one fixe more unto them for to be assistant in the execution of their complot. But afterwards, trusting but little in this small number of their adherents and complices (who indeed were fitter to keep counsell and conceale a matter secretly, than to performe any action valiantly) they adjoynd unto them the like number unto the other: so as now they were two and fiftie in all; and they devided themselves into foure companies. One crew of them went to Heraclea; another to Tetrachylia, where as the kings treasure was usually kept; a third sort tooke their way to Theudoria; and the fourth to Argitheia. But they all agreed upon this course: to hold themselves quiet and peaceable at their first coming, and to converse in the market place of these cities, as if they were come about some particular negotiation of their own: and upon a certain day appointed, to set to it at once, and raise the whole multitude for to expell the Macedonian garrisons out of their fortresses. Now when the day was come and Aminander ready upon the frontiers with his forces of a thousand Etolians, the garrisons of the Macedonians were at one instant chased out of those foure cities aforesaid, like as it was comploted beforehand: and letters were dispatched from all parts into other cities, advising them to deliver and free themselves from the tyrannie of Philip, and to restore Aminander into his lawfull kingdome and throne of his father. Thus the Macedonians were expelled in every quarter: only the town Theium made resistance and held out some few daies against the siege, by occasion that Zeno (captaine of the garrison there) had intercepted the letters, and they that sided with Philip were possessed of the castle. But in the end surrendered it was likewise unto Aminander, and all Athamania reduced unto his obedience, excepting only the fort of Athenaeum, situate upon the marches of Macedonie.

Philip advertised of the revolt of Athamania, accompanied with a power of fixe thousand fighting men, put himselfe in his journey, and with exceeding expedition, marched as farr as Gomphi. Where he left the greater part of his forces, (for they had not been able to endure so long a journey) and with two thousand came to Athenaeum, the onely place held by his garrison to his use. And from thence, after hee had sounded the next neighbours, and soone found that there was nothing but hostilitie among them, he retired to Gomphi, and jointly with all his forces together returned into Athamania. Then hee sent Zeno before with a thousand footmen, and gave him in charge to seize upon Aethopia, a place that directly for his purpose commanded Argitheia: and seeing that his men were possessed thereof, himselfe sat him downe, and pitched his tents about a certaine temple dedicated to the name of Jupiter. There hee was forced by reason of the foule and stormie weather to stay one whole day, and the morrow after hee went forward with his armie to Argitheia. As they marched, behold they discovered the Athamanians, running from divers parts to the hil tops, which stood over the way along. They had no sooner espied them, but the foremost ensignes made stay, and all that regiment of the vaward was surprised with feare and fright. Every man began for his part to cast many doubts, and think with himselfe what should become of them, in case their companies were entered once into the valleys, so checked by those rockes abovesaid. This tumult and trouble caused the king perforce to call backe those in the forward, and to retire the same way that hee came, notwithstanding hee was very desirous (if they would have seconded him) to have made quick speed, & gotten through those streights. The Athamanians at first followed after them aloofe quietly ynough: but when they had once joined with the Etolians, leaving them behind to come upon the taile of the enemy, they spread themselves all about, and flanked them on the sides: some of them also got afore their head by the next waies which they were acquainted with, and beset the passages; inso much, as the Macedonians were so greatly troubled, that forced they were (more like men that fled in disarray, than marched in good order) to leave much of their armour, and many of their men behind, to passe over the river; and there the chase ended. From thence the Macedonians returned safely safely to Gomphi, and so forth into Macedonie.

The Athamanians and Ætolians assembled from all parts to Ethiopia for to surprise and defeat Zeno & that regiment of a thousand Macedonians which was with him. But the Macedonians reposing no great trust in that place, retired from Ethiopia, to an hill much higher & steeper on all sides, and therefore lesse accessible. The Athamanians having found out diverse avenues unto it, entorced them to forgoe that hold also. And when they were dispersed among the blind rockes, and to them unknowne, and could not readily find the way out, some of them were taken prisoners, and others slaine. Many for feare tumbled down headlong from the pitch of the cliffes, and brake their neckes, and very few escaped with Zeno to thieking. The next day after they obtained truce, untill they had committed their dead to earth.

Aminander having thus repossessed his realme, sent embassadours to Rome unto the Senate; likewise unto the Scipios in Asia (who after the great battell with Antiochus, sojourned in Ephesus.) He craved peace and pardon, he excused himselfe in that he had recovered his fathers kingdom, by the meanes and helpe of the Ætolians, and withall laid great fault and blame upon king Philip. As for the Ætolians, they departed out of Athamania, and made an expedition against the Amphiloichians, and by consent of the greater part, reduced the whole nation under their puissance and subjection. Having thus regained Amphiloichia (for in times past it appertained to their siegnorie) upon the same hope they passed over into Aperantia, which yielded also for a great part thereof, and came under their obedience. As for the Dolopians, they never belonged to the Ætolians, but unto Philip. And at the first they assembled together in arms, but understanding once that the Amphiloichians tooke part with the Ætolians, that Philip was fled out of Athamania, and that his garrison there was put to the sword, they revolted likewise from Philip, and turned to the Ætolians. Who making now full account that they were sure ynough on all sides from the Macedonians, by reason of so many nations which environned them about, they tooke knowledge (by the common bruit) of the defeature of Antiochus by the Romanes in Asia: and not long after their owne embassadours returned from Rome without hope of peace, relating withall, that Fulvius the Consull had passed the seas alreadie with an armie. Upon these newes, they were much troubled and afraid: and in this perplexitie, they induced and procured first the Rhodian and then the Athenian embassages, to the end, that by the credite and countenance of these two States, their prayers lately rejected, might have more easie access to the Senate: and with them they sent to Rome once againe the principall personages of their nation, to trie their last hope of obtaining peace; and never forecast to prevent warre, before the enemy was come welneere within their sight. Now had At. Fulvius transported his forces to Apollonia, and devised with the princes and States of the Epirotes, where to begin warre. The Epirotes advised him to assaile Ambracia, which as then was united to the Ætolians. And why? if either the Ætolians should come to the defence of the place, they had a goodly large and open plaine all about to bid them battell; or if they refused the field, and would not fight, they should find no great difficultie to assault and force the towne. For not onely there was at hand store ynough of timber and other matter to raise mouats, mantelets, and other fabrickes; but also Arethon a river navigable, very commodious to transport all necessaries unto them, runneth under the walls of the citie; and besides, the summer was a fit season for warre-service. With these reasons they persuaded the Consull to conduct his armie through Epirus. But when the Consull was come before Ambracia, hee found it was no easie peece of worke to besiege and assault the towne. This Ambracia is situate under a stonie & craggie hill, which the inhabitants call Perranthæ. The citie it selfe looketh into the West, what way as the wall reacheth toward the fields and the river: the fort and castle thereof standeth upon the hil, and regardeth the East. The river Arethon running out of Acamania, dischargeth it selfe into an arme of the sea, which beareth the name of the citie neere adjoining, and is called Ambracia. This towne, besides that it is well guarded with the river of one side, and defended with hils on the other, is fortified also with a strong wall, in circuit somewhat more than three mile about. Fulvius encamped strongly on the fields side, in two holds of a prettie distance asunder, and raised one skonce upon an high ground, opposite against the fortresse of the towne. All these places he determined to enclose within the compasse of a trench and rampier, to the end, that they who were shut up within the towne, might have no egress, and that from without forth there should bee no ingresse, for any aid and succour whatsoever. The Ætolians were assembled alreadie at Stratus by an edict from the Pretor Nicaner, incontinently upon upon the rumour that ran of the siege of Ambracia, intending fully at first to march from thence with all their forces. But afterwards, when they perceived that a great part of the citie was streightly beleaguered alreadie, and blocked with trench and rampier; and withall, that the Epirotes were encamped upon a plaine on the other side of the river, they were of advise to devide their forces in two parts. Enpolmus accompanied with a regiment of a thousand men lightly appointed, passed through the fortifications of the enemies, before they were joined and united together, and entered Ambracia. Nicaner with the rest of the forces purposed at the first by night to assaile the campe of the Epirotes, considering that the Romanes could not easily succour them, by reason of the river running betweene. But afterwards upon better advise, supposing this to be a dangerous enterprise (for feare lest the Romans should discover their march, and so intercept them that they might not retire againe in safetie) he altered his mind, & turned to the spoiling and wasting of Acarnania. Now when the Consull had made an end of all his fabrickes devised for to invest and enclose the citie, and finished his engines wherewith he meant to shake the wall, hee approached neere and gave assault in five places at once. Three batteries hee planned in equall distance asunder, and where the easiest advenue and access was from the plaine, full upon that place of the citie which they call Pyrrhæum: one over against the temple of Asculapius; and another opposite to the castle. With rams hee shooke the walls, with long poles and hookes he fetcht off and plucked downe the battlements of the walls. The oppidanes at the first were afraid to see these strange engines, and quaked to heare so terrible a noise of their walls battered: but afterwards, seeing that the wals stood uprightly beyond their expectation, they plucked up their hearts again, and with swipes weighed up either great counterpoises and weights of lead, or huge stones, then with a swinge they let them fall againe upon the rams of the enemies, or els tumbled mightie big logs of timber aloft, and so either brake them apees, or bare them downe. And as for their hookes aforesaid, they caught hold of them with yron floucks like anchors, and so drew them over the walls to the other side with a witnesse, and brake both them and their poles. Moreover they sallied out in the night upon the watch that attended their engines, issued forth of themselves in the day time, assailed the corps de guard, and put them in great feare. As things stood in these tearmes before Ambracia, the Ætolians by this time were returned to Stratus from their rodes which they made into Acarnania. And then Nicaner the Pretour conceiving some hope to levie the siege by some audacious and hardie adventure, devised that one Nicodamus should put himselfe within the towne of Ambracia with five hundred Ætolians; and appointed one certain night, and an houre also of the same night, when both they from out of the towne should assaile the fabrickes and engines of the enemy planted against Pyrrhæum, and also himselfe charge upon the campe of the Romanes at the same time, and put them in fright: supposing by this twofold alarme (especially in the night which maketh every thing more fearefull) there might be some notable act and memorable exploit done. And Nicodamus verily for his part, in the dead time of the night, having passed unscene and not descried by some of the sentinels, & by resolute force broken through the rest of the watches, passed over an arme of the river and recovered the citie, and in some measure by this meanes hardened the besieged inhabitants to adventure anything, & put them in better hope to accomplish all. And when the night appointed was come, all on a sodaine he set upon the engines, as it was before accorded betweene them. The adventure of this enterprise was much more than the effect, because there were no forces without to joyne with him; were it that the Pretour of the Ætolians was afraid to be too bould, or that he thought it was a better peece of service to aid the Amphiloichians newly recovered, whom Perseus king Philip his sonne, sent from his father to reconquer Dolopia and Amphiloichia, assailed with great force and violence. The Romanes had planned their ordenance and artillerie, as is above said, in three places against Pyrrhæum, which the Ætolians charged all at one time, but not with like preparation of means, nor with the same violence. For some came with burning & flaming firebrands, others caried tow & hurds with pitch; and faggots of drie stickes, & other like matter easie to be kindled, in such sort as all their companies shone againe with a light fire. Many of the warders they killed at the first onset, but when the alarme and tumult was heard within the campe, and the signall given by the Consull, they took armes, and ran apace out of all the gates for to rescue and defend them. In one quarter the Ætolians did their deed, and fought with fire and sword: but in the other two places after they had given the attempt, rather than began any skirmish, they retired and went their wayes. The

heate of the medly inclined wholly to one quarter, where the two captaines Eupolemus and Nicodamus, encouraged their men as they fought from two divers parts, and interteined them with an assured hope, that Nicander according to agreement would be there and charge upon the back of the enemies. This for a good while maintained the courages of the souldiours: but perceiving there was no signe appeared of their countrymen, and that they kept not touch with them, and seeing withall how the number of the enemies encreased, and themselves dis-appointed and destitute, they slaked their fight, and were not so eage upon the enemy, and in the end gave over: and having much ado to retire in safetie, were chased into the citie, after they had burnt some of the Romane engines, and slaine a few more of their enemies than there died of themselves. And surely if the service had bene followed in execution according as it was com-plotted and agreed, those devised engins no doubt might have bene destroyed, if not wholly, H yet in the part at leastwise, and that with great murder and carnage of the enemies. The Am-bracians, together with those *Ætoli*ans which were within the citie, not only gave over that nights enterprise, but ever after shewed more coldnes to hazard themselves againe, as if they had bene betrayed by their owne fellowes. Not a man would fallie forth upon the ward and watch of the enemies, but they all from their walls and turrets stood upon their guard only, and with the vantage of the place defended themselves in safetie.

Perseus advertit that the *Ætoli*ans approched Amphilochia, quit the siege of the citie which he was about to assault: and after he had only haried and wasted the territorie about it, retired from those quarters and returned into Macedonie. The *Ætoli*ans likewise were enfor-ced to depart from thence, by reason that their sea coasts were spoiled and overrun: for Pleura-tus the king of the Illyrians, was entred into the river of Corinth with a flecte of 60 barks, and with the help of the Achaean ships that lay in the rode of Patraz, invested the maritime tract of Ætolia. Against whom were sent a thousand *Ætoli*ans, who waited upon this flecte at every tunc as they doubled any reaches, and with the vantage of the short wayes and next advenues by the land, were readie to welcome them on the bankes and make head against them.

The Romanes lying still in siege before Ambracia, by battring and shaking the walls in many places, had dismantled a great part of the citie, and laid it open: howbeit, they could not enter within it. For at every breach where the wall was broken downe, they were readie to make a new countermure, and the souldiours standing upon the very ruines, served in flecte of a bulwarke. The Consull seeing he could not prevaile by open force, determined to undermine K and make a secret way in the ground into the citie; but first he covered the place where they wrought, with mantilers. For a good while the pioners were not perceived by the enemies, nor withstanding they wrought both night and day, not only digging under the earth, but also ca-sting up the mould as they went. But an huge heape of earth bearing up aloft from the rest, was discovered, and gave them within the towne to understand, what the enemies were about: and fearing least they had wrought so farre already as under their walls, and that they were at the point to make a way into the towne, they within began likewise to strike another trench just a-gainst the place covered with mantilers aforesaid: and when they had digged to that depth as the botome might be of the enemies mine, they made no words within, but in great silence laid their care too in divers places closeto the earth, herkening if haply they might heare any noise L of the pioners: and when they once had gotten an eare of them, they countermined directly against them. And long they were not about it: for anon they came as farre as to the void holow ground whereas the foundation of the wall stood upon staies and proppes, which the ene-mies had set to beare it up. Now when their works were met together, and that there was a con-tinued passage out of this trench into the mine, the pioners fitt fell to it and skuffed with their spades, shovels and mattocks, and such other tooles that they had used to worke withall: but soone after, armed souldiours entred and encountred within the vault, and closely skirmished under ground. But within a while that manner of dealing grew more cold and slack by reason that they stopped up the mine betweene when they list, one while with sacks and hairecloth, otherwhiles with dores and such trash as they could come by in hast and stood next hand. One M new invention above the rest was devised against those within the mine, and the same but a slight matter, and made without any great trouble, and this it was. The townesmen took a great tunne or dryfat with a hole bored in the botome, of that capacite, as might receive a pretie pipe like a faucet within it; and withall they made a pipe indeed of yron to fit it, and an yron lid like

A wife to cover the other end or mouth thereof, but the same had many holes in divers places of it. Now this vessell they stuffed full of downe and soft fethers, and then set it with the head tor-ward against the very mine. From the lid or cover aforesaid there stood proking out long sharp pikes, which the Macedonians call Sarissæ, for to keepe off the enemies. Within the fethers they put a cole or sparke of fire, and then with a paire of smithes bellows (the nose whereof went into the pipe aforesaid) they blowed the cole and set it on a smuddering fire within the fe-thers. By which meanes there arose not only a mightie deale of smoke, but also it carried with it a stinking savour, by reason of the fethers burning within, and so filled all the mine underneath, that scarce durst any man abide within for feare of being choked.

During these affaires about Ambracia, Phaneas and Demoteles two embassadors sent from B the *Ætoli*ans by a generall decree of the whole nation, came with a full and plenarie commis-sion unto the Consull. For their Pretour (seeing of the one side Ambracia besieged, and on the other side the sea coast endammaged with the enemies ships, and in a third quarter the Am-philochians and all Dolopia piteously wasted by the Macedonians; and that the *Ætoli*ans were not able to oppose themselves and make head at once against three warres in divers parts) had assembled a generall Diet for to consult with the chiefe of the *Ætoli*ans what was to be done in this case. All their opinions jumped in this one point, To seeke for peace (if it were possible) under equal & indifferent conditions: if not, yet in as tollerable termes as they might. C In confidence and assurance (say they) of Antiochus, the warre began: and now that Antiochus is vanquished both by land and sea, yea and hunted as it were out of the compasse of the world into an angle beyond Taurus, what hope remaineth to mainteine and wage the warre any lon-ger? and therefore Phaneas and Demoteles were to deale, as in such a case and time, as they thought best, according to their wisdom and fidelitie, and the common good of the Ætoli-ans: for what other counsel remaineth, what course else can they take, or what choise beside hath fortune left them? With this so large and free commission I say, were these Embassadors sent: who besought the Consull to spare their citie, to have mercie and pitie of their nation sometime linked in amitie unto them, and forced through very calamitie and miserie (for loth they were to speake of any injuries and wrongs offered) to fall into such follies: neither have the *Ætoli*ans in this late warre of Antiochus deserved to suffer more harme than they were worthy to receive D good for their service in the former warre against Philip: and as they were not largely rewarded and recompensed then, so they ought not to be punished and chastised extremely now. The Consull made answere againe, That the *Ætoli*ans had made a suing for peace many a time, but sincerely and truly at no time: and since they had sollicitated and drawne Antiochus to warre, let E them hardly follow his example in craving peace. Like as he therefore hath not quit and ren-dred some few cities which were in question about their libertie and freedome, but parted with a rich and wealthie kingdome, even all Asia, betweene this and the mountaine Taurus: so un-lesse the *Ætoli*ans will simply lay all armes aside, and come to treat for peace unarmed, hee would never give them audience. And to be short, if they will peace have, they must deliver up their armour and all their horses first, yea and make payment of a thousand talents of silver, and the one moiitie thereof to pay downeright upon the naile before hand. Over and besides this F branch, I will annex unto the accord and covenant, That they shall hold for their friends and enemies, those whom the people of Rome reputeth to be theirs, and none other: To this answere the Embassadors said never a word, both for that they were very hard and grievous im-positions, and also because they knew the natures and minds of their countrymen and neigh-bors at home, how untractable they were and not to be removed if they once tooke a pitch: whereupon they returned unto them, without doing any thing at all, to know the advise once a-gaine of the Pretour and the principall States, what to resolve upon in every respect, whiles all stood whole and upright. But they were welcomed with outcries, and well thent for their labour, in that they had not dispatched and made an end, and so were sent away, and com-manded to bring back with them one peace or other. As they went againe toward Ambracia, they were forlayed and surprized in an ambush laid for them neere the high way side by the A-camanians (with whom at that time they warred) and were had to Tyrreum and there impriso-ned. And by this occasion the peace was delayed.

Whiles the embassadors of Athens and Rhodes (who were come already to intreat for them) remained with the Consull, Aminander also (the king of the Athamans) presented himselfe un-der der safe-conduct in the Romane campe, and tooke more care for the citie of *Ambracia (where G he had sojourned the greater part of his exile) than in the behalfe of the Ætolians. By them, the Consull was certified of the hard hap of the Ætolian Embassadors; and then he gave commandement, that they should be brought from Tyrreum. When they were come, they began to treat of peace. Aminander in the meane while laboured what he could in that enterprife which he especially had undertaken, namely, to induce the Ambracians to submit unto the Romans: but when he saw he did but small good, for all his parling with the principall persons of the city from their walls: at length by the Consull his permission he entred into the towne; where, partly by good counsell, and partly by prayer and entreatie, hee perswaded them in the end, to put themselves into the Romanes hands. Now as touching the Ætolians, they found much favour by the meanes of C. Valerius the sonne of that Levinus, who first contracted amity with that nation; and was besides halfe brother unto the Consull by the same mother. And the Ambracians after capitulation made, that the Ætolians who came to aid them might goe forth without harme, set open their gates. Then articulated it was with the Ætolians: Imprimis, To pay 500 Euboike talents of silver; two hundred presently, and the other 300 at fixe payments yeerely by even portions. Item, To render all Romane captives and fugitive traitors and rennegates that they had, into the hands of the Romanes. Item, To chalenge jurisdiction over no city, which since the time that T. Quintus passed over into Greece, was either forced by the Romans or entred voluntarily into amity and society with them: provided alwaies, that the yle Cephalenia be not comprised within this capitulation. These articles, albeit they were somewhat easier than they looked for, yet the Ætolians requested, that they might acquaint their counsell withall: and I permitted they were so to doe. Some small variance and debate distracted and held them awhile as touching those cities, which having beene in times past within their seignorie and jurisdiction, they hardly could abide to be dismembred (as it were) from their body. But in the end, there was not one but agreed to accept of the peace. The Ambracians gave unto the Consull for a present, a coronet of beaten gold weighing 150 pound. Their statues of brasse and marble, their painted tables (wherewith Ambracia was better stored and adorned, than all the other cities of that region, because it was the royall seat of king Pyrrhus where he kept his court and residence) were all taken downe and carried away: nought else was touched, nor any hurt done besides.

The Consull dislodged then, and remooved from Ambracia into the higher and more inland parts of Ætolia, & encamped before the city called Argos Amphilocheium, two and twenty myles distant from Ambracia: and thither at length repaired the Ætolian embassadors unto him, who marvelled much at them, why they stayed so long. When hee understood by them that the generall counsell of the Ætolians had approved of the peace, hee willed them to goe directly to Rome unto the Senat: and permitted also the Athenians and Rhodians (their mediators and advocates) to go with them and as orators to speake in their behalfe; and moreover he graunted, that his halfe brother C. Valerius should accompany them: which order when he had taken, him selfe crossed over the water to Cephalenia.

When they were arrived at Rome, they found both the eares and the hearts of the chiefe Senators wholly possessed behorehand, with many complaints and imputations that Philip had enforced against them: for hee by meanes of his embassadours and letters (complaining that the Ætolians had unjustly taken from him the Dolapians, the Amphilocheians, and Athamania; and that his garisons, yea and last of all his sonne Perseus, were driven out of Amphilocheia) had wholly averred the Senat from giving any care at all to their requests and prayers: howbeit the Rhodians and Athenians had audience given them with patience and silence. The Athenian Ambassador Leon (by report) mooved and perswaded the Senat with his eloquent tongue: and by a familiar parable and similitude, hee compared the people of Ætolia to the nature of the sea: For like as it, being of it selfe calme, is troubled and made rough by the winds: even so (saith hee) the people of that nation, all the while they entertained friendship with the Romanes, and performed their faithfull promise unto them, so long were in their right kind, and continued peaceable and quiet; but after that Thoen and Dicaarchus began to blow from out of Asia, as after that, Menetas and Damocritus blustred and puffed from the parts of Europe, then arose a storme and tempest, with the ghufts whereof driven they were to Antiochus, and cast (as a man would say) upon a rocke. Well, the Ætolians after they had bene much tossed a long time from post to pillar, in fine effected, that these articles of peace ensuing, were freely agreed upon. Imprimis,

A primis, The nation of Ætolia shall mainteine faithfully and truly the empire and seignorie of the people of Rome. Item, They shall suffer to passe through their countrey and confines no armie that shall bee conducted against their allies and friends; nor assist them with any aid or maintenance whatsoever. Item, They shall repute the enemies of the Romanes for their enemies, and wage warre against them. Item, They shall deliver unto the Romanes and their confederates, all rennegates, all fugitives and prisoners that are among them, excepting such as having beene once taken and returned home, chaunced to be caught againe the second time: or those, who being Romane enemies, were taken prisoners by them, at what time as the Ætolians served in garrison under the Romanes. As for the rest, as many as are forth-comming and may be found, shall be delivered (without fraud or covin) within 100 dayes next ensuing, to the magistrate of Coreyra: but those that appeare not within that time, shall bee likewise rendered whensoever their fortune is to be met withall. Item, They shall yeeld fortie hostages, such as the Romane Consull in his discretion will approve and like well of: provided, that none of these pledges be under twelve yeeres of age, nor above fortie. Neither shall there be taken for hostage any Pretour or capitaine over horsemen, nor publicke Notarie or Secretarie to the state, nor yet any one that hath lien in hostage before-time. Provided also, that Cephalenia shall be exempt from the articles of this accord. Item, As touching the summe of money which they are to pay, and the manner and termes of the payment, there shall be nothing changed of that which hath bene concluded with the Consull: yet, if they had rather pay the same summe in gold than in silver, they may so doe; provided then, that they keepe the rate and proportion, of one for ten, to wit, that one golden peece of coine goe for ten times so much in weight of silver, and no more. Item, What cities, what lands and territories, what persons soever, which having at any time heretofore held tenor of the Ætolians, were by the Consuls T. Quintus and C. Domitius, or any time since their Consulship, either subdued and conquered by force of armes, or otherwise of themselves came under the obeisance of the people of Rome, the Ætolians shall make no claime nor chalenge unto them. Finally, the Æniades with their citie and territoire, shall appertaine to the Acarnanians. Under these conditions above-said, the accord was concluded with the Ætolians.

Notonely in the same summer, but also much about those very daies wherein these affaires were managed by M. Fulvius in Ætolia, Cn. Manlius the other Consull maintained warre in D * Gallogrecia, whereof at this present I will begin to write. This Consull in the beginning of the spring came to Ephesus; where, after he had received the armie of L. Scipio and taken a review and survey thereof, he made an oration to his souldiours; wherein, first he praised their valour and vertue, in that with one battell they had finished the warre against Antiochus: then hee exhorted them to enter into a new warre with those Gaules who had succoured king Antiochus with aid; and were beside of nature so untamed, that unless their puissance were abated & their courage taken downe, to little or no purpose it was that Antiochus was remooved beyond the mountaines of Taurus. Last of all, some discourse he made of his owne person, which was nothing prolix and long, implying neither vaine untruthes nor excessive reports. The souldiours gave audience to the Consull with great joy and a generall applause, making this account, that E since king Antiochus was vanquished, the Gaules alone (who were one part of his forces) would be of no puissance to withstand them. But the Consull supposed that it was much out of his way, that Eumenes should be absent (for then he was at Rome) who knew the countries, was acquainted with the nature of the people, and whome it imported and concerned very much, that the power of the Gaules should be enfeebled and abated. And therefore he sent for Attalus his brother, from Pergamus, and exhorted him to enter into action with him and take arms. And when Attalus had made promise to aid him both in his person and with all the power that he could make, he sent him into his country to levie souldiours. After some few dayes, when the Consull was departed from Ephesus, Attalus (accompanied with a regiment of a thousand foot and two hundred horse) met him at Magnesia; and had given order to his brother Athenus, to follow after with the rest of the forces; having committed the guard and government of Pergamus and the kingdome to those, whom he knew to be fast and faithfull to his brother and himselfe. The Consull, after he had praised and commended the young gentleman, marched forward with his whole power as farre as *Maender, and there encamped, because it was not possible to passe the river at any found, and therefore boats and barges were to bee gotten together, for to P P P P ferrie ferrie and transport the armie. When they were set over the river, they went to Hiera Come, G where there was a magnificent and stately temple of Apelle, and an Oracle in it. And by report the priests and prophets there, deliver the responds and answers of the Oracle in verses, & those not rudely composed without rithme & meeter. From hence they removed, & at two daies end arrived at the river Harpasus: and thither were embassadours come from the Alabandians, requesting the Consull either by vertue of his authoritie, or by force of armes to compell one of their fortresses which lately had revolted from them & rebelled, to return again to their former obedience. And hither Athenus also, brother to Eumenes and Attalus, was come together with Leusius the Candiot, and Corragus the Macedonian, bringing with them 1000 foot, and 300 horse, of divers nations mingled together. The Consull sent one of his martiall Tribunes or Colonels with a mean companie, to summon the castle or fortress above said, & after it was forced and recovered, H he delivered it into the hands of the Alabandians. Himselfe kept on his direct way, and turned on no side, untill he came to Antiochia upon the river Mæander, where hee encamped. This river Mæander ariseth from Celæna, where the first head & source thereof is to be seen. Now this Celæna had ben in times past the capitall citie of al Phrygia. But in proceffe of time this old Celæna was abandoned by the inhabitants, & not farre from it they peopled a new citie called Apamea, bearing the name of Apamea the sister of king Seleucus. The river Marfyas likewise springing not far from the foresaid sources of Mæander, dischargeth it selfe therinto. And as the common fame goeth, at this Celæna it was, where Marfyas the musician gave defiance to Apollo, & challenged him to play upon the flute. This Mæander above named, issuing out of an high hill at Celæna, runneth through the mids of the citie, & first keeping his course along the country of the Carians, and afterwards of the Ionians, falleth at the last into an arm of the sea, between Priene & Miletus.

Whiles the Consull lay encamped about Antiochia, Seleucus the sonne of Antiochus, presented himself unto him with corn for his armie, according to the covenant contracted with Scipio. Some small variance & difference there was as touching the aid demanded of Antiochus: for Seleucus pleaded that Antiochus had capitulated only to find corn for the Roman soldiours. But this debate was soone at an end, by reason of the stiffe resolution of the Consull, who sent a Colonell to warn and charge the soldiours to accept no corn, before the aid-soldiours of Antiochus were received. From thence he marched to Gordiu-tichos* (a citie so called) & so forward the third day to Tabæ. This citie is seated upon the frontiers of the Pisidians, in that coast which boundeth upon the Pamphylian sea. This quarter was able to yeeld lustie men for war, when it had not ben any way endamaged, but remained entire & whole. For prooffe whereof, even then also there issued out of the citie a corner of horsemen, who charged upon the Romans as they marched, and at the first on-set troubled them not a little. But afterwards, seeing themselves neither for number, nor yet for prowes comparable unto them, they were driven back into the town, & craved pardon for their trespass, readie to surrender their citie into the Cos. his hands. The Consull imposed upon them a payment of 25 talents of silver, and 10000 medimnes of wheat, and upon that composition their surrender was accepted. Three daies after, the Romans came to Chaus the river, & from thence to the citie Eriza, which at the first assault they woon. After this the armie marched as far as to a castle called Thabusion standing over the river Indus*, so called of a certain Indian, whom an elephant threw and cast into it. Now they were not far from Cibyra, and yet no embassage appeared from the tyrant of that country and State, Maagesites, a dissoliall and trecherous man in all his dealings, and besides, extreame hard and unreasonable. Whereupon the Cos. sent out before, C. Helvius, with 4000 foot and 500 horse, to sound his disposition and mind. As these companies entred into his frontiers, there encountered them his embassadours, giving them to understand that the tyrant their maister was readie to do whatsoever they would command: only his request was unto Helvius to passe peaceably through his country, & to restrain his soldiours from wasting and spoiling the territories, and fifteen talents they brought with them for to make a crown of gold. Helvius promised to save his lands for being spoiled and wasted, but he willed the embassadours to goe to the Consull. Now when they had related the same unto him, he made them answer in these tearmes, We cannot gather by any signe or token (quoth he) that the tyrant beareth good will and affection to us Romanes: and againe, if hee be such a one as the world taketh him for, we are to thinke rather of his chastisement, than of admitting him into our amitie. The embassadours fore troubled at this word, requested him for that present no more, but to take the crowne of gold, and to permit that the tyrant himselfe might have access into his presence for

* The same that is now called Gordiopolis.

* Hiji, Nigro. Din, incolis.

A to parle with him: and cleare himselfe. The morrow after, by permission of the Consull came the tyrant into the campe, bearing no port of a prince. For a private person and meane man of small wealth would have gone in better apparell, and caried a greater traine about him than hee: either went he so meanelly, but he spake as lowly, hacking and hewing his words, as if hee had not been able to speake them out. He complained of his owne barenesse and want, and likewise of the poverty of the cities under his feignorie (for besides Cybira, he held in possession Sylius, & that which is called Alimne) Yet he promised to see what he could doe, if haply by undoing himselfe, and spoiling his subjects, he might make up five & twentie talents. Mary he mistrusted greatly that he should never effect so much. Are you therabout? (quoth the Consull) Now verily I can no longer endure this paltering and mockerie. Was it not ynough, that in your absence you bashed not to delude and disappoint us by your embassadours, but you must persist still in the same impudencie now that you bee heere your selfe in person? And would you make us beleieve indeed, that the disbursing of five and twentie talents will begger you and your whole kingdom? Come on sir, I say; Bring me hether within these three daies, and lay me downe in readie mony five hundred talents, or looke for no other favour, but your territorie to be wasted, and your citie besieged. Greatly affrighted was he at these minatorie words, howbeit hee continued still obstinately, counterfeiting and pretending his needinesse and poverty, and after much bafe hucking, and rising by little and little, one while hasting and wrangling, another while praying and entreating, (and that with whining & putting finger in the eie) he was fetcht over at length, and came off to pay a good hundred talents of silver, and to deliver 10000 medimnes of come besides. And all C this was exacted of him to be performed in fixe daies. From Cibyra the Consull conducted the armie through the country of the Sindensians, and after he had passed over the river Calanis, he there pitched downe his tents. The morrow after they marched by the lake or meere Caralitis, and set them downe and rested upon the river Mæander. As they advanced from thence toward Ligon the next citie, the inhabitants fled for feare: whereupon, the towne void of people, but replenished with abundance of all things was ransacked and rifled. This done, they arrived at the head or spring of the river Lycus, and the next day marched toward the river Cobulatus. The Termessians at the same time having forced and woon the citie of the Lyrians, were now upon the point to assault the castle. They who were within besieged, seeing no other hope of succour, sent their embassadours to the Consull, beseeching his helpe, and making pittifull mone, D how they with their wives and children were shut up within the fortress, and looked every hour for death, either by famine or the sword. This fell out as the Cos. wished, namely, to have so good an occasion presented unto him, of turning his way into Pamphylia. At his first comming hee delivered the Lyrians from the siege. To Termessus he granted peace, upon composition that he should receive first 30 talents. In like sort he dealt by the Aspendians & other States of Pamphylia. In his returne from thence, the first day he encamped fast by a river called Taurus, & the next day following, neer a town which they call Xylinc-Come. From whence he marched & held on his journey continually, untill he came to the citie Corniasa. The next citie unto it was Darsa, which he found abandoned by the inhabitants for feare, howbeit, full of all kind of goods. As he marched still along the marishes, there met him embassadours from Lyfinia, who came to render E their citie into his hands. After this he entred into the territorie of Sagalassus, a fertile & plentiful quarter, for all sorts of corn & fruits. The Pisidians inhabit those parts, who are the best warriors in all that country. In regard whereof, as also for that their territorie is fruitful & well peopled, and their citie strongly situate (as few like unto it) they were growne to be hardie and courageous. The Consull seeing no embassage presented unto him in the entrance of the frontiers, sent out forraiers to fetch in booties. When they perceived once their goods harried and caried away, before their faces, their stomacks came downe, and then they sent their embassadours, and upon composition to pay fiftie talents, twentie thousand medimnes of wheate, and as many of barley, they obtained peace. From thence he passed to the fountaines of Obrina, untill he came to a village which they name Aporidos-Come, and there he encamped. Thidier repaired F the next day Seleucus from Apamea. And the same day, after he had sent away unto Apamea his sick folke and other baggage and pelfe that he had (good for nothing) he tooke guides of Seleucus for the way, and entred into the plaines of Metropolis, and the next morrow marched as farre as Dinæ in Phrygia. After this, he entred into Synada, where he found all the townes about abandoned for feare, and left desert. With the bootie and pillage whereof his armie was so heavily charged, that hardly he could march five miles aday; and so he came at length to G Bendor, named The old. From thence he passed to Anabura, and the next day to the source of Alander, and the third day pitched downe his tents neere Abassus. There he lay encamped many dayes together, because he was now arrived into the countrie of the Tolistobogians.

The Gauls in times past being a mightie people in number, were induced to take a voiage either for want of land to inhabit, or for hope of boorie and prizes: and supposing withall, that they could not passe through any nation whatsoever, comparable to themselves in feates of armes, entred under the conduct of Brennus into the countrey of the Dardanians. Where, they began to mutine among themselves: by occasion whereof it hapned, that to the number of twentie thousand of them, following two of their princes Lomnorus and Lutarius, departed from Brennus, and tooke their way into Thracia: where partly by warring with them that made resistance, and partly by imposing tribute upon them that craved peace, they came at length as farre as to Bizantium: and after they had held tributarie a good time the coast of * Propontis, they possessed themselves also of the good townes and cities of that quarter. After this, they had a mind and desire to invade Asia; for they heard say, being so neere, how fertile and plenteous the soile of that country was. And after they had surprized and woon Lysimachia by a wile, and by force of armes conquered all Chersonesus, they descended to Hellepont. Where seeing how they were devided from Asia but only by the streights, and that it was but a small cut thither, their desire was much more inflamed to passe over. And for this purpose they dispatched certaine curriers to Antipater the governour of that coast, to demanda passage. But by reason that they effected not this so soone as they hoped, there arose another new sedition betweene the princes themselves. Whereupon Lomnorus accompanied with the greater part, retired to Bizantium from whence he came. But Lutarius tooke from the Macedonians (who under colour of an embassage were sent from Antipater in espiall) two covered ships, and three brigandines. By meanes of these vessels, within few dayes he had ser over all his armie, transporting them one after another day and night continually. Not long after Lomnorus also passed over into Asia from Byzantium, by the aid of Nicomedes king of Bithynia. After this, the Gauls joined againe together in one, and succored Nicomedes in his warres against Zyba, who held a part of Bithynia, and by their help and assistance especially, Zyba was vanquished, and all Bithynia became subject to Nicomedes. Then they departed out of Bithynia into Asia. Now of twentie thousand there were not above ten thousand armed. Yet so great a terror they struck into all nations on this side the mountaine Taurus, that both they to whom they approached not neere, and also they whom they came unto, as well the farthest as the neere, submitted themselves, and raunged under their obedience. In the end, being three nations of them, to wit, the Tolistobogians, the Trocmians, and the Tectosages, they divided Asia likewise into three parts, and parted them so equally among themselves, that each nation of them possessed a severall tract which paid them tribute. The coast of Hellepontus was given to the Trocmians: the Tolistobogians had for their share Eolis and Ionis: and unto the Tectosages were allotted the inland parts of the maine continent of Asia. And in one word they demanded tribute of all Asia on this side Taurus. But they planted and seated themselves about the river Halys. The bruit of their name was so fearefull and terrible, and especially after their issue was multiplied and increased in great number, that the KK. also of Syria in the end, refused not to be their homagers and give them tribute. The first of all the inhabitants in Asia that denied them homage, was king Attalus the father of Eumenes: and fortune beyond the expectation of all men, favoured his hardie and courageous enterprize: for he vanquished them in battaile. Howbeit, he daunted not their harts so much, but still they upheld and maintained their soveraigne seignorie, in such sort, as their puissance continued untill the warre betweene Antiochus and the Romanes. Yea and after that Antiochus was vanquished and chased out of part of his realme, they conceived great hope to hold their owne still; by reason they were so remote from the sea, and therefore thought that the Romane armie would never pierce so farre as to them. The Consull now, for as much as he was to warre with this nation, so terrible to all their neighbours in those quarters, assembled his souldiours to a publike audience, and in this manner made speech unto them.

I am not ignorant, my souldiours, that of all the people which inhabit Asia, the Gauls are most renowned for valiance in warre. And why? this fierce and cruell nation having runne over the world in a manner, and warred with all countries, chose them a place of abode, and to

A settle themselves in the mids of a generation, of all other most mild & tractable. Big & tall they are of stature & personage: their hair they weare long in golden criped and shining locks: they are of bucklers of huge bignes, and handle swords of exceeding length. Besides, when they enter into battaile, they use to sing, to houp and daunce, and with clattering their targuets & weapons together after the guise of their country, they make an horrible noise. And all this is done of purpose by them to terrifie their enemies. But such devises as these be, let the Greeks, the Phrygians and Carians be afraid of, who are not used and accustomed to heare and see such things: as for the Romanes, acquainted with the Gauls sodaine and tumultuous warres, they can skill well enough of these their royes and vanities also. Once in deed, and but once, at the first encounter they discomfited the Romanes at the river Allia: but since that time, our Auncestors for the space of two hundred yeeres have made havock of them, killed, put to flight, and driven them like sheepe before them: and oftner, I dare well say, have they triumphed of the Gauls, than of all the world besides. Thus much we know of them by experience, that if a man be able to stand out their first shock and violence (which upon a furious heate of their owne bynature, and in blind choler and anger they spend all at once) all the parts of their bodie run to sweate and become faint: their weapons are readie to fall out of their hands: their bodies are so tender, their courages so feeble (after their cholerick anger is once playd and passed) that the very heate of the sunne, the dust and the drought is able without drawing sword, to overthrow them and lay them along. Prouse and tryall wee have had of them, not onely legions to legions, but man to man. T. Manlius and M. Valerius have shewed plainly how farre Romane vertue and prowesse surpasseth the furious rage of Gauls. Why? even Marcus Manlius one man alone, repulsed and beat downe the Gauls as they climbed up by numbers to the Capitoll cliffe. And those auncestours of ours before named, had then to deale, with naturall Gauls in deed, borne and bred in their owne country: where as these here, by this time now are a bastard sort of them and cleane degenerate; mingled they are with others, and in truth, as they be called, so are they Gallo-greeks. And it fareth with them as with plants, fruits, and living beasts, in which wee see that the seed is not of that vertue, and so effectually to keepe and receive still the owne kind and nature, as the proprietie of the soyle and the aire where they are nourished, is to change the same. Thus the Macedonians who inhabit Alexandria in Egypt, who dwell in Seleucia and Babilonia, and other Colonies dispersed over the earth, are growne out of their owne kind, and in manners become Syrians, Parthians, and Egyptians. Masius seated among the Gauls, hath drawne somewhat of the nature of the nations adjoyning and bordering upon them. And what have the Tarentines left in them of that severare, rough, and hard discipline of the Spartanes? For, what soever is ingendred and bred in the owne proper place, is ever more kindly, and retaineth it owne nature better; but looke what is transplanted into another soyle, doth soone degenerate, and grow into a bastard kind: for nature transformeth her selfe, and changeth into that wherewith she is nourished. Be sure therefore, that like as ye have defeated these Phrygians (for no better they be) overcharged and laden with French armes in the battaile against Antiochus, even so being now conquerours, yee shall subdue and hew them in peeces once already vanquished. And I feare me more that ye shall win too small glory of them, than I doubt by fighting so litle with them that ye shall have your hands too full of war against them. Why, even K. Attalus many a time and often hath discomfited and put them to flight. Neither would I have you to thinke, that savage beasts only newly taken, and keeping at the first their fell and wild nature, after a time that they have bene fed by mans hand, grow to be tame and gentle; but that the fiercenesse and crueltie of man, is likewise of the same nature to be dulced and made tractable. Are ye persuaded that these Gauls resemble their fathers & grandfathers in conditions? Their forefathers long since left their native country for fault of ground and land to possesse; and being driven to passe through the most rough and difficult countrey of Illyricum, first came into Paonia, and afterwarde traveled all over Thracia, fighting ever as they went with most fierce and cruell nations, untill at length they seized upon these parts and settled there. After (I say) they had been hardened and made more fell by so many travailes and dangerous adventures, they were received in the end within such a land, as through the abundance of all good things, might feed & franke them up. All that fiercenes and savage nature of theirs, which they had when they first came thither, is (no doubt) mollified by the goodnes of a most fertile soile, by the sweetnes & pleasure of a most temperat aire, & last of all by the gentle and debonair nature of the inhabitants their neighbours. And even you also (in G good faith) are to looke unto it; (martiall men although you be, and the very off spring of Mars himselſe) yee are (I ſay) to take heed and beware of theſe delights of Asia, and betimes to get you forth from them. So forceable are theſe ſortaine pleaſures and delicate entice-ments, to quench and corrupt the vigor of your ſpirits; ſo powerfull is the commerce and converſing with ſtrangers; ſo potent is the contagion (as it were) of their maners and diſcipline of neighbour inhabitants. Yet this one good turn ye ſhall have, that as againſt you they have not that courage which in times paſt they had; ſo among the Greekes here, they are of as great name as ever they were in auncient time. So that amongſt your allies, you ſhall win as great honour by your victorie, as if you ſhould have conquered the Gaules, when they were at the height of their valour and proweſſe. After the aſſembly diſmiſſed, and Embaſſadors ſent to Epoſognatus (the onely prince H in thoſe parts who perſiſted in amitie with Eumenes, and had reſuſed to aid Antiochus againſt the Romanes) the Conſull marched forward. The firſt day hee came to the river Alander, and the morrow to a certaine village which they call Tyſcon. Thither repaired unto him the Embaſſadors of the Oroadians, craving to be accepted as friends; but they were enjoined to pay two hundred talents: and when they requested leave to make relation and report hereof at home, they were permitted. From thence the Conſull led his armie to Plicendum; and after that, hee encamped at Alyattos. Thither returned they who had been ſent to Epoſognatus, together with the Embaſſadors of prince Compulſus, requeſting the Romans not to war upon the Teſtoſages; for that both himſelſe and Epoſognatus alſo, would goe in perſon to them, and perſuade the nation to doe whatſoever they ſhould be commaunded. The prince obtained his requeſt; and ſo I from thence the armie began to march through the land which they call * Axylos: and well it might ſo be called, for it hath no wood at all in it, nor beareth ſo much as thorns, or any thing els to burne and maintaine fire: cow-dung is all their burning, for want of other fewell. Whiles the Romanes lay in campe before Cuballum, (a forteſſe of Gallogræcia) they diſcovered the Cavallerie of the enemies comming toward them with a great hurry and tumult: and they charged ſo ſiercely and ſodainly upon the corps de guard of the Romans, that they not only troubled and diſordered them, but alſo killed ſome of them. The alarme beeing given within the campe, the Romane horſemen at once iſſued forth of all the gates, diſcomfited the Gaules, and ſlew certaine of them in the chaſe. The Conſull perceiving now that hee was come into his enemies countrey, marched not from thenceforth without ſending out his eſpials before, and kept K his armie together in battail array with great heed and carefulneſſe. Thus hee held on his journey continually untill he came to the river Sangarius, where he purpoſed to make a bridge, becauſe there was no paſſage over at any ſound. This Sangarius ariſeth out of the mountaine Adoreus, and running through Phrygia it joyneth with the river Thymbris neere unto Bithynia, and ſo growing bigger by receiving a double current, keepeth his courſe through Bithynia, and diſchargeth himſelſe into Propontis; a river, not ſo famous and noble for the greatnes thereof, as becauſe it yeeldeth fiſh abundantly to all the nations bordering and dwelling thereupon. When the bridge was finiſhed and the armie paſſed over, as they marched along the banke ſide, the Galli or prieſts of Cybele (the great mother of the gods) were come from Peſſinus, and with ſtreamers, inſules, and other ornaments, met them: and in their ſanaticall verſes (as men be- L ſtraight and out of their wits) ſeemed to prophetic and foretell, that the goddeſſe vouchſa-fed the Romanes a faire way to warre and victorie, yea and the conquett and ſeignorie of that countrey. Hereat the Conſull ſaid, That he accepted their words for a preſage of good fortune, and thereupon in that very place he pitched his tents. The next day he went as far as Gordium: a towne verily it is none of the greateſt, but more frequented and reſorted unto for traffique and merchandize, than uſually ſuch drie townes are that ſtand farre within the land. Three ſeas there be triangle wiſe, of equall diſtance all from it. On the coaſt toward Sinope, it hath Helleſpont and the ſhores of the other tract whereas the Cilicians inhabite by the ſea ſide. Moreover, it bordereth upon the confines of many great nations, who for their mutuall need and commoditie, have commerce of negotiation, and meet together in that one place. This towne at that time M they found altogether diſpeopled, by reaſon that the inhabitants were fled for feare; but well ſto-red, & full of wares and goods of all ſorts. Whiles the Romanes lay there encamped, there came Embaſſadors from Epoſognatus, reporting unto them, that hee had made a journey to the princes of the Gaules, but could obtaine no reaſon at their hands: alſo, that they were diſlodged out

out of the champaine countrey, had quit their villages and lands in great numbers, and together with their wives and children drave before them and carried with them whatſoever they could, and were retired to the mount Olympus, from whence they purpoſed to defend themſelves by force of armes and the ſtrong ſituation of the place. The embaſſadors likewiſe of the O-roadians, gave more certaine intelligence, to wit, That the whole people in generall of the Toſtobogians had ſeiſed the hill Olympus; that the Teſtoſages ſeverally by themſelves had taken another mountaine called Magana; that the Trocmians, had committed their wives and children to the guard of the Teſtoſages, minding with a maine armie to aid the To-ſtobogians. Now at that time the princes of thoſe three States were Orgiſo, Combaloma-rus, and Gaulotus. And the principall reaſon and meanes that theſe had to enterpriſe warre; was this, That being poſſeſſed of the higheſt hilles of that countrey, and having brought thither proviſion of all things to ſerve them for a long ſpace, they ſuppoſed to wearie and wearie out their enemies in proceſſe of time. For this account they made, that they would never venture to march againſt them, through ſo hard, ſo difficult, and diſadvantageous places; and if they aſſaid ſo to doe, they might be impeached, repulſed backe and beaten down with a ſmall com-panie again, if they would ſit ſtill in leaguer at the foot of thoſe frozen mountaines and doe nothing, they were never able to endure the cold and the ſcarcitie which they ſhould find there.
 And notwithstanding the very altitude and height of the places defended them, yet over and be-ſides they caſt a trench, and made other defences round about the tops of the mountaines which they held. Alſo for proviſion of darts and other ſhot, it was the leaſt of all their care, ſuppoſing C that the rough places would furniſh them with ſufficient ſtore of ſtones to ſling. The Conſull forecaſting in his mind that hee ſhould not deale with theſe enemies cloſe at hand-fight, but a far off when he was to aſſaile their holds, had made proviſion aforehand of great ſtore of darts, light velitarie javelines, arrowes, bullets of lead, and ſmall ſtones that might be levelled and ſent out of ſlings. Thus being well appointed and furniſhed with ſuch kind of ſhot, hee led his armie toward the mountaine Olympus, and about five miles off he encamped. The next day hee together with Attalus advanced forward with 500 men of armes to view the nature & ſtanding of the mountain, together with the ſituation of the Gaules campe. But the enemies horſemen being double in number to them, iſſued out of their campe, and put them to flight, ſlew a few of them in the rout, and hurt many. The third day hee ſet forward with all his forces to diſcover the places, and D by reaſon that there came not one of them out of their defences and fortifications, hee rode round about the mountaine in ſaſetie at his pleaſure, and perceived that on the South ſide, there were certaine little hills, all of cleane earth without ſtones, and the ſame riſing up with an eaſie aſcent to a certaine place; but to the North were high rocks, and the ſame in maner ſteepe upright. And whereas all the reſt were inacceſſible, three onely waies and advenues hee found, the one directly toward the miſt of the mountain (where thoſe little mounts of earth ſtood) the other two were difficult, the one lying Southeaſt, and the other Northweſt. After hee had conſi-dered and viewed theſe places that day, hee pitched his campe at the very roote and foot of the hill. The morrow after he ſacrificed, and finding by the firſt beaſts which hee killed, that the gods were pacified and favourable unto him, hee divided his armie into three battaillons, and ſo ad-E vanced againſt the enemy, and himſelſe in perſon with the greateſt part of his forces, mounted up the hill, whereas it yeilded the eaſieſt aſcent. Hee commaunded his brother L. Manlius, from the Southweſt to get up the hill, as the place would permit with ſaſetie, giving him in charge that if he met with any dangerous places ſteepe and hard of aſcent, that hee ſhould not wreſtle with the difficulties of the ground, nor ſtrive againſt thoſe things, which to force and overcome were unpoſſible; but rather to traaverse the ground, and retire toward him, and ſo to join with his battaillon. As for C. Helvius, hee willed him with a third part of the forces, to wheele about by little and little, and fetch a compaſſe at the hill foot, and then from the Northweſt to mount up.
 Likewiſe the aids of Attalus, he divided into three equal parts, and tooke order that the young prince himſelſe in perſon ſhould keepe with him. The Cavallerie and the elephants hee left in F the next downes beneath the hills, and charged the captaines thereof to have a careful eie and good regard to marke what was done in every place, yea, and to make haſt to reſcue and ſuccour whereſoever need ſhould be. The Gaules making full reckoning that on two ſides they were ſure enough, and the place that way to be inacceſſible; becauſe they would ſtop the other advenue by force of armes on the South ſide, ſent forth about foure thouſand armed men to ſeiſe upon a certaine

certaine hill within a mile of their campe, which hill commaunded the way, supposing there, as G from a skonce and fortreffe to debarre them of passage. Which when the Romanes perceived, they put themselves in readinesse to fight. A pretty space before the ensignes, marched the skirmishers, together with the Candiote archers & slingers from Attalus; likewise the Triballians of Thrace. The ensignes of the footmen followed softly after (as well as they might) against the hill, bearing their targets before them so, as they seemed to cover themselves only to avoid the shot, and meant not to enter into any fight hand to hand. The fight at first was equall, perfonned with shot a good distance off: for as the Gaules gat the advauntage of the ground, so the Romans had the ods for varietie and store of darts. But as the skirmish continued and encreased, there was no more equalitie scene. For the shields of the Gaules being made long, and not broad ynough for their bodies, and withall flat and plaine without, hardly covered and defended them: H and by this time all their shot was spent; and weapon had they none but their very swords, whereof there was no use at all, considering the enemy came not to close fight. The onely helpe they had was with stones, and those too big for their handling and not easie to weld, by reason they were not provided before, but such as in that hast came next to their hand without any choise. Moreover, being not used and exercised to flinging, they had neither the artificiall sleight, nor yet sufficient strength to helpe themselves withall: but contrariwise, from all parts were pelted with bullets of lead, and galled with arrowes and darts at unwares, which they could neither ward nor avoid; and for that with anger and fear together their wits and understandings were blinded, they wist not what to doe, seeing themselves surprisid and overtaken in a kind of fight whereunto they were least of all fitted. For as in close conflict hand to hand, where blows are dealt, where raps I are given and taken interchangeably, choler kindleth courage: even so, when men are wounded aloofe with light darts, and from whence they know not, they wot not upon whom to run, and at whom to make in that blind fit of theirs, but they turne upon their owne fellows without all reason at a venture, like wild beafts galled with arrowes sticking in their sides. Now, they receive not a wound but it is seene, by reason that they fight naked, and their bodies are faire, slicke, and white, as being never bare but in battell: by which meanes greater store of blood gush out of the wounds in their fleshy bodies, the gashes appeare greater, and their white skin much more stained with black blood. But they passe not so much for broad and wide slashes (for otherwhiles when the skin is cut away, & the wound rather broad than deep, they take more pride therein, and think they fight with greater honor.) Mary, if it happen at any time, that an arrow head or a bullet K sticking within the flesh all hidden, put them to paine and torment, notwithstanding the hurt be small in apparence, yet when they seeke to plucke out an arrow, and the head will not follow, then they take on & are starke mad, for shame that so small a prick should plague them so, and be readie to kill them, insomuch as they cast themselves on the ground, & lie wallowing along every where. Others there be of them that ran full upon their enemy, and those were sticke with arrowes and darts from all parts, and when they came neere to hand, were by the skirmishers killed and cut in peeces with their swords. These souldiours use to cover themselves with a shield of three foot long, carrying in their right hand certaine speares to use aloofe, and weare by their side a Spanish sword. Now in case they come to hand fight, they shift their speare out of the right hand into the left, and take them to their swords. By this time there were but few of these Gaules left alive; who L perceiving that the light armed skirmishers of the enemies were too good for them, and seeing withall the ensignes of the legions to approach neere unto them, tooke them to their heeles on all hands, and began to flie amaine toward the campe; which now was full of feare and trouble, as where women and children and a multitude of feeble folke (not fit to beare armes) were thrumblid and jumbled together. The Romanes following the traine of their victorie, seized the hills abandoned by the enemies that were fled. About the same time L. Manlius and C. Helvius, having mounted so farre as they could find way, traversing the sides of the hill, when they were come to an end, where they could see neither way nor path, they turned to that quarter of the hill which onely afforded a way, and both of them began to follow the Consuls battailon, a prettie distance asunder, as if they had agreed beforehand so to doe: and that which at first M had been simply the best thing to be done, they were of necessitie forced at last to put in execution. For in such difficulties and places of disadvauntage, succours behind in a rereward, have oftentimes served in right good steed: that if those in the vauntguard should chauce to be beaten backe, they in the second place might receive and protect them, and also freshly

A begin freshly a new fight. After that the formost ensignes of the legions, were come to those hills, which the light armour before had seized, the Consull commaunded the souldiours to rest them a while and breath themselves, and shewed them withall where the bodies of the Gaules lay dead along all over the mountaines. And if (qd. he) the light armed skirmisher, have made such a rid- dance of them, what is to be looked for at the hands of the legionarie souldiours, armed all over in complete harness? what will they do that carie the hearts of most noble warriors? surely they must needs win the campe, into which the enemy is chased and driven by the light armed souldiours. Howbeit he commaunded the light armour to goe afore, who all the while that the legions rested themselves, spent not the time in vaine, but employed it in gathering together the darts and javelins that lay about the hills, to the end that they might have sufficient shot. Now the Romans B marched forward and approached the campe. The Gaules likewise for their parts, fearing least their defences would not be able to defend them, stood armed before their trench and rampier. But afterwards being overcharged with all sorts of darts, they were driven in the turning of an hand within their hold, (for the more they were in number, and the thicker they stood, the lesse lighted any dart in vaine) onely they left strong guards about the gates and entrance into the campe. Moreover, among the multitude which was driven into the hold, there was discharged at randon a mightie number of darts: and that many of them were hurt thereby, appeared by their cry mingled with the shrieks of women and children. Now against them that warded the gates, and took up the avenues with their guards, the legionarie souldiours in the forefront let flie their javelins. And albeit these were not wounded in their bodies, yet by reason that their shields & bucklers were pierced through, they were most of them entangled one within another, & stuck fast. C Long they could not abide the violence of the Romanes, insomuch as before that the victours could enter into the campe, the Gaules fled forth at all the gates wide open, and ranne they wist not whither like blind men, as wel through places which had no way, as those that were passable. No rocks so steep with downsalls, no cliftes so rough with crags, could stand in their way; and nothing feared they affront; their enemies only at their heels affrighted them. And therefore most of them either fell headlong downe a mightie height and brake their necks, or else for very feeblenesse lost their breath, were windlesse, and readie to die. The Consull after he had taken their campe, would not suffer it to be ransacked, but commaunded the souldiours every one to follow the chase hard; and whiles the enemies were thus affraid, to affright them thoroughly. Then came D the other regiment with L. Manlius, but the Consull would not suffer them to enter the camp, but sent them forthwith to pursue the enemies. Himself also in person anon after followed, when he had delivered the charge of keeping the prisoners, unto the militarie Tribunes of the armie: for this reckoning and resolution he made, that the warre was at a small end, if in this tumultuous fight of theirs he might either kill or take prisoners a number of them. The Consull was no sooner departed, but C. Helvius came with his third regiment, but he could not hold his souldiours from the pillage of the camp, in so much as the bootie and prizes were most unjustly dealt among them who were at no end of the skirmish. The Cavallerie stood all this while still and wist not of the fight, or that their fellows had gotten the victorie: but afterwards they also E spying the Gaules dispersed about the roote of the mountaines, made after them as well as their horses would mount against the hills: some they slue, and others they tooke prisoners. The just number of those that were slaine can not easly be counted, because they fled farre and neere among the cranks and windings of the mountaines, where they were killed in blind corners. Many of them besides, having engaged themselves to the craggs and rocks that had no way forward, tumbled downe into the vallies of a monstrous depth underneath. Yea and some hapned to be killed in the woods amid the greives and bushes. Claudius who writeth of two battailes fought upon the mount Olympus, reporteth that there died there fortie thousand enemies. But Valerius Antias, who otherwise is wont to overreach and exceede in number, hath recorded nor above ten thousand. But without all question the prisoners amounted to fortie thousand full, because they went with a traine of all sorts and ages, more like men dislodging and removing F out of one country unto another, than going to warre. The Consull after he had burned all the armour of his enemies in one heape, commaunded his souldiours to bring forth the rest of the pillage and spoile into one place, and either sold and made money of that which was to come into the publicke treasure of the citie, or els parted it amongst the souldiours indifferently, with great regard, that every one should have a just and even portion. Moreover hee commaunded them them all in open audience, and rewarded every one besides with gifts according to their several deserts. But above the rest, and with the generall accord of all, he both praised, and also recompensed Attalus. For surely that yong gentleman shewed not only singular valour and forwardnes in all travailes and dangers, but also a speciall modestie and rare sobrietie.

There remained yet entire and whole the warre with the Tectosages, against whom the Consull made an expedition, and upon the third day arrived at Ancyra, a noble citie in those parts, from whence the enemies were little more than ten miles distant. During the time that he lay there encamped, there hapned a memorable act, performed by a captive Lady. Among many more prisoners, there fortun'd to be kept in ward, the wife of prince Ortiagon, a woman of surpassing beautie. The Centurion who had her person in safe custodie, was lecherous and covetous withall, as many of these souldiours are. Her he solicited and tempted first to commit folly: but seeing her altogether unwilling, and that she abhorred to prostitute herselfe unto him, he did violence upon that bodie of hers, which fortune had made bond & thrall unto him. But afterwards to mollifie and assuage the indignitie of this villanie, he put the woman in good hope, and promised that she should returne home againe to her friends: mary he would not do all for pure love alone and freely without ranfome, for he bargained to have a certeine summe of gold besides. And to the end forthwith that no person belonging to him might take knowledge thereof, he permitted her to send one of the prisoners whom she would herselfe as messenger to her friends & kinsfolke, & appointed a place neere unto a river, whether the next night following should repair two and no more (of the said captive ladies friends, with the gold above-said) for to receive her at his hands. It fell out so that among the rest of the captives committed to his guard, there was a bondslave of her own: this messenger at the shutting in of the evening the Centurion conducted without the corps de guard. The morrow night after came accordingly to the place appointed, both the two friends aforesaid of the gentlewoman, and also the centurion himselfe with his prisoner, where they shewed the gold, amounting to the full summe of one Attick talent (according as it was agreed betwene them) and with that the woman spake unto them in her language, and commaunded them to draw their swords, and kill outright the Centurion as he was weighing the gold. Which done, she caused his head to be stricken off, and wrapped it her selfe within her garment, and so carried it home to her husband Ortiagon, who from Olympus had fled and escaped to his owne house. But before that she clipped and embraced her husband, she threw downe the Centurion his head at his feete. And when he wondered what mans head it was, and what act this might be, far passing a womans deed, she confessed to her husband the injurie that her bodie had suffred, and likewise the revenge for the abuse of her chastitie by force and violence: and (as it is reported) she maintained the honor of this matron-like act ever after even to her dying day, in all sanctimonie of life and modest carriage of herselfe like a chaste dame.

Whiles the camp lay at Ancyra, the Oratours of the Tectosages shewed themselves unto the Consull, requesting him not to dislodge and remove from thence before hee had parted with their lords and princes: saying withall, that they would accept any conditions of peace whatsoever, rather than warre. The time was set downe, even the next morrow, and a place likewise appointed, as just in the mid way (as it could be guessed) between the camp and Ancyra. The Consull thither came at the houre assigned, accompanied with a guard of five hundred horse: but perceiving no Gaule at all there, he returned unto the camp. And thither repaired the same oratours unto him the second time, excusing the default, and saying that their princes could not come in person by occasion of some scruple of conscience that arose the while: howbeit, the chiefe personages besides of the whole nation, should appeare, by whom all matters might be composed as well as with themselves. The Consull made answer, that hee likewise would send Attalus in his steed. So they came to this enparling from both parts. Attalus had three hundred men of armes about him for his guard: and certeine conditions of peace were drawne and propounded: but for as much as they might not grow to any final conclusion in the absence of their chiefe commaunders, accorded it was that the day following the Consull and their Princes aforesaid should meet in that place together. Now the drift of the Gauls in making these delays and trifling off the time, was this, that first they might gaine some convenient space to transport over the river Halys all that ever they had (which they would not hazard with their owne persons, together with their wives and children) and afterwards to lay a

A traine of an ambush for the Consull himselfe, who tooke small regard, and was not provided for to prevent their vilanie intended under the colour of that conference. For that purpose, they chose a thousand horsemen out of all their cavallerie, of especiall valor and approved hardines, for the execution of this treacherous designe. And surely this their fraud had taken effect, if fortune had not defended and maintained the law of nations, which to breake and violate they had comploted. Certeine souldiers of the Romanes sent out to purvey forage and sewell, were directed to those very quarters whereas the partie abovesaid should be kept. The Colonels thought it the surer place for them, because they were to have the Consuls guard also opposed for their defense against the enemies: howbeit, they set another Corps de guard of their owne, consisting of 600 horsemen neerer to the camp. Now by reason that Attalus assured the Consull so certeinly, that their Princes would come, and that the matter might be soone knit up and dispatched, he departed out of the camp with the same guard of horsemen as before, and when he had marched almost five miles forward, and was not far short of the place appointed, he discovered all of a sodaine the Gaules riding full gallop against them in most furious maner as enemies; whereupon he staid the march and made a stand, commaunding the horsemen to make readie their weapons and resolve to fight. The first charge & thock he received right valiantly, & stepped not back one foot: but afterwards as the multitude preased still upon him, he began to give ground & recule, but so as he brake not the ranks of his troups. But in the end, when they found more danger in longer stay, than commoditie and help in keeping their arraies, they all at once turned their horse heads & fled. When they were disarrained once, the Gaules pursued hard and killed them: and no doubt a great part of them had died for it, but that the foragers guard of 600 horse aforesaid came in to reskue them. For they hearing a far off the fearefull cry of their fellowes, made readie their armour & horses, and being fresh and in hart, entred upon the fight that was given over by their wearied and discomfited companions: whereupon fortune quickly changed, and the feare turned from the loofers to the winners; for at the first encounter the Gaules were put to flight: and withall, the said foragers & fewellers came running out of the fields, and from all parts made head & affronted the Gaules; in so much as they could neither flie readily nor escape surely, because the Romans with their fresh horses followed them in chafe, and they themselves were already tired: few therefore went away with life, & not one was taken prisoner, for the greater part by ods paid derely by the losse of their lives, for violating this their parly under the colour of truth and fidelitie. The Romanes whiles their stomachs were inflamed with anger, the very next day came against them with the puissance of all their forces. But the Consull employed two whole daies himselfe in viewing and discovering the situation & nature of the hill, because he would not be ignorant of any thing requisit. Vpon the third day, after he had first taken the auspices & presages of the birds, and afterwards killed a sacrifice, he led forth his armie divided into 4 battailons. Two of them were to mount up the mids of the hill, and the other two to helpe in the sides to flanke the wings of the Gaules, and to march up against them. The Tectosages and Trocmians, who were the whole floure and strength of the enemies, made their maine battaile in the mids, consisting of 50000 men; and because there was no use of horse among those rough & uneven rocks, the cavallerie alight on foot to the number of 10000, & those they put in the right wing. The Cappadocians with Ariarates, and the auxiliarie Morzians, who arose to the number almost of 4000 men, held the left. The Consull (like as before in the mount Olympus) marshalled his light armour for skirmish in the forefront of the vaward, and gave order to have ready at hand as great store of darts & other shot of all sorts as he had before. When they approached one another, all things answered both of the one side & the other, like as in the former conflict, saving that the courage of the victors increased in regard of their fortunate successe, and the hearts of the enemies were much abated and daunted. For albeit themselves had not yet beene killed and vanquished, yet they tooke the overthrow and losse of their countymen for their owne. And therefore as the beginning of the battaile was furable, so the issue was semblable. For the Gaules battaile was overspred and covered againe as it were with a cloud of light shot. And not one of them durst run forth out of his raunge, for feare he should discover his whole body and lay it open to take all that came: and keeping still together as they did, the thicker they stood, the fairer marke they were for the enemies to levell at, and the more wounds they received. The Consull perceiving they were already of themselves troubled, and supposing that if he set forward and presented unto them the ensignes of the legions, they would immediately all of them them flie, received the light armed loose shot, & the rest of the auxiliarie souldiers within his own G ranks & files, and then advanced his legions. The Gauls affrighted with the fresh remembrance of the late defeat, & overthrow of the Tolistobogians, carrying also about themselves the darts sticking in their bodies, weary besides with long standing afoote, and overcharged likewise with many a wound, could not abide so much as the first onset and shout of the Roman legions. Then began they to take their heeles and flie toward their camp, but few of them recovered it, and gat within the rampier and other defences. The greater number fled here and there on both hands, and dispersed themselves into all parts as it tooke them in the head, and as every man in this confused fright caught a way by himselfe. The conquerors followed them still even hard to the very camp, and all the way charged upon their backs, and beat them downe. Which done, they staid and stuck still in the camp for desire of pillage, and there was not one that followed H one foot after. The Gauls in the wings stood to it longer, by reason that it was later ere they were set upon, but able they were not to abide the first charge and shot of the Romanes darts. The Consull, who could not possibly pluck those out of the camp that were once entred in, for greedines of spoiling and rising the tents, sent out those immediatly that were in the wings to follow the enemies in chase still forward. These pursued them a certaine space: howbeit in this flight (for in truth it was no fight at all) there were not above eight thousand that left their carriages behind them, all the rest recovered the other side of the river Halys. Many of the Romanes remained that night within the enemies camp; the rest the Consull brought back againe to his owne. The next day he tooke account and survey of the prisoners and prizes, which was so great as a man would conceive that a nation of all others most greedie of spoiling and spoiling, might possibly rake and heape together for so many yeeres, as they held all those parts within the mountaine Taurus by force of armes. The Gauls thus skattered in flight, rallied themselves into one place, and being many of them hurt or disarmed, and stripped cleane out of all they had, sent their embassadors unto the Consull to treat for peace. The Consull willed them to give attendance upon him at Ephesus: himselfe made hast to remove out of those cold quarters, by reason that the mountain Taurus was so neer (for now it was the mids of Autumne) and led back his victorious armie to passe the winter neere the sea side.

Whiles the affaires thus passed in Asia, all was quiet in the rest of the provinces. At Rome the Censors T. Quintius Flamininus and M. Claudius Marcellus made a new choice of Senators: and P. Scipio Africanus was chosen the president of the Senat now the third time: four K onely were left out and discarded; but not one of them had borne office of State, and had the honour to sit in the Curule chaire. The Censors shewed themselves likewise passing mild in the revision of the Cavallery and order of knighthood. They put out to framing the foundations and ground-works upon the Æquielium in the Capitoll: and likewise they bargained for to pave the street with hard flint or pebble, from the gate Capena to the temple of Mars. The Campanians demanded of the Senat, in what place they should be assessed and enrolled: and thereupon a decree passed for their enrolment at Rome. The rivers were out, and great deluges happened that year. The Tyber overflowed his bankes twelve times, and drowned Mars field and all the low parts of the cittie.

After that Cn. Manlius the Consull had brought the Gauls warre to an end in Asia, the other L Consull M. Fulvius having utterly subdued the Ætolians, passed over into Cephalenia; and sent to all the cities about the yland certaine messengers, to sound them whether they would rather yeeld themselves unto the Romanes, or hazard the fortune of warre? And so forcible was feare among them all, that there was not one person refused to surrender. And being enjoyed (according to the ability of the people who were but bare) to give hostages, the Nesioties, Cranians, Peleusians, and Sameans delivered twentie apeece. This peace no looner shone upon the Cephalenians beyond all their expectation, but sodainly one city of the Sameans revolted, and upon what cause it is not known: themselves alledged and said, That forasmuch as their cittie was leated in a commodious place, they feared greatly to bee dispossessed and turned out of it by the Romanes. But whether they onely imagined this and put themselves in fright, and so changed their quiet repose for vaine and foolish feare: or whether there had bene question hercof among the Romanes, and upon much canvassing in mens mouthe the rumour of such a matter, ran unto them, it is not certainly known. Only thus much; after they had given their hostages, they shut their cittie gates upon a sodaine; and desist they would not from their enter- prise,

A prise, for all the entreatie and prayers that their owne hostages made, whome the Consull had sent (for the nones) even under their walls, to moove their countrey men and parents to pity and compassion. When as therefore they would make no answer tending unto peace, the Consull began to assault the citie: and all the ordenance of artillerie and engines of batterie were under his hand, which had bene brought from the siege of Ambracia. And looke what workes and fabrickes were needfull besides to be made, the souldiours with great diligence and forwardnes performed. So in two places at once they planted rammes against the city and battered the walls. The Samæans on the other side for their part omitted & neglected nothing, that might either annoy the enemy or impeach the workes. But two things there were principally wherewith they made resistance and withstood their violence: the one was, a countermure within the cittie, B which they ever raised new in stead of the old, and full as strong as it that was demolished and broken downe: the other was, their often sodaine sallies, one while upon the fortifications and fabrickes, otherwhiles upon the corps de guard of the enemies: and for the most part in these skirmishes they had the better hand. But one meane there was devised, and the same of small thew to speake of, to restraine and keepe them in from sallying forth. The Romanes sent to Ægium,  Patrae*, and  Dimæ*, for an hundred slingers. These nations from their childhood used to exercise themselves (after the manner of the country) to discharge out of slings into the open sea certaine round stones, which commonly the shore is overspread with among the sands: C by reason of which exercise, they have more skill both to sling farther from them, and also to strike more surely and give a smarter rappe and stroke than those of the Baleare Ilands: for their sling is not made with one onely cord as the Balearians are, and those of other nations; but it hath three leather thongs hardened and made stiffe with many sutures and seamcs, least if the leathering were soft and gentle, the bullet and stone within should wagge too and fro and roll out in the delivery and hurling of it: but being setled and counterpoised (as it were) it went merrily away, as sent and driven out of the noose of a stone-bow. And so well practised they were in this feate, that they could a great way off level a bullet through garlands, rings, and hoops of small compasse, and misse not: nay they would be sure to hit, not onely the head of an enemy, but any part of the face that they aimed at, point blanke, and never faile. These slings (I say) made the Samæans to plucke in their heads, that they durst not sally out neither so often nor so boldly as they did. In somuch as from the walls they requested the Achæans for a while to goe D aside and repose themselves, and see them how they skirmished with the corps de gard of the Romanes. Four moneths space the Samæans endured the siege. Now when of that small number which they had, some or other daily dropt away, and wer either killed outright or wounded; and they that remained, were both tyred in bodie, and daunted in courage; the Romanes one night passed over the wall, by the fortresse which they call Cyatis (for the city where it boundeth upon the sea, lyeth toward the West) and entred so farre as the market place. After that the Samæans perceived, that one part of the citie was taken by the enemies, they fled with their wives and children into a greater fortresse, and the next day yielded: the towne was ransacked, and they themselves were all sold in ouvert market, to who would give most.

The Consull having set the state of Cephalenia in good order, and put a garrison within Samæa, passed into Peloponnesus, having bene called and sent for to come thither a long time, principally by the Ægians and Lacedæmonians. Time out of mind, and from the first beginning of the Diets of Achæa, the whole nation used to assemble and meet at Ægium ordinarily, were it for to grace and honour the citie, or because the place was commodious therefore. This ancient custome Philopamen that yeere began first to infringe, and went about to make a law and ordinance, That in all the cities of Achæa, their Counsels & Diets shall be holden in course and order at their times. And against the comming of the Consull, when the Demiurges of the free cities and states summoned the Diet to be kept at Ægium, Philopamen (Pretor for that time) came with a countre-summons and proclaimed it to be held at Argos. And when it was evident to be seen, that they all in manner minded thither to resort; the Consull also (albeit in affection F he favoured the Ægians) came to Argos: where, after much debate, seeing the matter growing the other way, he desisted from his desigine and gave over the cause. After this, the Lacedæmonians averted him from thence, and drew him away to the deciding of their controversies and dissensions. Certaine banished persons they were who most of all disquieted and troubled that state: and many of them had their abiding place in the castles coasting along the frontiers of the Laconian territorie toward the sea, which was taken wholly from the citie. The Lacedæmonians much discontented and offended hereat, entered one night a certaine borough called* Las, surprisid it unawares to the inhabitants, & kept it to their use; to the end, that if need were at any time to send Embassadors to Rome or els whither, they might have some free access unto the sea: and withall, be served of a mart-towne for vent, and a place of receit for all forreine merchandise from straungers to their necessarie uses. The townesmen within, as also the exiles aforesaid (there dwelling) were terrified at the first with this sodaine and unexpected occurrence: but afterward (before day-light) when they had once rallied themselves together, with small adoe and skirmish chased forth the Lacedæmonians: howbeit, the feare spred over all the sea coast, so that in one generall accord, the castles and villages every one, yea and the exiled persons (as many as there inhabited) dispatched their Embassadors to the Achæans. Philopamen their Pretour (who ever from the beginning friended the cause of the banished, and had alwaies advised and counsellid the Achæans to abate and take downe the puissance and reputation of the Lacedæmonians) graunted them at their suite and seeking, a Diet. In which (upon a motion by him made) there passed a decree in this forme: That whereas T. Quintius and the Romanes, had committed and delivered to the safegard and protection of the Achæans, the fortresses, burroughes, and villages, situate along the sea coast of the Laconians, and (by vertue of a covenant and accord) the Lacedæmonians had nothing to doe therein, but ought to forbear them; and yet notwithstanding, the towne Las was by them forced, and a great massacre there committed: therefore unless the principals and accessaries both of that outrage, were yielded to the Achæans, they deemed the covenant and accord in that behalfe provided, to be broken. Hereupon incontinently were embassadors addressid to Lacedæmon, to challenge and demand the parties aforesaid: but the Lacedæmonians took this for so proud a commaundement, and as thought it such an indignitie, that without all doubt, if they had beene in as good estate then, as sometimes they were, they would immediately have taken aimes. But nothing troubled and disquieted their spirits so much as this, for feare least if once they received the yoke of subjection upon their neckes, in yielding obedience to their first hefts, Philopamen would effect and put in execution that which he long intended and went about; even to deliver the citie Lacedæmon into the hands of the banished aforesaid. Enraged therefore with choller and anger, they fell upon thirtie of that faction who were comploted in counsell with Philopamen and the exiles, and slew them out-right; and withall made a decree, To renoune and reject all societie with the Achæans; and forthwith to send their Embassadors to Cephalenia, with commission, to deliver Lacedæmon unto M. Fulvius & the Romanes; and to beseech him to take the pains to come into Peloponnesus, there to receive the citie Lacedæmon under the obeisance and protection of the people of Rome. When the embassadors had made relation herof to the Achæans, presently war was proclaimed against the Lacedæmonians, by common consent of all the states of that assembly and generall counsell: but the winter impeached them for entring into any action & present execution. Howbeit they made small rodes into their frontiers, and wasted the same not only by land, but also by sea, after the maner of robberie & piracie, rather than of warlike hostilitie. These troubles drew the Cos. into Peloponnesus, and by his commaundement a Diet was published to be holden at Elis; and thither were the Lacedæmonians sent for to argue and debate their cause. Where there was not only much reasoning and dispute, but also wrangling and altercation. The Consull who in other points bare himselfe nicely ynough, and answered in doubtfull tearmes, as one willing to entertaine both parts, determined and ended the controversie in one only word, warning them both to put up their swords, and lay armes aside, untill they had sent their embassadors to the Senate of Rome. So there were embassages addressid both from the one and the other to Rome. In likewise the banished Lacedæmonians joined their cause and embassie with the Achæans. Diophanes and Lycortas, both Megapolitanes, were the chiefe in the embassage of the Achæans, who as they jarred and disagreed in the managing of State-affaires, so they accorded not but varied in the speeches that they delivered. Diophanes referred the decision of all matters unto the Senate, as who were best able to compose all controversies between the Achæans and Lacedæmonians. But Lycortas, instructed by Philopamen, required that the Achæans might do and execute whatsoever they had ordained; according to the covenant, & the conditions therein comprised; and that they would maintaine their full libertie without abridging and empairing the same, according as they had received it at their hands. The nation of the Achæans

Ans in those daies was in great credite and reputation at Rome, howbeit the Senate thought it not good to make any chaunge and alteration in the State of the Lacedæmonians. In conclusion, they returned such an intricate and doubtfull answer, that both the Achæans might construe it, as if they had permission and free libertie to doe what they would with Lacedæmon, and the Lacedæmonians againe tooke it, as though they had not so large a scope and absolute power allowed them, as to doe their pleasure in every thing. But this authoritie and libertie whatsoever it was, more or lesse, the Achæans stretched beyond all measure and compasse, and used it too proudly and insolently. Philopamen continued still in place of soveraine government, and levied a power to be readie in the beginning of the spring, and so encamped upon the frontiers of the Lacedæmonians. This done, hee sent his embassadors to demand the deliverie of them into his hands, who were the authours of the revolt; promising withall, that if they would so doe, their citie should remaine in peace without any molestation, and they suffer and sustain no harm, before they had answered for themselves in open audience. All the rest for feare kept silence and said not a word, only they whom he had challenged by name, made offer of themselves to go, under safe conduct received from the embassadors, and faithfull promise that no violence should be done upon their persons, untill they had pleaded their answer. Accompanied they were with divers noble personages of great marke and name, both as advocates unto them in their particular quarrels, and also in regard of the Commonweale, as farre as their private cause any way touched and concerned it. Never had the Achæans beforetime brought the Lacedæmonian exiles with them into the confines of Lacedæmon, because they supposed that nothing might so much alienate and estrange the hearts of the whole citie as that. But then the whole head, as it were, of the vaward, were no other but those banished persons. And as the Lacedæmonians aforesaid were coming, who should meet and affront them arraunged in order of battell at the very gate of the campe, but they? At the first they welcommed them with chiding and railing, after that they fell to bitter words and braules, and their bloud was up on both sides, insonmuch as those of the banished crew who were of hottest spirit and sharpest metall, made no more adoe but ran upon the Lacedæmonians: whereupon they called the gods to witnesse, and cried to the embassadors for protection; who together with the Pretour himselfe came between, voided the prease, and safeguarded the persons of the Lacedæmonians, empeaching and staying some of their hands who were already about to bind them and make them sure. But the tumult still increased, and the multitude was all up on a hurrey. The Achæans ran first to see only what the matter was, and to be lookers on. But afterwards, when the exiles began with a loud voice to crie out, and report what wrongs and injuries they had sustained, beseeching them of their helpe, and avouching withall right confidently, that if they let slip this opportunitie, they should never have the like againe, alleading moreover, That the league first made in the Capitoll, after renewed at Olympia, and last of all confirmed by a sacred oth in the castle of Athens, had ben broken and disannulled by them, and therefore the guiltie and culpable parties were to be punished accordingly, before they entreed into any bond of new accord. At these words the multitude was incensed, and by occasion of one mans voice, who cried to strike and knocke them downe, fell to flinging stones at them. And by this meanes seventene of them, who during the garboile chanced to be tied in bonds, were stoned to death. The rest, to the number of fixe and thirtie, were the next morrow apprehended, whom the Pretour had sheelded and protected from violence, not for any desire hee had to save their lives, but because hee would not have them miscarie and perish before they were heard. These were presented and exposed as a prey to the unruly and angrie multitude: & when they had made some small speech unto them, from which they turned away their eares, they were all condemned and delivered over to be led to execution. When the Lacedæmonians were once put in this feare, then they were commaunded, Imprimis To demolish and breake downe their walls. Item, That all forraigne auxiliarie souldiours, who were waged and served for pay under the tyrants, should avoid out of the Laconian countrey. Item, That all the slaves whom those tyrants had set free (and of such there was a great number) should depart before a certaine day; and that it might be lawfull for the Achæans to attach the bodies, to sell and carrie away as many as staid and remained behind. Item, That they should abolish the lawes ordinances and customes of Lycurgus, and frame themselves to live after the fashions and manners of the Achæans, so that they should be incorporate into one civile bodie, and better accord and sort together in all things. They condescended to none of all these conditions

tions more willingly and sooner, than to the raising of their walls, and nothing troubled them so much and vexed their heart, as the restoring of the banished persons. Howbeit there passed an act at Tegea for their restitution in a generall Counsell of all the Achæans there held. In which assembly, upon a report and mention made, that the mercenarie strangers above specified, and the new enrolled Lacedæmonians called Alcripti (for so they termed them, who by the tyrants were enfranchised and endued with freedom) had abandoned the citie, and were departed sundry waies into the countrey, it was thought good before the armie was dissolved and cased, that the Pretor should go with a companie lightly armed and appointed, to lay hold upon all that sort of people, and make sale of them, as of a prize and bootie gained from the enemies. Many of them were apprehended and sold. And with the money raised of them, that porch or gallerie at Megalopolis, which had been ruinate by the Lacedæmonians, was by the permission of the Achæans reedified. Likewise the territorie of Belbina, which the Lacedæmonian tyrants unjustly held in possession, was laid againe to that citie, according to an old decree of the Achæans, which was made during the reigne of king Philip, sonne of Amyntas. The citie of the Lacedæmonians by this meanes much enfeebled, continued a long time in subjection and thraldome under the Achæans. But their State received dammage by no one thing so much, as by the abolishing of the discipline of Lycurgus, to which they had bene used and accustomed for the space of seven hundred yeares.

Presently after the holding of this Diet, wherein the Achæans and Lacedæmonians debated their causes before the Consull, M. Fulvius repaired to Rome (for that the yeare was almost expired) against the solemne election of new magistrates; wherein he created for Consule, M. Valerius Messala, and C. Livius Salinator, and gave the repulic to M. Aemilius Lepidus his enemy, who that yeere made suite also to be Consull. This done, there were Pretours also chosen, to wit, Q. Martius Philippus, M. Claudius Marcellus, C. Stertinius, C. Catinius, P. Claudius Pulcher, and L. Manlius Acidinus. When this election was ended, it was thought expedient that M. Fulvius should returne into his former province to the armie there: and not only he, but his colleague also Cn. Manlius, had their commission revived, and they continued in government another yeere. The same yeere according to the direction of the Decemvirs, there was brought unto the temple of Hercules the statue of the same god: and within the Capitoll were set up by Cn. Cornelius sixe steeds in gold drawing a chariot with this inscription, That he being Consull, gave that present. Also P. Claudius and Serv. Sulpitius Galba, Ediles Curule, hung up twelve brazen shields, made of the fines that certeine commudgins paid, for hourding up and keeping in their graine. Moreover Q. Fulvius Flaccus an Edile of the Commons, erected two golden images raised of the monie that one guiltie person was condemned in (for they commended their actions severally by themselves.) As for A. Cecilius his companion, he condemned none. The Romane great games were set forth all throughout, thrice: and the Plebeian plaies exhibited likewise full and whole, five times.

After this, M. Valerius Messala and C. Livius Salinator, entred their Consulship upon the 15. day of March, and proposed before the Senat as concerning the affaires of the State, touching their provinces also, and the armies. As for Ætolia and Asia, there was no change at all. The Consull, by a decree of the Senat had the charge, one of Pisæ, together with the Ligurians; and the other of Gaul: and they were commaunded either to agree betwene themselves, or to cast lots for their provinces. They were enjoyned also to levie new armies, and each of them to enroll two legions, and either of them to charge the allies of the Latine nation with 15000 foot, & 1200 horsemen. Vnto Messala fell the government of Liguria: and to Salinator of Gaul. After this, the Pretors likewise cast lots for their provinces: the jurisdiction within Rome of citizens was allotted to M. Claudius, and of forainers to P. Claudius. Sicilie to Q. Martius, Sardinia to C. Stertinius, high Spaine to L. Manlius, and the low to C. Atinius. As for the armies, ordeined it was, that the legions under the conduct of C. Lælius should be withdrawne out of Gaul, and made over to M. Tuccius the Propretour for to serve in the Brutians countrie. Item, That the forces which were in Sicilie should be discharged: and that M. Sempronius the Vizpretor there, should bring from thence the fleet to Rome. Ordeined likewise it was, that either of the provinces of Spaine should have one legion, which at that time served there; and that both the Pretors should for supplie levie of the allies three thousand foote and two hundred horsemen apeece, and transport the same over with them. Now before that these new governors went to their provinces, by order from the whole colledge & societie of the Decemvirs, there was published a generall procession and supplication to be holden for 3 dayes in all the quarters or crosse streets of the citie: for that in the day time between the third hour & the fourth, there arose a generall darkenes which continued almost all that while. Moreover, a Novendiall sacrifice was published to be celebrated for 9 days together, because on the Aventine hill it had rained stones.

The Campanes, when as the Censors (by vertue of an act of Senat which passed the former yeere) compelled them to be enrolled at Rome, (for aforesaid they knew not where to be enrolled) made petition now that they might contract mariages and take Romane citizens to their wives; and that whosoever had wedded any of them before, might keepe them still; and what children soever they had borne before that day, should be reputed legitimate and their rightfull heires. Both suites were graunted. As concerning the free burgeses of Formiæ, Fundi, and Arpinum, C. Valerius Tappo a Tribune of the Com. preferred a bill, that they might be privileged to geve their voyces in Rome: for before that time, citizens in deed they were of Rome, (and that was all) for libertie of suffrages they had none. This bill was crossed and nipped by foure other Tribunes, because it was propounded without the warrant and approbation of the Senat. But being afterwards better adviled and enformed, that it appertained to the people and not to the Senat to geve their voyces where it pleased them, they gave over their enterprise, and opposed themselves no more to hinder the proceeding thereof. So it passed; and enacted it was, That the Formians and Fundans should geve their voyces in the tribe Æmilia; and the Arpinates in Cornelia: so in these tribes then first and never before, were they enrolled by an act of the same Valerius. M. Claudius Marcellus the Censor tooke a survey of the citie, and by lot obtained the preeminence thereof before his colleague T. Quintus. In which there were numbred 258308 polles of Romane citizens. This review being accomplished, the Consuls tooke their journeyes into their severall provinces.

During that winter season whiles these things thus passed at Rome, there resorted embassages from all States, cities and nations which inhabit on this side Taurus, unto Cn. Manlius first Consull, and afterwards Proconsull, whiles he kept his winter in Asia. And as the victorie achieved over Antiochus was more honorable & glorious to the Romans, than that over the Gauls, so the conquest of the Gauls was more joyous and pleasing to the Romane allies, than that other of Antiochus. For the servitude in which the king held them was more tolerable, than the crueltie of these savage and inhumane barbarians, and the doubtful feare and fright wherein they stood every day; as not knowing how far forth they would proceede, caried so (as it were) in a tempest to wait & spoile them cleane. And therefore as nations who by the defeature of Antiochus recovered libertie, & by the subduing of the Gauls enjoyed peace, they presented themselves not only to geve thanks and shew their contentment in that behalfe, but also brought with them certeine coronets of gold, every one according to their abilitie. Likewise there came embassadors from Antiochus, as also from the very Gauls, to have conditions of peace ministred unto them: yea and from Ariarates king of the Cappadocians, who craved pardon, and offered to buy out his trespasses for mony, in that he had given aid unto Antiochus: and fined he was to pay 200 talents of silver. The Gauls had this answer returned unto them, That K. Eumenes when he came should tender unto them articles of peace. The embassages of the other states and cities were dismissed with gracious answers, and went away better pleased and contented, than they were at their coming. The embassadors of Antiochus were commaunded to bring monie into Pamphylia, and come likewise, according to the covenant made with L. Scipio: for thither the Consull purposed himselfe to come with his armie. After this, having taken a review and survey of his forces, he set forward in the beginning of spring, and within 8 daies arrived at Apamea. There he sojourned in camp for three daies: from thence he removed, and at the third daies end came to Pamphylia, whither he had given order to the kings embassadors to convey their mony & corne. There he received 1500 talents of silver which were transported unto Apamea. The corne was divided in the armie. From thence he marched to Perga, which was the only country in those parts held with a garison. When he approached, the captain of the garison met him on the way, requesting xxx daies space, in which time he might know the pleasure of K. Antiochus as touching the rendering of that citie. The time was granted, & within that day the garison quit the place & departed. From Perga he sent his brother L. Manlius with 400 souldiers to Oroanda, for to demand the rest of the money which by promise was due: and himselfe because he was advertised that

K. Eumenes and the deputies or commissioners were come from Rome to Ephesus, retired with G his armie also to Ephesus, and commanded the embassadors of Antiochus to follow him thither. There, by the advice of the ten commissioners, a small league was concluded, and comprised in these or such like termes: There shall be amitie and friendship betweene king Antiochus and the people of Rome, under these conditions ensuing. Imprimis, The king shall not suffer to passe through any part of his realme, or their countries that are under his dominion, any armie that intendeth to make warre against the people of Rome or their associates, nor aid them with vituals or any other succour whatsoever. Item, The Romanes and their allies shall doe the like by Antiochus, and all those that are under his subjection. Item, It shall not be lawfull for Antiochus either to make warre with those that inhabit the Ilands, or to passe over into Europe. Item, He shall quit all cities, lands, villages, and fortresses on this side the mountaine Taurus unto the H river Tanais; and moreover from the foot and valley under the said hill, unto that ridge thereof which bendeth toward Lycaonia. Item, Out of those townes, territories, and castles which he is to void, he shall carrie away no armour: and if he have conveyed from thence any already, he shall duly restore the same to everie place accordingly. Item, He shall receive neither souldiour nor any other person out of the kingdom of Eumenes. Item, If any citizens belonging to those cities which are dismembred and cut off from his realme, chauce to remaine now with him, they shall returne all to Apamea within a certaine day. Item, As many as appertaine to the kingdom of Antiochus, and are now with the Romanes or their allies, may depart home or stay still at their pleasure. Item, All slaves, whether they be fugitives or taken captive in warre; likewise all other persons free of condition before, and afterwards either taken prisoners or revolted, he shall deliver againe to the Romanes and their allies. Item, He shall make deliverie of all his elephants, and shall provide himselfe of no more hereafter. Item, He shall yeeld up all his galleies of warre, with the tackling to them belonging: neither shall hee keepe above ten small vessels, and none of them shall have more than thirtie oars to guide and row them; nor so much as one *galley with a single banke of oars, to serve in any warre that himselfe shall first begin. Item, Hee shall not saile within the promontories of Calycadnum & Sarpedon, unless haply there be some ship that bringeth moyny, embassadors, or hostages. Item, It shall not be lawfull for king Antiochus to levie and wage any souldiours out of those nations which are subject to the people of Rome; no nor to entertaine so much as voluntaries from thence. Item, What houses and edifices belonging to the Rhodians and their allies, are now within the precincts of the realme of Antiochus, shall returne to the said Rhodians and their associates, in as good estate and tenour as they were before the warre began. And if any money or debts be to them due, they may demand and recover the same. Item, If ought have been taken from them, they shall have good law and right to search, owne, demand, and challenge it againe. Item, If any of those cities which ought to be rendred, be held by those unto whom Antiochus hath committed them, he shall withdraw the garrisons from thence, and take order that they be surrendered accordingly. Item, Hee shall pay within twelve yeeres by even portions, 12000 Atticke talents of good and lawfull silver: provided, that every talent weigh no lesse than eightie pound after Roman poise; besides 540000 modij of wheate. Item, Hee shall pay unto king Eumenes 350 talents within five yeeres; and for corne according to the rate and proportion 127 talents. Item, He shall send L unto the Romanes 20 hostages, and change them for others every three yeeres: provided, that they be not under 18 yeere of age, nor above 45. Item, If any allies of the people of Rome, begin of their owne motion to make warre upon king Antiochus, it shall be lawfull for him to revenge himselfe, and use forcible meanes to withstand their violence: yet so, as he hold no citie in right of warre, nor receive any into amitie: and all controversies which shall arise betweene them, shall be decided by law and justice; or if both parties be so pleased, they shall trie the issue by force of armes. Item, It was comprised also within the covenants of this accord, That hee should deliver into the Romans hands, Annibal the Carthaginian, Tibeca the Etolian, Mnasimachus the Acarnanian, Enbulus likewise and Philo the Chalcidians. Finally, if ought hereafter happened to be added moreover, or chaunged otherwise, the same in no case to prejudice any M thing contained within the covenants aforesaid. To this accord the Consull swore; & to receive the kings oth likewise, there went unto him Q. Minutius Thermus and L. Manlius, he who returned at that time to returne from the Oroadians. And the Consull wrote his letters to Q. Fab. Labeo admirall of the fleet, presendly to come to Patara, and what ships soever of the kings were there, to

A to hew them in pieces, and make a light fire of them. So he departed from Ephesus, and either brake into fitters or burnt, 50 covered ships belonging to the king. In the same voyage & exploit he surprised and woon Telmessus, by reason that the townesmen were so affrighted at the sodaine coming of the flecte. Then forthwith hee departed out of Lycia, and having given order to those that were left behind at Ephesus to follow after, he crossed the seas (betweene the Ilands) over into Greece. After he had sojourned some few daies at Athens, untill the ships from Ephesus were entered into the harbour of Pyraeum: from thence he brought backe his whole armada to Italie. Cn. Manlius having received (among other things which were to be yeelded up of Antiochus) the elephants also, and bestowed them all freely upon Eumenes, gave audience to the controversies of many cities and states, amongst whom (during these changes and alterations) there arose sundry troubles and much variance. And Ariarates the king, who by the means and mediation of Eumenes (unto whom about that time he had affianced his daughter in marriage) was discharged and had acquittance for the one moitie of the mony imposed upon him, entered into amitie with the people of Rome. When the differences of the cities aforesaid were debated and known, the ten Commissioners set down an order betweene them, respectively to their condition. To as many as had beene tributaries to king Antiochus, and yet sided with the people of Rome in affection, they graunted franchise and immunitie: but as many as tooke part with Antiochus, or were tributaries unto king Attalus, those were commaunded to pay their customes and duties to king Eumenes. Moreover, they freed and exempted from all taske and tallage (expressly by name) the Colophomans inhabiting Notium, together with the Cymeans and the C Milesians. Unto the Clazonemians (over and besides the same freedome) they gave the Iland Drymusa. To the Milesians also the territorie called Sacer: to the Ilians, they annexed Rhæteum and Gergithus, not so much for any fresh and late deserts, as in memoriall of their auncient beginning and foundation; which was the cause also that they set Dardanus free. Semblably the Chians, Smyrneans, and Erythraeans, for their singular loyaltie and devoir which they shewed in that warre, they not only indued with faire lands and territories, but also graced with all kind of honour and reputation above the rest. Moreover, the Phocæans had both their owne lands restored unto them which they enjoyed before the war, and also libertie to live under their auncient lawes. As for the Rhodians, they had those things now confirmed and established unto them, which by a former decree were granted: and to better their estate, Lycia and Caria were D bestowed upon them, as farre as the river Maeander; all save the citie Telmessus. Unto the dominion of king Eumenes, they laid Chersonesus in Europe; and Lyfimachia, with all the castles, villages, and lands thereto belonging, in as large termes and ample manner as Antiochus held the same: also within Asia, the one and the other Phrygia, as well that which continueth upon Hellespont, as the other which they call the Greater. Moreover, they restored unto him Mysia, which king Prusias had taken from him: over and besides, Lycaonia, Mylias, and Lydia; together with these cities by speciall name, Tralleis, Ephesus, and Telmessus. As touching Pamphylia, some debate there was betweene the agents of Eumenes and the Embassadors for Antiochus, because one part thereof is situate on this side the mount Taurus, and the other lyeth beyond. The decision of this controversie was wholly referred to the arbitrement of the Senate. Manlius having set downe these covenants and decrees, departed with the ten Legates and all his armie toward Hellespont; and when he had caused the princes of the Gaules thither to repaire before him, he declared unto them in what termes, & under what conditions they should entertaine peace with Eumenes: and therewith he gave them warning, to leave their manner of roding and roving in hostile wise by force of armes, and to containe themselves within the precincts and bounds of their owne territories. After this, having gathered into one place all the vessels from the sea coasts, together with the entire flore of king Eumenes, which by his brother Atteneus was brought from Elea, he transported all his forces into Europe. From whence hee marched through Chersonesus by short and easie journies, because his armie was heavily charged with prizes and booties of all sorts, and encamped at Lyfimachia, purposing there to rest a while, F to the end that his travelling beasts of draught and cariage, might be fresh and in good heart to passe through Thracia, which was a voiage and journey commonly feared and abhorred. The same day that hee dislodged from Lyfimachia, he came to the river which they call Melas; & from thence the next day to Cypsela. When they were past Cypsela, they had for ten miles almost no other way, but through wild woods, narrow streights, and those rough withall and uneven under derfoot. For the difficultie of which passage, the armie was devided into two parts. The one hee G commaunded to march before, the other to come behind in the rereward a great distance after, and in the middelt betweene, he bestowed the carriages with bag and baggage, & amongst them were waggons and waines, laden with the publicke treasure, and other pillage of great price. As he thus marched through the streight passe, there were about ten thousand and not above, raised out of foure nations of Asia, to wit, the Astians, Cæniens, Maduarenes, and Cœletes, who beset the streights to debarre them of passage. It was supposed that king Philip of Macedonie his hand was herein, and that they entred not into this action without his privitie and fraudulent practise; who as he knew that the Romanes could returne no other way but by Thracia, so he was ware and wist well enough what a masse of money they carried with them. The Romanes Generall himselfe was in the vaward, careful only & troubled about the difficultie of the way. All this while the Thra- H cians sat still and stirred not, untill the armed souldiours were passed by. But when they perceived once, that the vauntguard was gotten out of the streights, and that the rereward was farre ynough behind, they fel in hand with the packes and coffers of the carriages; and after they had killed the guards, some of them ransacked and rifled that which was in the waggons, others led away the packe horses and other sumpter beasts with their lode and burden on their backs. Hereupon arose a crie and alarme, and was first heard of those that followed, but afterwards of them also in the forward, and so from both ends they ran to the middelt, and at one time in diverse places, skirmished without all order confusedly. The Thracians heavily charged and encombered with pillage, and most of them without any weapon at all, because they might have the use of their hands more nimble and deliver to snatch and catch unto them their prizes, were by this meanes more exposed to receive hurt, and soone killed. The Romanes againe were much distressed and annoied through the disadvantage of the ground and the waies; which the barbarous people were well ynough acquainted with, and out of them would issue forth to encounter, and other-whiles lurke within hollow blind caves, and not bee seene. The very packes likewise and the waggons, standing and lying untowardly in the way, sometime of one, and sometime of other (as it happened) troubled and hindered them much in their fight. So as here in one place lay the theete dead, there in another the true man that pursued him. And according as the plot of ground was good or bad, as well for the one sort as the other, as their hearts and courages served or failed them, and as the number was more or lesse, so the medley and fight was variable: and in one word, of both sides many a man lay in the dust and lost his life. By which time the night approached, and the Thracians departed out of the conflict, not so much to avoid wounds and for feare of death, as for that they had sped themselves sufficiently of prizes. The Romanes vaward encamped without the Forrest, in the open ground about the temple of Bendis*. The rereward remained still behind in the middelt of the woods to guard their carriage, fortified within a double pallisado of strong stakes. The morrow after, when they had well discovered by their espials the way before them, they joined themselves with the vauntguard. In this battell (over and besides a great part of their pillage lost, and a number of camp-followers and lackies slaine, with some souldiours also, for that there was skirmishing every where throughout the chafie) there died Q. Minutius Thermus: and a right great losse there was of him, for he was a man of much valour and execution. That day the armie marched as farre as to the river Hebrus. From whence they passed through the confines of the Ænians, neere unto the temple of Apollo, whome the inhabitants name Zerynthius. And there they met with another streight passage about a place called Tempyra, as rough and comberfome under foot as the former. But for as much as there were no woods about it, it yeilded no good place for ambushes. Howbeit the Thrausians (a people likewise of Thrace) assembled together, hoping also to light upon the like bootie. But by reason that the vallies lay naked and open, so as if any beset the narrow waies they might be discovered a farre off, the Romanes were lesse afraid and troubled. For, say that they were to fight in some place of disadvantage, yet they might arrauange themselves in battell ray in open field, and joine in close fight hand to hand. Being therefore embattelled in squadrons thicke and strong, they charged the enemy with a great shout and crie, and at the first shooke M forced them to recule and lose ground, and afterwards to turne backe and flie. And in the rout they were beaten downe and killed; for even their owne streights which they seized for their vantage, empeached and hindered themselves. The Romanes having gotten the victorie, encamped neere a village of the Maronites, called Sare. The next day they marched through the champion open

A open countrey Priaticus, where they sojourned three daies to take in corne, partly from out of the fields of the Maronites, which willingly of themselves they conferred upon them, and partly out of their owne ships, which followed after, well furnished with all kind of provision. From this giste they made but one daies journey to Apollonia, and so passing through the territorie of the Abderites, they came to Naples. All this way they journeyed peaceably through the Colonies of the Greeks. But the rest behind, if it were not dangerous unto them for any hostilitie, yet suspected still it was; all the whiles that they passed night and day through the middelt of the Thra-cians, untill at length they came into Macedonie. The same armie conducted sometime before by Scipio that very way, found the Thracians more gentle and tractable, for no other cause, but that they had lesse store of pillage and bootie with them to set their teeth on water, and fingers B on itching. And yet even then also (as Claudius writeth) there were a fiftene thousand Thracians that encountered Mutines the Numidian, as hee marched before the avauntguard to discover the coasts; and hee saith, that he had in his companie foure hundred Numidian horsemen, and some few elephants: also that his sonne, with an elect wing of a hundred and fiftie horse, brake through the middelt of the enemies, who also within a while after, (when his father Mutines having placed the elephants in the middelt, and the horsemen in the flanks, joined in battell with his enemies, charged them upon the backs, and put them in great feare) by meanes of which storme and tempest (as it were) of the Cavallerie, they never came so farre, as to deale with the battell of the footmen. Cn. Manlius led his armie through Macedonie into Thessalie, and marching on by the way of Epirus, arrived at Apollonia, where hee abode all winter. For hee made C not so light a matter of winter sailing, that hee durst take the sea, and hazard the passage at that time of the yeere.

The yeere almost expired, M. Valerius the Consull returned out of Liguria to Rome, for the creation of new magistrates, having achieved no such memorable exploit in his province during the time of his government, as might have yeilded any colourable reason of his long stay, in that he came more tardie (than the usuall manner was) to the assembly for an election of Consuls: (for holden it was upon the * 12 calends of March) wherein were created, Mar- 13 of Februarie.
Aemilius Lepidus and C. Flaminius. The next day after, these Pretors were elected; namely, Ap-Claudius Pulcher, Ser. Sulpitius Galba, Q. Terentius Culleo, L. Terentius Massiliota, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and M. Furius Crassipes. After the election of magistrates, the Consull proposed to the D Senate as touching the provinces and governments of the Pretors. And the LL. decreed, that two of them should remaine at Rome, to minister lawes and execute justice: other two should bee employed out of Italie, in Sicilie and Sardinia: two in Italie, to wit, at Tarentum and in Gaulle. Immediately before they entred into office, they were enjoyned to cast lots: and Ser. Sulpitius had the jurisdiction of the citizens, and Q. Terentius of strangers and aliens: L. Terentius took the charge of Sicilie, Q. Fulvius of Sardinia, Ap. Claudius was to govern Tarentum, & M. Furius to rule Gallia. It fortuned the same yeere, that L. Minutius Myrtilus and L. Manlius were delivered to the Carthaginian Embassadors, by the hands of the Fæciall heralds at the commandement of M. Claudius Pretor of the citie for the time being, and transported over to Carthage, for that the voice and speech went, That they had beaten the said embassadours. A bruit and rumour there was of a great warre begun in Liguria, and which encreased every day more than E other. Whereupon the Senate ordained to both the new Consuls the province of Liguria, that day on which they propounded unto the Senate to consult about the provinces and the affaires of the Commonweale. But Lepidus the Consull opposed himselfe against this their act and ordinance, alledging That it was a shameful indignitie, that both the Consuls should be shut up and enclosed within the vallies of Liguria; whereas for two yeers alreadie M. Fulvius and Cnce Manlius had reigned like kings, the one in Europe, the other in Asia, in steed of Philip and Antiocchus. And if (quoth he) it bee the pleasure of the Senate that there should bee armies maintained in those parts, more meet ywis it were, that Consuls should have the command & conduct therof, than those privat persons. As for them, they raunge about those nations, terrifying them F with threats of warre, against whome there hath bene none proclaimed; making merchandise and selling peace among them for summes of money. Now if it bee requisite and needfull to keepe two armies for the government and defence of those provinces, like as M. Fulvius and *Cn.
 Manlius* Consuls, succeeded M. Atilius and L. Scipio Consuls: so C. Livius and M. Valerius the Consuls ought to have entred in place of Fulvius and Manlius. At leastwise now, when the Attolian

lian warre is finished and brought to an end, Asia recovered and conquered from Antiochus, and the Gauls vanquished and subdued, either ought Consuls to bee sent unto their armies, or else the legions to be brought back from thence, and at length delivered to the Commonwealth. The Senate notwithstanding they gave him the hearing, persisted still in their resolution, that both Consuls should be imployed in the province of Liguria. Yet thought good it was, that Marcius and Fulvius should leave their provinces, withdraw their forces from thence, and returne to Rome. An old grudge there was and a cankred enmitie betwene the said M. Fulvius, and M. Aemilius the Consull: and among other matters of discontentment, Aemilius gave out, that by the meanes of Fulvius, himselfe was created Consull two yeeres later than otherwise he should have bene. And therefore to worke him despight and make him odious to the world, he caused the embassadors of Ambracia (whom he had suborned and set on for to lay matters to his charge) to enter into the Senate house. These being in place, complained that M. Fulvius had warred upon them, at what time as they were in peace, performed all that other Consuls before had imposed upon them, and were also readie in all dutie and allegiance to do the same unto him. First our lands and territories say they, were piteously spoiled & wasted: then were we terrified with the sacking of our citie, and threatened with the killing of our people, that for very feare we were forced to shut our gates. Afterwards we were beleaguered and assaulted, and against us all kinds of hostilitie practised, by sword, by fire, by ruining and ransacking our citie. Our wives, our children, have bene led and haled into captivitie and bondage; our goods violently taken from us (and that which above all went neereest to our heart) our temples throughout the whole citie despoiled and robbed of their goodly ornaments: the images of our gods, and finally our gods themselves plucked out of their shrines and places and so caried away; yea, the very walls and pillers left bare and naked, so as the Ambracians have no gods remaining amongst them to adore, and to whome they might make their prayers and supplications. As they poured out their complaints, the Consull of a mind to aggravate and heape more matter upon his adversarie, ceased not to propose unto them many interrogatories (as it was complotted betwene them before) and drew them on to speake many things, as if with their good will they would not have uttered them. When the rest of the LL. were moved herewith, then the other Consull C. Flaminius undertooke the apologie and defence of M. Fulvius, saying, That the Ambracians trod in an old beaten way, and did no otherwise than some before them had done. For even so was M. Marcellus accused by the Syracusians, so was Q. Fulvius charged by the Capuans. And why by the same meanes suffered they not T. Quintius to be charged by king Philip, M. Atilius and L. Scipio by Antiochus, Cn. Manlius by the Gauls, and the same Fulvius himselfe by the Aetolians and people of Cephalenia? That Ambracia was assaulted, battered, and forced in the end; that images and ornaments were taken from thence; that other acts were done and committed, which usually follow upon the winning of townes, thinke yee my LL. that either I in the behalfe of Fulvius will denie, or Fulvius himselfe will disavow? who, in regard of these worthie exploits and noble acts, is minded to demand at your hands the honor of a Triumph, who purposeth to carie before his triumphant chariot the portraiture of Ambracia as it was taken, the images which they accuse him to have caried away, and other spoiles of that citie; yea and to set them upon the posts of his house for a memoriall to posteritie? No reason theris that the Ambracians should sever themselves from the Aetolians, and do more than they, for their case and condition is all one. And therefore let my colleague shew his rancor and malice, and bewray a festered enmitie in some other cause: or if he will needs follow and pursue this forward, let him intertaine and keepe still his Ambracians unto the coming of M. Fulvius. And for mine owne part, I will suffer no act to passe either of the Ambracians or the Aetolians, so long as M. Fulvius is absent. Aemilius accused his enemy for having a craftie head of his owne, and for his fittle fetches, as being notorious and well knowne to all men for no better; saying, that full cunningly he would trifle out the time, and make delays all the yeere long, that he might not come to Rome so long as his adversarie was Consull. Thus in this debate betwene the two Consuls two dayes were spent, and nothing els done. And it appeared evidently that so long as Flaminius was in place and presence, nothing could be concluded and determined. Whereupon a time was spied out when Flaminius chanced to be sick, and by that occasion was away. Then upon a motion made by Aemilius there passed an act of the Senate, That the Ambracians should have all their goods restored unto them againe; that they should enjoy their their freedome and franchises, and live under their owne lawes: and finally might take what customs, toll and imposts they would for portage, as well by land as sea: provided alwayes that the Romanes, and their allies the Latines, should be exempted and free therefrom. As for the images and other ornaments which they complained were taken out of their sacred temples, the Senate ordeined that when M. Fulvius was returned to Rome, the colledge of the Pontiffes should have the hearing and deciding thereof, and looke what they awarded; and set downe, it should stand and be performed accordingly. And the Consull not content with all this, tooke the vantage when there were but few Senatours in the house, and procured an other act of Senate in this forme, That they judged Ambracia not to be reputed a citie forced by assault. This done, there was by vertue of an order from the Decemvirs a solemne supplication holden three dayes for the helth of the people, in regard of a grievous pestilence that dispeopled both citie and countrey. After that, the Latine feasts and holidais were celebrated. When the Consuls had accomplished these devotions, and rid their consciences of scruple, and withall made a full and compleat levie to furnish their legions (for both of them were desirous to have new soldiers) they departed into their provinces, and cased all the old.

After the Consuls were set forward on their journey, the Proconsull Cn. Manlius returned home to Rome. For whose sake the Pretour Servius Sulpitius assembled the Senat in the temple of Bellona. Where after relation made of his deeds atchieved, he demanded that in consideration thereof, due honor and thanksgiving should be rendred to the immortall gods, and withall, that himselfe might ride triumphant into the citie. The most part of the Legates and Commissioners, who had bene with him gainfayed and denied the same, and above all the rest L. Furius Purpurio, and L. Aemilius Paulus, who stepped forth, and enformed against him in these termes: That they had bene sent in commission to assist Cn. Manlius, for the making of a peace with Antiochus, and finishing of that accord and those covenants and conditions, which were commensed and begun betwene him and L. Scipio. Yet Cn. Manlius say they, envied all that ever he could to trouble that peace, yea and to have surprised and entrapped Antiochus by traines of ambush, if he had ever come in his way, or within his reach. But the king being ware of the Consull his fraud and deceit, albeit there was made great meanes many a time to have caught him by color of parley and conference, yet avoided evermore not onely to have speech and communication with him, but also to come within his sight. And when Manlius would needs have passed over Taurus, hardly and with much ado could he be kept back, notwithstanding all the commissioners prayed and besought him to stay, and not to hazard himselfe and incur the danger of a notable losse and overthrow, foretold by the verses and propheties of Sibylla to light upon them that would passe beyond the bounds limited by the fatal destinies. All this notwithstanding he advanced forward and approached with his armie, yea and encamped neere the very pitch and top of the mountaine, where all the water that falleth from above, runneth contrary wayes into divers seas. And when he could find no quarell there for which he might make war (because the kings people & subjects were still and quiet) he turned the armie about to the Gallogreeks, against which nation there was no warre intended, either by warrant and authoritie from Senat, or by graunt and commission from the people. And what man was ever so hardie and bold, as to warre upon his owne head? The wars against Antiochus, Philip, Anniball, and the Carthaginians, are most fresh in each mans remembrance: and of all these, the Senate was consulted with, and the people graunted their ordinance. Embassadors many a time and often were addressed before: restitution & amends were by order demanded: and last of all, heralds were sent, solemnly to denounce & proclaim war. Now tell me, Cn. Manlius, Which of all these things were done; that wee may call this by the name of a publicke warre, allowed by the State of the people of Rome, and not rather a private brigandage & robbrie of your own? But contented you your self with this, & did you no more? marched you directly forward, and tooke you nothing but that which was in your way; leading your armie against those onely whome you tooke to be your enemies? or rather at all turnings and quarrells, nay at every forked high way leading on both hands, when you were at a stand, followed not you like a mercenarie and waged Consul unto Attalus (king Eumenes his brother) with the Roman armie, what hand soever he turned and marched? There was not a cranke and nooke but you visited; there was not a corner that you left unsearched, in all Pisidia, Lycaonia, and Phrygia. There was not a tyrant, prince nor potentate, there was not a lord of any borough or cattle, how farre soever out of the way, but you had a saying to them to pill and poll them, G and to picke pence out of their purses. For what businesse had you with the Oroandians? What had you to doe with other nations, as innocent and guilelesse as they? Now as concerning the warre, (in regard whereof you demaund a triumph) in what sort managed you it? Fought you a battaile either in place commodious, or time convenient? Certes, I must needs say, great reason you have and good cause, to require that honor and praise be given to the immortall gods: first, for that their gracious will and pleasure was, that the armie should not sipart for the teme-ritie and rashnesse of their chiefe leader, warring as hee did against the law of nations: then, in that they presented unto us, not men indeed for enemies, but very beasts and no better. For yee must not think, that it is the name only of the Gallogreeks, which is mingled and compounded, for long time before, both their bodies and minds have beene mixed and corrupted, and the H men themselves bastard and degenerate from their first nature. Had they been the same Gaules with whome we have fought a thousand times in Italie, and with doubtfull issue, and lost as much as we woon, and every foot received as good as we brought, thinke yee there would have returned one messenger from thence, to bring us newes, for any good at least wise that our Generall there did? Twise he came to conflict with them; twice he encountred them in place of disadvantage; mounting with his armie against the hill, and raunged in the botome of the valley even under the enemies feet: in such sort, that if they had lanced no darts against us from the higher ground, but onely come upon us with their naked and disarmed bodies, they had beene able to have overcome us and gone over our bellies. And what happened hereupon? God-amerie the good fortune of the people of Rome: wee may thanke (I say) the great and terrible name I of the Romanes. The fresh renowe of the late ruines and overthrowes of Anniball, Philip, and Antiochus, amazed and astonished (as one would say) these men with their fo corpulent and mightie bodies; with slings and arrow-shot onely were they discomfited and put to flight, so affrighted were they. There was not a sword once bloudied in all this Gaules war: at the first twang of the bow and singing of the arrow, they fled away, like swarms of bees with ringing of ba-sells. And yet beleewe me, even we the same & no other (as if fortune would admonish and shew what had become of us if we had affronted an enemy indeed) in our returne, when we returned to light upon certaine petty robbers and thieves of Thrace, were soundly beaten, killed, and put to flight, and spoiled and well stript of our bagge and baggage. Q. Minutius Thermus (by whose death we have sustained a farre greater losse, than if C. Manlius had miscaried, whose K rashnesse was the cause of all this calamitie and misfortune) with many a tall and valiant man besides, lost his life in this skirmish. Our host, bringing away with them the spoile and pillage of king Antiochus, was dismembred and parted into threecroupes: the vaward in one place, the reeguard in another, and the cariages in a third, were faine to take up their lodging one whole night amongst bushes, briars, and brambles, and lurke within the caves and denes of wild beasts. Are these the brave and worthie exploits, for which you demaund a triumph? But say, that you had received in Thrace, neither damage nor dishonour; which be the enemies over whome you would needs triumph in all the hast? I trow they be those, whome the Senate and people of Rome destined and assigned to be your enemies: for so, was triumph graunted to this L L. Scipio here in place: so likewise to that M. Acilius before him, over king Antiochus: so also erewhile to T. Quintius for the victorie of Philip: and so to conclude, unto P. Africanus for subduing Anniball, the Carthaginians, and king Syphax. And when the Senate had ordeined war, yet before they enterprised and began these high and haucie affaires, they made some doubt and pause in such petty circumstances as these, to wit, unto whome they should send defiance and denounce the said warre: whether to the kings themselves in their owne person; or it were sufficient to give intimation to one garison or other within their fortresses. And would ye now (my masters) that all these observations and ceremonies should be polluted and confounded, that the rights and lawes of the Feciales and heralds should be abolished, and that there shall be no more Feciall at all. But let religion and divine service (God forgive me if I seeme to blaspheme) be troden under foot: suppose the gods were utterly forgotten of you, and their remembrance M quite exiled out of your hearts: Is it your pleasure also, and thinke yee it meet, that the Senat be consulted no more for their advice in question of war? or that a bill be not propounded to the people, in this wise: Pleaseth it you or no, to ordeine that warre be levied against the Gaules?

The other day, and no longer since, the Consuls were desirous and earnest to governe Greece and

A and Asia, yet when they perceived you to bee resolute and persist still in assigning unto them both, the province of Liguria, they were content and obeyed. Great reason shall they have therefore to demaund a triumph at your hands, after they have achieved an happy victorie and finished that warre, which they first enterprised under your warrant and authoritie. After this manner as yee have heard, spake Furius and Æmylius. And Manlius againe, as we find in record, answered thus, or much to this effect, as followeth: Right honorable and my very good LL. the Tribunes of the Commons were ever wont afore-time, to repugne and crosse them that demaunded triumph: and I take my selfe much beholden unto them for this favour, that either in their love to my selfe, or in regard of my great and notable exploits, they have not only by their silence given their consent for my honor, but also seeme readie and prest to propound B the same unto the people, if need had beene. But now forsooth, whome have I (and God will) for mine adversaries, but even some of my ten adjacents or suffraganes, whome our ancellors thought good to give unto their Generals in the war, as a counsell both to assist and aid them, and also to countenance and grace them in their victorie? L. Furius and L. Æmylius are the men and none but they, who inhibit and debarre me for mounting up into the triumphant chariot; they are ready to plucke from my head the glorious and honourable crown that I should weare: even those (I say) whome (if the Tribunes had hindred and impeached my triumph) I would have reported my selfe unto as witnesses of my worthie acts. Certes (my LL.) fare be it from me, that I should envie and repine at the honour of any man: but I remember well, that of late daies when certaine Tribunes of the Common state (men of great courage and action) went C about to stay and forbid the triumph of Q. Fabius Labeo, yee by your authoritie diverted and skared them from that intended enterprise; and hee triumphed in the end, notwithstanding his adversaries gave out and said aloud, not that hee had fought a warre unjustly, but in reprochfull manner charged him, That he had not so much as set eye upon the enemy. And I, who have so often in ranged battell fought with an hundred thousand most fierce and warlike enemies, slain or taken prisoners more than 40000 of them, forced and woon two of their camps: and left all places on this side the ridge of the mountaine Taurus, more peaceable and quiet than is the land of Italie, am not only frustrate and put beside my triumph, but also stand here before your honours to defend my selfe against the challenge of these mine owne Counsell and Suffraganes.
Which accusation of theirs, consisteth (as yee have heard my LL.) of two principall points: D for objected they have, first, that I ought not at all to have made warre with the Gaules; and secondly, that I conducted and managed the same, rashly and without discretion. The Gaules (say they) were no enemies of ours; but being quiet in peace, and readie to do whatsoever they were charged, were by you abused and wronged. I will not require (my LL.) that yee should have the same hard conceit of the Gaules which inhabit in Asia, as touching their crueltie and mortall hatred against the Romane name, which yee know generally to be in the people of the Gaules: Doe but consider and judge of these Gaules as they bee in themselves simply without respect of the infamous name and odious opinion that goeth of the whole generation: so that king Eumenes were here. Would to God that all the States of Asia were present in place, that yee might heare them rather what complaints they would make, than my selfe accusing of E them. Send but your embassadors to all the cities of Asia, and enquire whether servitude were greater and more greivous, that which they were delivered from by the chafing of Antiochus beyond the mountain Taurus, or this whereof they are now eased by the subduing of the Gauls?
Let them relate unto you, and make report how often their territories have been wasted by them, how many booties have beene driven, and prizes carried away out of them, and how they were brought to so low a passe, that they hardly could find meanes and make any shift to redeeme their prisoners by ransom. Let them tell you what they heard there besides, how they killed men, yea and their children, to sacrifice, unto their gods. But know yee now from mee, that your allies yielded tribute to the Gaules, yea, and should have paid still at this day, notwithstanding they were by you delivered from their subjection under king Antiochus, if I had not bestirred my F selfe the better. For the farther that Antiochus was removed from them, the more proudly and outrageously would these Gaules have ruled like LL. over all Asia, and whatsoever lands had lien on this side the top of the mount Taurus, you should have laied to the seignorie of the Gaules and not annexed to your owne Empire and dominion. All this is true will some one say, & what of all that? These Gaules likewise once spoiled the temple at Delphos, reputed in times past the common

common Oracle of the whole world, and situate in the very heart and midst of the earth, and yet the people of Rome neither denounced nor made warre for all that. Certes I alwaies would have thought there had been some difference to be made betweene those daies, when as neither Europe nor Asia was under your iurisdiction and obedience (that you should need to take care in regard of what was done in those parts) and this present time, in which ye have set the mountain Taurus to be the bound and limit, wherunto your Empire extendeth in which you give freedom and immunitie to cities; in which ye enlarge the confines of some, & take in the precincts of others; ining these cities with forfeiture & losse of their territories, punishing those with taxes and tributes in which I say, you augment and diminish realmes, give and take away kingdomes at young and pleasure; and in one word, in which yee judge it a matter that concerneth you, to provide that there may be a generall peace both on land and sea. Were you of opinion indeed, H that Asia might not be counted free, unlesse Antiochus had withdrawn his garisons, which kept quiet within their fortresses and castles, and stirred not forth? and thought you withall, that your gifts graunted unto king Eumenes, might bee assured unto him, and the freedome likewise of the cities, established unto them, if whole armies of Gauls might raunge all about too and fro in those countries? But why stand I so much arguing and reasoning in this manner, as if I had not found the Gauls enemies, but rather caused them to be our enemies? O L. Scipio, I call you here to witnesse, into whose charge and government I succeeded, whose vertue and felicitie withall, I besought the immortal gods to vouchsafe unto me (and my praiser was not in vain:) and you likewise, O P. Scipio, who with the Cos. your brother & in the whole armie, had the rounne & place indeed of an adioinct lieutenant & no more, but caried the maiestie of a Colleague & joint companion; I speak frankly both of you upon your knowledge, whether whole legions of Gauls served not in the armie of Antiochus? Tell us, whether you saw them not in the field, marshalled in both the points and flanks of the maine battell, as the very flower & strength of the whole puissance of Antiochus? Say directly, fought yee not with them, slew you them not, & caried away their spoils, as undoubted and lawfull enemies? And yet both Senate decreed and people ordained war with Antiochus by name, and not with the Gauls. But I trow (or els I am much deceived) within this decree and ordinance, they included all those besides that came to aid and assist him. Of whom (excepting Antiochus himselfe, with whom Scipio had articted peace and alliance, and yee also had expressly given order therfore) they all were our enemies no doubt, who had born arms against us in the quarrell and behalfe of the said Antiochus. Now albeit the Gauls above all others were K computed in this number, together with some pettie kings and tyrants besides; yet I contracted accord and peace with others, (after I had forced them to suffer due punishment according to their trespass) as faine I thought it expedient for the honour of your Empire: yea, and I attained also to gaine and win the hearts of the Gauls, if happily it had beene possible to have dulced and reclaimed them from their inbred fiercenesse and naturall crueltie. But when I perceived that they were untractable, untamed, and implacable, then and not before I resolved, that it was high time to bridle and bring them into order by violence and force of armes. Now that I have cleared the former point of my accusation, as touching the enterprise of the war, it remaineth that I yeeld you an account of the conduct thereof. Wherein verily I would make no doubt to approve mine innocence, and justifie the goodnesse of my cause, if I were to plead, I say not, L in the Senat of Rome, but even at the counsell table of Carthage; where (as men say) they make no more ado, but trusse up, hang, & crucifie their Generals, if they proceed to execution of any service in war with bad advice and counsell, although the issue and event be never so good. But in that citie, which therefore useth the name of the gods both before they begin, & also when they proceed to the managing of all their affaires, (because no person should come to detract or deprave that maliciously, which the gods have once approved) and which citie in the grant and ordinance either of procession or triumph, useth this solemn forme of words: For that hee hath well and happily administred and managed the weale publike; In this citie, I say, if I were unwilling, nay, if I reputed it an odious matter, and favouring too much of pride and arrogance, to vaunt my selfe and boast of mine owne prowesse; yet if in regard of the happie successe and felicitie of M my selfe and mine armie, in that without any losse of souldiours, wee vanquished and subdued so great and mightie a nation, I demaunded first that due honour and thanksgiving should be rendered unto the immortal gods, and then, that I might my selfe ascend and mount up the Capitoll in triumph, from whence I descended to take my voiage, after I had conceived and pronounced

A, nounced my vowes, and made my praier for the solemne and religious order; would ye denie both me and the immortal gods also? Yes marrie would you, and why? Forsooth I fought in a place of disadvantage. But tell mee then, I pray you, in what ground I might have fought with better vantage? considering the enemies were seized of the hill, and kept themselves within their strength and fort. I should have gone unto them, if I had been willing to have vanquished and overcome them. What? how if they had been there within a strong citie? how if they had kept within the walls, and would not have issued forth? You must then have laid siege unto them and given the assault. Must I so indeed? And how I pray? Fought At. Achus (I beseech you) at Thermopylae in a place of advantage? Why? did not T. Quintus after this manner dispossesse Philip of the high mountaines, which hee held over the river Aous? In faith, I cannot yet devise B what kind of enemies they either imagine to themselves they were, or would have you to take and esteeme them to be. If degenerate, if effeminate, if enervate with the delights and pleasures of Asia, what danger was it to march up the hill against them with all disadvantage? If redoubted and terrible for fierce courage and bodily strength, denie yee triumph for so noble a victorie? Envie (my good L.) is blind, and can skil of nothing but to detract and defame vertues, to falsifie and corrupt the honors and rewards due therro. Pardon me I beseech your HH, and hold me excused, if I have ben over long and tedious. It is not, I assure you, any delight and pleasure that I take to put forth and glorifie my selfe, but a necessitie imposed upon me (in mine own defence, to confute these crimes objected against mee) which hath driven mine Oration out in length. To proceed, was it possible also that in Thrace I could make the passes within the forrests large and C wide, which naturally were straight & narrow? the ground plain & smooth, which by nature was uneven and rugged? Could I make leuell downs of steep mounts? open champion & fair fields of woodland overgrown, & rough wylds. Lay it in me, to prevent those Thracian thieves that they should not hide themselves within their peakish holes & ordinarie covert musets? Was it in my power, to impeache them that they might snatch and carie away nothing of our baggage? Was I able to warrant that none of our laboring beasts out of so great a number, should be driven & led away from their companie? that no person should bee hurt? and finally, that Q. Minutius a brave and hardie knight, should not die of his wound? My adversaries presse hard and stand much upon this misfortune, that it was our unluckie hap to loose so worthy a gentleman: but they never think that if they would say nothing but suppress & conceale all, yet you should know (since the whole D armie is here present to testifie that which I say) That although the enemy assailed us in a narrow straight, in an inconvenient place of great disadvantage, yet both of our battallions at once, as well as the vanguard as reeward, compassed the armie of the Barbarians busie & occupied in rising of our hardage, slew many thousands of them that very day, & within few daies after either killed or took prisoners a greater number of them by far. Well, if I had not drawne a sword in Asia, if I had not seen an enemy there, yet I Proconfull had deserved a triumph wel ynough for those two battles in Asia. But ynough hath ben said of these matters, and I am to request you rather (my Lords E all) to forgive me for my boldnes, if I have held you longer than my will and desire was.

The accusation that day had prevailed more than his owne defense, but that they continued arguing and debating in the Counsell-house untill it was late in the evening. Then the Senate E arose with this mind (as it should seeme) to denie him a triumph. The next morrow, the kinsfolke and friends of Cn. Manlius, laboured all that ever they could. Likewise the authoritie of the ancients stood him in great steed; who said plainly that the precedent could not be found in any histories, That a generall who had vanquished his enemies, accomplished the full time of government in his province, and brought his armie back, returned into the citie as a private person, without the honor of the triumphant chariot and the laurell garland. The very indignitie and shame of this example, surmounted the malice of his adversaries, in so much as the Senators in a frequent assembly graunted his triumph.

The remembrance and memorie of this debate, was afterwards drowned in a greater contention, that arose with a faire mightier and more noble personage. For as Valerius Antias hath F recorded, the two Q. Petilij, called P. Scipio Africanus into question, and set him downe a day peremptorily to make his appearance, and answer for himselfe. This action divers men continued diversly, according to their severall disposition and affection. Some blamed not so much the Tribunes of the Commons, as the whole citie in generall, for suffering such an abuse; discouraging in this wise: That the two chiefeest States and Commonwealths in the world were become at one time unthankfull, but Rome more ungratefull of the twaine. For Carthage being G subdued, had banished Anniball likewise vanquished: but Rome a victresse was about to expulse Africanus a conquerour. Others againe reasoned thus: that in no State there ought to be a citizen so preeminent and high above the rest, that he might not be under law, and brought to answere unto interrogatories accordingly. And nothing preserveth ifonomie in a citie, & main- teineth equall libertie more, than to have the mightiest man to hold up his hand at the barre. For what may be safely committed to any man (and surely the soveraigne rule of the state least of all other things) if he be not to yeeld an account of the managing of his affaires? And verily, he that can not abide to be equall unto others, to proceed against such a one by rigor and force, is no injustice at all. Thus men commonly talked pro & contra, untill the judiciall day came of his personall appeerance, and answere to be made. Never was there man knowne before that H day (no not Scipio himselfe when he was at the highest, either Consull or Censor) accompanied with a greater traine of men of all degrees and qualities, than he that day was conducted unto the common place and court of Pleas as an accused person, there to plead his cause. Being com- manded to speake in his owne defense, he began his oration without any mention at all of the imputations and matters with which he was charged, and entered into a discourse of the acts by him atchieved; and that with such a majestie and magnificence as it was well knowne and confessed, that never man was praised either better or more truly than hee. For with what courage and mind he atchieved those his brave exploits in deed, with the same spirit he deli- vered them in words. And no man thought him tedious and was weery to heare his speech, be- cause all that he related was for his owne defence in this his danger, and not upon vaineglorie I and ostentation. The Tribunes of the Commons his adversaries, when they had laid open certeine supposed crimes committed of old, as touching his wastfull excesse whiles he wintered in Syracusa; as also the riot and outrage of Pleminius which hapned at Locri; they proce- ded to charge him by presumptions and suspicions, rather than by direct evidences and proues, for embezzeling and averting to his proper use certeine treasure gotten from king Antiochus; and namely, that his sonne being taken prisoner, was rendred unto him without ranfome; and that in all other things, Scipio was respected and regarded of Antiochus, as if he alone had caried the Romane peace and warre under his girdle. Also that he bare a strong hand over the Consull, more likewis a Dictatour and absolute commander, than a Lieute- nant and assistant unto him, all the while he was in the province. Neither aimed he and thot K at any other marke, when he went that journey, but that the same, which long before was no- toriously knowne to Spaine, Gaule, Sicilie and Africk, might as evidently appeere to Greece, to Asia, and to all the kings and nations of the East parts, to wit, that hee was the onely man, hee was the chiefe, the head and pillar of the Romane Empire; that under the shadow of Scipio his wing, that citie which is the ladie of the world, was couvert and protected; that a becke and nod of his head, was as good as all arests of Senat and hefts of people. Thus when they could not touch him in life, nor fasten upon him any note of infamie, they charged him all that ever they could with matter to kindle envie. Thus with orations they spent the time untill night came, and the busines was put over to another day: which being come, the Tribunes onely be- times in the morning were set in their pews within the Rostra [or common pleading place.] L The defendant was called; who garded with a great companie of his friends and followers, passed through the mids of the assembly, approched the Rostra, and stood just under it. Then after an oyez; and silence made: My maisters (quoth he) you that are Tribunes of the Com- mons, and ye likewise Quirites, my neighbours and citizens of Rome, upon this very day of the moneth it was that I fought a pight bataille against Anniball and the Carthaginians, with right fortunate and happie successe; meete therefore and good reason since it is, that to day all pleas and actions surcease: I will go directly and immediately from hence to the Capitoll, and present my selfe before sup. Opt. Max. before Iuno, and Minerva, with all the rest of other gods and goddes, presidents and patrons of that temple and forresse, to performe my humble dutie unto them, to salute and thanke them, for that they have vouchsafed me that M resolute affection and powerfull meanes withall, both on such a day as this, and also many times besides, to performe my devoir well and truly unto the Common-weale. As many of you therefore (Quirites) as well may, go yec with me, and pray the gods to send you like go- vernors to my selfe, and no worse. If I say (and not else) as you ever since I was seventene yeeres

A yeeres of age, even to these mine old dayes, you alwayes advaunced me to honours before the ordinarie time of mine age, so I againe devanced & prevented the said honours with good service and noble deeds. This said, he departed from the Rostra & ascended up to the Capitoll; where- at the whole audience there assembled turned at once and followed Scipio: in so much as at last the scribes and notaries, yea and the very sergeants left the Tribunes there alone, without any to beare them companie but their owne bondservants and the common cryer, who still from the Rostra called and cited the defendant. Scipio not only visited the temples upon the Capitoll hill, but also made a perambulation with the people of Rome throughout the whole citie to all the churches and chappels of their gods and goddes. This was in manner a more solemne day unto him in regard of the affectionat favour of men, and the estimation of his true grandeur B in deed, than on which he rode into the citie in triumph over king Syphax & the Carthaginians. But it was the last faire day that ever he saw: and never shone the sunne againe pleasantly upon P. Scipio. For after this, foreseeing envie growing toward him, and what a life and how full of de- bates he should have with those Tribunes, upon a longer day graunted for the processe of law against him, he retired himselfe apart to Liternum, offer purpose to make default and not appeere to plead his cause any more. He caried a greater spirit with him, his heart was too big, and used he had bene to higher degree of port & honor, than to take knowledge what it was to be accu- sed: he could not skill to vale boner and stoup so low, and to abase himselfe to the abject condi- tion of those that pleaded for themselves at the barre. Now when the day was come, and that in his absence his name began to be called, L. Scipio answered for him, and alledged sicknes to be C the cause why he was away. But the Tribunes his accusers, would not admit of that excuse, reply- ing & saying, That upon the same pride of heart, in which he avoided once before, his judiciall trial, and left the Tribunes and the whole assembly, he now also would not appeare to make his answere. Even so triumphed he then over the people of Rome, when accompanied with those whom he led after him as prisoners (after he had once taken from them their power & libertie to give their censure and doome of him) he sequestred himselfe that day, by way of an insurrection from the Tribunes of the Commons, into the Capitoll. VVell are ye now served therefore (say they) and justly punished for that dayes folly and rashnes. For lo, how he himselfe now abando- neth you, who was your motive & leader then, to forsake us. See how every day more than other our courage is fallen and hart abated? And dare we not now send folke to fetch him (a privat D person and no more) out of his ferme and house in the countrey, and make him to appeare and plead his answere; unto whom not past 17 yeeres ago, at what time as he was Generall of an ar- mie on land, and Admirall of the Armada by sea, we were so bould as to send tribunes of the Com. and an Aedile, to arrest and bring him away with them to Rome? In the end, the rest of the tribunes of the Commons, being called earnestly unto by L. Scipio for their lawfull favour, set downe this order & conclusion, That if sicknes were alledged for his excuse, and that there were nothing else but it that occasioned his absence, it should be received for good and lawfull, and their colleagues should adjourne his trial to a farther day. It fortunated at that time that Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus was one of the Tribunes, betweene whome and P. Scipio there was some quartell and enmitie. He forbad expressely that his owne name should be subscribed to the in- strument of the foresaid decree of his colleagues. And when every man looked to heare some heavier sentence denounced against Scipio, he awarded in this manner. For as much as L. Scipio excuseth the absence of his brother by sicknes, it is good and sufficient in my opinion. And E more than that, I will not for my part suffer P. Scipio to be accused before he retorne againe to Rome. Yea and then also, if he call for my helping hand, I will geve him assistance, and stop the course of processe against him. And as to the maine point of the cause, this is my resolution, That P. Scipio being advanced so highly (as he is) to that pitch of honor, by his noble & famous exploits, and by the dignities received at the hands of the people of Rome, as if both gods and men had consented to set him aloft, for him to come downe now and stand pleading below at the barre beneath the Rostra, and there to have his eares glow and ring againe with the checks and taunts of certaine greene heads and busie youths, were a greater shame and disgrace to the people of Rome, than to himselfe. Nay, he said not thus with this bare award, but sealed & set it on surely with words of indignation, testifying his discontentment for this course and maner of pro- ceeding. And shal Scipio quoth he, my maisters Tribunes that renowned conquerour of Africk, stand under your feet at your devotion? Defeated he & put to flight in Spain 4 most brave & noble Generals

Generals of the Carthaginians, with their foure entire armies, for this? Tooke hee Syphax G prisoner, vanquished he Anniball, subdued he Carthage and made it tributarie unto us? Chased he Antiochus beyond the mountaine Taurus, (for it must be confessed, that in this glorious conquest L. Scipio had his brother compartner with him) and all for this, to be troden under foot of two Petilijs? And that yee should seeke to triumph over P. Africanus? Will it never be better? Shall great personages (with all the good deserts of their owne, for all the dignities and honors by you upon them conferred) never reach and attaine to a strong fort and sure place of defence, wherein they may make account to be safe and past all daunger, and wherein their old age may rest and repose, if not with worship and honour, yet at least-wise in securitie, exempt from abuse and violent outrage? The sentence it selfe of Gracchus (enforced with such a speech especially) mooved not others onely, but also the very accusers themselves; who made H no other rejoynder againe but thus, That they would consider better what they might by their place, and what they ought of dutie to doe. When the assembly of the people was broken up, the LL. of the Senate began to sit in counsell; where, the whole order of the Senatours (but principally the auncients and as many as had been Consuls) highly commended and thanked Tib. Gracchus, for that he had preferred the weale-publike, before privat grudges and particular quarrels. But the Petilijs were well shent and baited with reprochfull checkes and bitter relar quarrels. But the Petilijs were well shent and baited with reprochfull checkes and bitter relarks, in that they would seeme to rise by the fall of another, and to grace themselves with the bukes, in that they would seeme to rise by the fall of another, and to grace themselves with the disgrace of Africanus, and seeke to triumph over him and be enriched with his spoiles. Well, after that, there were no more words of Scipio Africanus. The rest of his life hee passed at Liter-num, and never had mind to come to the citie: there ended he his daies in a countrey village; I and (as they say) he charged his executors upon his death-bed, to interre him in that very place.
And there, his tombe or monument was built, because he would not that so much as his funerall obsequies should be perfovrmed at Rome, (his native countrey) so unthankfull as it was. A rare man he was, and worthy to be recommended to the memorie of all posteritie: howbeit, the former part of his life was more singular and mentorable, as well for the conduct of martiall exploits in war, as the governance of civill affaires in peace, than his latter daies. For in his youth, he followed the warres continually; whereas in his old age, as his bodie decayed and faded, so whatsoever he did, lost much of the wonted beautie and lustre. Besides, there was no matter presented, to employ that wit and spirit of his. What ods was there betwene his former Consullship and the second, although ye put his Censorship to it in the ballance: What comparison K was there, and what sensible thing in that lieutenantie of his in Asia? of so litle or no employment was it by reason of his owne sicknesse; and blemished withall, by occasion of the misfortune of his sonne. And afterward, his return home againe was no lesse unfortunate, for the hard choice whereunto hee was driven, forced of necessitie to abide the triall of a doubtfull issue in judgement, or in avoiding it by making default, to quit withall his native citie for ever. Howbeit he alone went away with the honour above all other, of finishing the Punicke war, as great and daungerous to the Romanes as any that ever they made.

When Africanus was once dead and his head laid, his adversaries and enemies were aloft: of whome, M. Porcius Cato was the chiefe and principall: a man who was wont to baite (as it were) and raile against him during his life, in regard of his greatnes. And it is thought, that the Petilijs were set on by him, and procured through his persuasion, both in the life of Africanus to have drawne out, and after his death to have preferred a bill in this forme and manner following: May it please you to graunt and ordeine, that true search and diligent enquire be made, what summes of mony were taken in prize, caried away, and levied of king Antiochus and those which were under his obedience and dominion; and that of as much thereof as came not into the publike treasure and chamber of the citie, Scr. Sulpitius (the Pretour of the citie) may propose unto the Senat, to know their advise and pleasure touching it: that whomsoever of all the Pretours for the time now being, it shall please the Senat to appoint, hee may sit in commission and inquisition thereof. This bill was first crossed by Q. and Lucius Mummus, who thought it meet and reason, that the Senat alone (as at all times heretofore) should make due enquire of M the monies so purloined and embezeled, as is aforesaid, & not brought into the common chest of the citie. The Petilijs charged the Scipions for being over great and mightie, and as it were KK in the Senat, to carrie all away before them. L. Furius Purpureo (a man that had been Consull, and one of the ten commissioners in Asia) was of opinion, that the foresaid enquest should be graunted

A graunted in more large and ample tearmes, namely, as touching the money not onely taken from Antiochus, but also from other kings and nations: covertly taxing herein Cn. Manlius his old enemy. L. Scipio on the other side stepped forth to dissuade this matter; albeit it was thought he would rather speake in defence of himselfe, than against the thing. Hee complained much and shewed his grievance, that such a bill as this should come forth now, and be set on foot after the death of his brother Africanus, the most valiant knight and noblest personage that ever was. As if it were not sufficient, that P. Africanus wanted the solemne Panegyrick oration at the Rostra after his death, but hee must be accused also. Why? the very Carthaginians are contented with the exile of Anniball, and seeke no more: but the people of Rome is not satisfied even with the death of Scipio, unlesse both his owne good name after hee is buried be wounded and mangled, and his brother also (to fill up the measure of mens malice and hatred) be killed and B sacrificed upon his tombe. M. Cato spake in the behalfe of the bill, and persuaded that it might passe. His oration as touching the treasure of king Antiochus, is extant to be scene: and by the majestie of his authoritie, he diverted the two Mummij Tribunes of the Commons, cleane away, from interposing themselves any more. When they once had renounced and given over their negative, all the tribes in generall passed their voices affirmatively, Vti rogasti. After this, Scr. Sulpitius proposed unto the Senat, Whome they would appoint for this enquest according to the act Petilia? and the LL. of the Senat deputed Q. Terentius Culleo. This Pretor was so great a friend to the house of the Cornelij, that some authors, namely those, who report how P. Scipio both died and also was carried forth to be enterred at Rome (for that bruit also runneth currant) C have written, How he went at his funerals before the biere and the mourners, with a cap of liber-tie on his head, like as hee had done before in his triumph, and gave sweet wine or mede to all those that attended the convoy, as farre as to the gate Capena. This honour he did Scipio at his death, for that among other prisoners in Affrick, he was by his meanes recovered out of the enemies hand. But it should seeme rather, that hee was such an enemy to that familie, that for the cankred rancour and malice which he caried against that name, he was by the adverse faction of the Scipions, chosen especially of purpose to sit upon and execute this inquisition. But certein itis, before this Pretour (all in his extremities, who either in love and friendship, or in hatred and enmitie, kept no meane) information was given immediately against L. Scipio. Present-ments were made likewise, and the names received of his lieutenants A. Hostilius and L. Hostilius D both Catoes: & of his treasurer besides, C. Furius Aculeo. And to the end that it should appeare to the world, that they were all attaint of this crime of purloining and robbing the publike treasure of the common weale in one complot, there were two secretaries also and one of his sergeants called into question. But these three last mentioned, and L. Hostilius before-named, were found unguiltie and acquit, before Scipio had his judicall triall: howbeit Scipio and A. Hostilius his lieutenant, together with C. Furius were condemned. Scipio, for that he (as Valerius Antias writeth) to make a more easie peace to the contentment of Antiochus, received 6000 pound weight of gold, and 480 pound weight of silver more than he brought into the citie chamber. A. Hostilius, for that he likewise detained eightie pound weight of gold, and 483 pound of silver: and Furius the Questor for keeping back to his own use 130 pound of gold, & two hundred of silver.
E These summes I set downe of gold and silver, as I find them gathered and registred by Valerius Antias in his Chronicle. As for the summes of gold and silver, which L. Scipio should embezele, I would rather thinke that the clerke or secretarie faulted with his pen in writing the copies, than the authour lied so lowd with his tongue in the first enditing of the Originall. For it is more likely of the twaine, that the weight of the silver was more than of gold. As also that the fine wherein he was condemned, should amount but to fortie thousand *Sesterces, than arite to two hundred and fortie thousand. And the rather I am induced thus to calculate, because it is said, that P. Scipio himselfe was required in the Senate to give his account but of such a summe; and when he had bidden his brother L. to fetch him that booke of accounts, he tooke it of him, and there before the Senat, tare and rent it with his owne hands, with great indignation, that having F brought into the Treasure two millions of Sesterces, hee was called to his account for fortie thousand. In which confident boldnesse of spirite and courage, when the Questours durst not (against the order of law) take soorth money out of the Treasure, hee called for the keyes, and said he would bee so bold as to open the chests of the Treasure, since hee was the cause that they were locked. Many things besides are diversly reported of Scipio, especially as touching the latter

latter end of his life, his trouble and accusation, his death, his funerals, and last of all, of his sepulchre and tombe, which distract mee so, that I wot not what report to cleave unto, nor which records to beleve. For they accord not as concerning his accuser. Some write it was M. Naevius, others againe say that they were the Petilians that called him to his answer. Neither agree they in the time when he was thus troubled, nor in the yeere, no nor the place wherein he died, ne yet where he was entred. Some affirme he ended his daies and was buried at Rome, others at Litemum. And in both places there are monuments and Statues of his to be seene. For at Litemum there stood a tombe, and over the same tombe an image of his personage erected, which of late time we our selves saw overthrowne in a tempest. At Rome likewise without the gate Capena, there be three statues upon the monument of the Scipios, whereof two are said to be of Pub. and L. Scipio, and the third of Q. Ennius the Poet. And this difference, among authours is not touching his acts and affaires onely, but also about the very Orations (if so be they were the Orations indeed of P. Scipio and Tiberius Gracchus, which are commonly so taken and caried about) which disagree so much as they doe. For the title of the Oration that goeth for P. Scipio, hath the name of M. Nevius, a Tribune of the Commons: but through the whole Oration it selfe there is no mention at all of that accuser. He tearmeth him one while Nebulos [Knave] and another while Nugator [Cousiner.] In like sort the Oration of Gracchus maketh no mention at all either of the Petilijs, the accusers of Africanus, or of the day assigned unto him for his answer. And we must devise to tell the whole tale otherwise, if we would have it to agree with the Oration of Gracchus: and follow wee must those authours, who write, that when L. Scipio was accused and condemned for taking bribes of king Antiochus, his brother Africanus was embassador in Tuscane, and upon the newes of his brothers trouble and misfortune, left his embassage, & made hast to Rome. Where hee tooke his way directly from the gate to the common place (for that it was told him how his brother was going to prison) and thrutt the sergeant from his bodie, yea, and when the Tribunes themselves would have restrained him, he used violence against them, and caried himselfe in this action so, as he shewed more kindnesse and love to his brother, than manners and civilitie otherwise. For thus complaineth Gracchus in his Oration, That the Tribunes authoritie and power was infringed and broken by a private person. And in the latter end, when he promised to assist L. Scipio, hee knit up his speech with these words, That it was a thing more tollerable, that both the Tribunitian puissance and the Commonweale should seeme overcome and surmounted by Tribunes themselves, than by a private man. But hee aggravated and enforced this one violence and excessive outrage against him, & made it odious in such sort, that in blaming him for so much overthrowing himselfe and degenerating as it were from his owne nature, he rehearsed the commendable parts of his moderation and temperat carriage of himselfe aforetime, and that in so good tearmes and ample manner, that thereby he made him some part of amends for the sharpe reprehension he used for the present. For he said, that in times past he had rebuked and reproved the people, when they would have made him a perpetuall Consull and Dictator; that he had forbidden expressely, that any of his Statues in triumphant habite, should bee set up and erected in the publicke places of assemblies, as in the Comitium and Curia, in the Capitoll and chappell of Iupiter Opt. Max. These commendable reports of him, if they were uttered in an Oration penned of purpose for his praise, must needs testifie and shew a wonderfull magnanimitie of his, in the moderate use of high honours according to a civile port; which an enemy by way of reproch and upbraiding him, acknowledged and confesseth. But all writers accord, that Gracchus tooke to wife the younger of his two daughters (for the elder without all question was affianced and given in marriage by her father unto P. Cornelius Nasica.) But it is not so certainly agreed upon, whether she was both betrothed & wedded also unto him, after her fathers death or no. As also, whether it be true (as it is reported) that when L. Scipio was a leading to prison, Gracchus, seeing none of his owne fellow Tribunes to succour and rescue him, swore a great oath and protested, that he was an enemy still to the Scipios as much as ever hee was, and would not doe any thing to currie favour with them, or to come into their grace; yet could hee never endure that he should be caried to that prison, into which he had seene his brother Africanus lead many kings, great Generals and Commaunders of enemies, captive. Moreover, that the same day the Senate fortun'd to be at supper together in the Capitoll, and arose up all at once, and requested Africanus to affiance his daughter to Gracchus, before the supper and banquet was ended. Which espousals being performed with all due complements accordingly, during the time of

A that solemne feast, Scipio when hee was returned home to his house, said unto his wife Acmylia, that he had fianced and bestowed his daughter upon an husband. Shee then, falling into a fit of choler like a woman, and chafing that he had not made her acquainted with the matter, and taken her advice touching the maiden, who was as much her child as his, brake out into these words withall, that if hee had given her in marriage to Tiberius Gracchus, yet good reason it was that the mother should have been at the making of the bargain. Whereupon Scipio tooke great contentment and joy at this conformitie of judgement in the choise, and inferred straightwaies, that hee was the man to whome shee was espoused. Thus much I thought good to relate of this worthie and noble person, albeit there is great varietie of opinions, and diversitie of writings in that behalfe.

B After the Pretor Q. Terentius, had finished the inquisition and whole proceffe thereof, Hostilius and Furius, who were attaint and condemned, that very day put in sufficient sureties to be bound in recognisance to the treasurers of the citie, for the payment of their fines. But Scipio debating the matter still, & pleading that all the mony which he had received was in the citie chamber, & that he had purloined none of the publick treasure, was laid hold on to be had away and committed to prison. Then P. Scipio Nasica called unto the Tribunes for their help, & made a speech, full of true praises and commendations, nor in generall only of the whole name & familie of the Corneljs, but in particular also of his own house. And namely he alledged and said, That himselfe and P. Africanus, together with L. Scipio (who now was going to prison) had to their fathers Cn. Scipio and P. Scipio, most noble and famous personages: those who for certain years in the land of Spain, advanced the renoume and glorie of the Roman name, maugre the heads of many captains and armies, as well of Carthaginians as Spaniards; not only in martiall tears of war, but also in this especially, that they had given testimonie & prooffe unto those nations, of the temperate government, and faithfull dealing of the Romanes; and in the end both of them spent their blood and lost their lives in the quarrell of the people of Rome. And albeit it had been sufficient for all their posteritie to maintain only and uphold the glorie from them received, yet P. Africanus so farre surpassed the praise-worthie acts of his father, that it was verily beleev'd he was not borne of humane blood, but descended from some divine & heavenly race of the gods. As for L. Scipio, who now is in trouble (to say nothing of his worthie acts which hee achieved in Spaine and in Affricke, when hee was lieutenant there to his brother Consull) hee was both reputed by the Senate sufficient, without any casting of lots, to undertake the province of Asia and the warre against king Antiochus, and also esteemed by his brother Africanus so worthie a person, that himselfe who had been Consull twice, Cenfor once, & had ridden in triumph, thought not scorne to accompanie him into Asia in qualitie of his lieutenant. In which province (to the end that the greatnesse and resplendent glorie of the lieutenant should not dimme the brightnesse of the Consull, and drowne his vertues and good parts) it so fell out, that the very same day, on which L. Scipio vanquished Antiochus neere Magnesia, P. Scipio lay sicke at Elaea, a citie distant certain daies journeyes. He defeated I say an armie there, nothing inferior to that of Annibal, with whom his brother had encountered before in Affricke. In which battel, among other great commaunders and captains under the king, Annibal was himselfe employ'd in person, even he who had ben the grand-Generall in the Punick war. Which service was so well conducted and managed, that a man possibly could not find fault so much as with fortune, or any accident that happened there. And now, when the war is unblamable, there is picked matter of crimination in the peace: & it (they say) was bought and sold for mony. In which challenge the ten deputies and assistants in counsell, are also touched and noted with corruption, by whose advice the said peace was granted & concluded. Well, of those ten, there were some that stepped forth & accused Cn. Manlius: yet so far off was that accusation of theirs from being credited, that it did not so much as hinder & delay the very time of his triumph. But (beleev'e me) in Scipio his case, the very conditions of peace favour strongly of briberie and indirect dealing, for that they are advantageous, respective and favorable on the part of Antiochus. For, his kingdom is left entire and whole unto him; now that he is vanquished, he possesseth as much as before the war began; and Scipio having received from him a mightie masse of gold and silver, hath brought nothing into the common treasure, but averted all from thence, and converted it to his proper use. Why? was there not carried in pomp at the triumph of L. Scipio (in the very sight of all men) as much gold and silver, as in ten triumphs before (and put them all together) could not be shewed. For what should I speak of the the confines and frontiers of his realme? Namely, that Antiochus beforetime held under his dominion all Asia, and the marches also of Europe adjoining? And how great a part of the world that is, which extendeth from the hill Taurus, and lyeth out so farre as the Egean sea; how many not cities onely, but spacious countries and populous nations it containeth, all men know right well: as also that this countrey, bearing out in length more than thirtie daies journey, & in breadth between two seas ten daies journey, even as farre as to the top of the mountaine Taurus, is taken from Antiochus, and he driven into the utmost angle and corner of the globe of the earth? What could hee have been disseized of more, in case his peace had cost him never a pennie of money? When Philip was conquered, he had Macedonie left unto him; when Nabis was subdued he enjoied still Lacedæmon: and no man ever went about to call Quintius in question for it. And why may hee had not to his brother Scipio Africanus, for whose sake, the envie & mallice of men hath defaced & hurt L. Scipio, whereas his brothers glorie ought to have graced and helped him? Would any man of sence & reason judge, that so much gold & silver was brought into the house of L. Scipio, as may not possibly be raised if all the goods he hath were sold to the worth? What should become of all that gold of the kings? Where be those great purchases of lordships and inheritances that he hath made therewith? Certes it cannot be, but in that house which hath not exceeded in superfluous expense, there should be seen some heap & mount of this new treasure: But what care his enemies for this? That which cannot be made, of the substance & goods of L. Scipio, they will make good on his bodie and back; which they meane to torture (belike) and expose to all contumelie and villanie, to the end, that a man of the best make & qualitie that ever was, should be shut up in a dungeon among robbers by the high way side, amongst night thieves and cutpurves, and there in the hard stoeks and balefull darkenes tender his last breath; and when he is dead, to have his bodie cast out naked at the prison dore. But be it whensoever it shal, this will hee no greater blot to the house Cornelia, than a shamefull reproch for ever to the citie of Rome. Against all these remonstrances, the Pretour Ferentius, opposed and red the law Petilia, the decree of the Senat, and the sentence given against L. Scipio. And he for his own part said, he could not doe withall, but if the summe wherein he was condemned, were not brought into the common Treasurehouse, hee knew no other remedie, nor what els to doe, but to commaund him (a condemned person) to be apprehended againe, and had away to prison. Then the Tribunes went apart to consult and lay their heads together: And within a while after C. Flaminius pronounced aloud, according to his owne advice and the opinion of all his Colleagues (excepting onely Gracchus) That the Tribunes were, not interpose themselves, but that the Pretour might do and execute his office and his authoritie to the full. But Trib. Gracchus set down his own decree in this forme, That as touching the summe wherein L. Scipio was condemned, he would not bee against it, nor impeach the Pretour, but that hee might use his power according to his place, and take it out of his goods, as farre as they would stretch. But that L. Scipio, who hath subdued the mightiest and most puissant monarch in all the world, who hath set out and extended the bounds of the Romane empire, as farre as the farthest frontiers and ends of the earth, who hath obliged and bound king Eumenes, the Rhodians, and so many cities and States besides of Asia, & made them beholden to the people of Rome, for favours and benefits bestowed upon them, finally, who hath himselfe laid up fast in prison many a Generall captaine over the enemies, after hee led them in triumph: that hee shal, should lie in prison many a yeere among the enemies of the people of Rome, hee would never suffer: and therefore hee commaunded him to be released and set at large. This decree was heard with so great applause, and all men were so joious to see L. Scipio delivered, that hardly a man would have beleevied (unless he had seene it) that there had been such a judgement passed in the same citie. Then the Pretour sent the Questours or Treasurers, to enter and seize upon all the goods of L. Scipio, in the name and to the use of the citie: whereof there was not to be found, so much as any one token or mention of the kings money, no nor so great a sum could be raised, as the fine came to where in he was condemned. The friends, kinsfolke, followers and well-willers of L. Scipio, made such a contribution of money for him, that if hee would have accepted of it, he had been a richer man by odds, than he was before this crosse and calamitie fell upon him. But he tooke never a denier. His nearest kinsmen in blood bought againe and redeemed as much of his owne goods, as served for his necessarie maintenance and no more. And the envie and hatred of men intended against the Scipios, turned upon the heads of the Pretour and his counsell, together with the accusers themselves.

THE XXXIX. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS

of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the nine and thirtieth Booke.

Marcus Emilius the Consull after he had subdued the Ligurians, made the street or high way from Plaisance to Ariminum, untill it met with the way Flaminia. In this booke are recounted the beginnings of riotous and dissolute life brought in by the Asian armie. All the Ligurians on this side Apenine are tamed and brought under. The Bacchanales (a Greekeish feast and celebrated in the night season, the very seminarie and nurse-garden of all wickedness, being grown to this enormitie, that therein was contrived a conspiracie and complot of a mightie multitude) were now visited and searched into by the Consull, and put downe with the punishment of many persons. L. Quintius Flamininus, the brother of T. Quintius, was deprived of his Senators dignitie by the Censors, to wit, L. Valerius Flaccus, and Mar. Pacius Cato, a right excellent man, as well for feats of arms as peace. The cause was this, for that while he was Consull and governor in Gaule, at the request of one Philippus Pœnus, a notorious wanton Ganymede whom he loved, he slew a certain Gaule with his own hand: or, as some have written, because at the entreatie of an harlot, upon whom he was enamoured, he beheaded one of them that were condemned. The invective Oration of M. Cato against him is extant. Scipio departed this life at Liternum, and (as if Fortune would have his funeral accompanied with the death at the same time of two most renowned and great personages) Anniball poisoned himselfe, by occasion that Prusias king of Bithynia (unto whom hee was fled for succour after the defeature of king Antiochus) would have yielded him into the hands of the Romans, who had sent for T. Quintius Flamininus to demand him. Likewise Philopamen the Generall of the Achæans, an excellent man, was poisoned by the Meßenians, who took him prisoner in warre. Colonies were sent to Pollentia, Pisaurum, Mutina, and Parma. Over and besides, this booke containeth the prosperous affaires against the Celtiberians: also the beginning & cause of the Macedonian warre, whereof the originall spring arose from Philip, much discontented, that his kingdom was impaired by the Romans, in regard that he was forced by them to withdraw his garisons out of Thrace and other parts.

During the time that these affaires passed at Rome (if this were the yeere wherein they happened) both Consuls made warre against the Ligurians, a nation borne as it were to maintaine the militarie discipline of the Romanes, and to find them occupied in all times of respite and rest from greater warres; neither was there any other province that gave a sharper edge to the valour of the soldier. For Asia with the beautie of their cities, the abundance of all commodities as well by sea as land, the effeminate tenderesse of the enemies, and the roialtie of the kings riches, had made their armies more wealthie than valiant: and especially under the government of Cneus Manlius, nussed they were in much loosenesse and negligence. And therupon it was, that finding the way in Thrace a little more rough and difficult than ordinarie to travell in, and an enemy better practised and exercised to deale withall, they received a great foile and losse among them. Now in Liguria, they met with all things that might rouse and awake sleepeie souldiours: the countrey rough and full of mountaines, that much adoe they had themselves to seize the same, and as great a labour they found to disseize the enemies, that were before possessed of them: the waies, steepe up-hill, narrow, and dangerous for ambushes: the enemy, light, swift, nimble, and suddainely setting upon them, giving no time of rest, no place of repose and securitie. Driven they were of necessitie to assault strong and fortified castles, with great difficultie and daunger both: the countrey poore and needie, which caused the soldiours to spare and live hardly, and afforded them no foison of preys and prizes: and therefore no victualers, scullions, scullions, souldiours boyes and lackies, followed the camp; neither the labouring beasts for carriage, tooke up a length in their march: nothing there, but armour and men, reposing all hope in their armes, and nothing else. And never wanted they some matter of quarrell, and some occasion or other to make war: for by reason of their barenesse and penurie, they made rodes into the lands of their neighbors, but so, as they never ventured all at once, nor put the main chance in hazard.

C. Flaminius the Consull having fought sundrie times with the Friniat Ligurians, and in many battailes gotten the better hand over them, even at home in their owne cuntry, brought the whole nation by composition under obedience, and disarmed them: but because in the deliverie of their armour, they dealt not soundly and faithfully, and should have bene chastised therefore, they abandoned their villages, and fled to the mountain Auginus; whither, the Consull pursued them hard at heeles: howbeit, being disbanded and scattered againe, and most of them disarmed, they fled into the valley through places where no wayes led, and over broken and cragged steep rocks, whereas the enemies could not possibly follow after, and so passed the other side of Apennine. But as many as kept still within their hold, were beset round about and overthrowne. Then were the legions led to the further side of Apeninus, where the enemies for a small while, defended themselves by the height of the place, but anon they yeelded. Then was their armour fought up with more care and diligence than before, and they were disarmed and stript out of all. After this, was the warre diverted and turned wholly upon the Apuan Ligurians, who had so over-run the territories of Pisæ and Bolonia, that they could not be manured and tilled. The Consull having subdued them also, granted peace unto the borderers: and now that he had brought the province into quietnes and rest; to the end, that his souldiours should not be idle and doe nothing, he made a causiey or street-way from Bononia to Arretium.

The other Consull M. Æmilius, set on fire the villages and wasted the lands of the Ligurians, as well in the champaigne fields as the valleys, when the inhabitants themselves were retired into the two mountaines Balista and Suisinontium, which they held. Afterwards, hee assailed them also who had taken the hills aforesaid; and first wearied them with light skirmishes; afterwards, he forced them to descend into the plaine, and there in a set battaile vanquished them: in which conflict he vowed a temple to Diana. Thus having subdued all on this side Apennine, hee then set upon those that dwelt beyond the mountaine; among whom were the Frisinar Ligurians, (so farre as to whome C. Flaminius went not:) all those, Æmilius subdued, despoiled them of their armour, and forced the multitude of them to forsake the mountaines and come downe into the plaines. After he had quieted the Ligurians, he led his armie into the country of the Gauls, and made an high way from Placentia to Ariminum, so as it met with the causiey Flaminia: and in the last battell wherein hee fought with banners displayed against the Ligurians, he vowed a temple to queene Iuno. And these were the exploits for that yeere, in Liguria.

M. Furius the Pretour in Gauls, seeking in time of peace for some pretence and colour of warre, had taken from the Cenomans their armour, notwithstanding they were innocent and did no harme. The Cenomans made complaint hereof at Rome to the Senate, and were put over to the Consull Æmilius, unto whome the Senat had directed a commission of oier and terminer. After great debate with the Pretor, they overthrew him in the action, and had their armour delivered unto them againe: and so the Pretour was commaunded to give over his government and depart out of the province.

After this, the Embassadors of the Latin nation, who assembled and resorted in great number out of all parts of Latium, had audience given them in the Senat. These complained, that a great multitude of their own naturall citizens, were removed and gon to inhabit in Rome, and there were enrolled: whereupon a commission was graunted to Q. Terentius Culleo the Pretour, to make search for such: and looke how many of them those Latine allies could prove to have been enrolled (either themselves or their fathers) in any citie or corporation of theirs, either at the time that C. Claudius and M. Livius were Censors, or after their Censorship, to force those to returne thither againe, where they had bene entred or matriculated. By vertue of this inquisition, to the number of twelve thousand Latines returned home againe into their owne cuntry: for now the citie of Rome was overcharged and pestered with a multitude of straungers and forreiners.

Before that the Consuls repaired to Rome, M. Fulvius the Proconsull returned out of Ætolia:

A tolia: who, after he had discoursed of his exploits performed in Ætolia and Cephalenia, before the Senate assembled in the temple of Apollo, requested of the LL. to judge it meet and requisite, and accordingly to graunt and ordeine, that praise and thanksgiving might be rendered unto the immortall gods, and himselfe allowed to triumph, for that he had so well and happily managed the affaires of the Common-weale. Then stept forth M. Aburius a Tribune of the Commons, and declared openly, That in case they went about to passe any decree in that behalfe, before the comming of M. Æmilius the Consull, he would crosse it: for that the Consull himselfe was minded to contradict that proceeding, and had given streight charge unto him, at what time as he tooke his journey to the province, that the consultation of this matter should be reserved wholly untill his returne home. And Fulvius (quoth he) shall loose so much time: and when the Consull himselfe is present in place to assist, then might the Senat moove what decree it pleased them. Then answered M. Fulvius and said: If men were ignorant either of the grudge and quarrell betwene me and M. Æmilius, or with what outrageous spirit and kinglike choller and indignation hee pursued the said enmitie and variance, yet it were not a terrible thing and to be endured, that the absence of the Consull should both impeach the honour due unto the immortall gods, and also hinder and stay the triumph which I have so justly deserved: that a Generall (I say) who had so worthily achieved his service, and an armie so victorious, should stay and give attendance without the citie gates, untill it pleased the Consull to returne home; who no doubt of very purpose and for the nones, upon this occasion would make slow hast and take his leisure. But now considering that the enmitie and heart-burning that the Consull beareth to me is so notorious as it is, What indifferencie and reasonable dealing may a man looke for at his hands? who taking the advantage of the time when a small number of Senators were assembled, caused an act of the Senat to passe by stealth, and entred it in the treasure house, containing thus much in effect, That Ambracia should not be reputed as a towne forced by assault, notwithstanding it were assailed with mantlets and platformes: where we were driven to erect new fabrickes, and plant other engines and ordinance of warre after the former were consumed with fire: where we mainteined fight about the walls, as well under the ground as above, for the space of fifteene dayes together: where, after that the souldiours had scaled and gained the walls, the conflict endured notwithstanding a long time doubtfull, from morning to night; and where were slaine above 3000 enemies. Now as touching the sacriledge committed (after the citie was forced) in spoiling the churches of the immortall gods, what a slander thinke yee, hath hee raised of me? what a matter hath he made thereof? and how hath hee enformed the Pontifices and Bishops? Vnlesse a man would say, that lawfull it was for the citie of Rome to be garnished and beautified with the ornaments of Syracusa and other cities woen by force; but the law of warre extended not to this onely citie of Ambracia? I beseech therefore the LL. of the Senat, yea and I request the Tribunes, not to suffer me to be mocked and abused by a most insolent & proud adversarie. Then on all hands they dealt with the Tribune, some intreated him, other rebuked and blamed him: but the speech of Tib. Gracchus (one of his colleagues) mooved him most of all others; who shewed, That it was no good precedent and example, that men should maintaine and follow their owne privat quarrels in time of magistracie and publick government; but a shamefull matter and a foule indignitie it was, and much unbeseeming the Tribunes of the Commons and their sacred lawes, that a Tribune should be a proctor to other men and prosecute their actions and enmities. Men ought (quod he) according to their own discretion and judgement, either to love or hate the persons, to like or dislike the cause; nor to depend and hang upon the countenance and becke of others, nor to be caried too and fro with the wils, pleasures, and appetites of other men. As for the Tribune of the Commons here, he accordeth and taketh part with a chollerike and testie Consull, and remembreth well what M. Æmilius left with him in private charge; but forgetteth altogether that the Tribuneship was committed unto him by the people of Rome: committed I say, and put into his hands for to assist privat persons, and to maintaine their liberties, and not to uphold the kinglike rule and roialtie of a Consull. Never seeth he thus much before him, that it will be written another day in the Annals and yearly Chronicles, That of two Commoner Tribunes in the same fellowship and societie, one for the love of the Common-weale renounced and gave over his owne private displeasure and enmitie to a particular person, and the other tooke charge as it were by way of Commission, to pursue the quarell of another man. The Tribune could endure no longer these rebukes and

checks, and therewith departed out of the temple: then the Pretour Scr. Sulpitius propounded the bill the second time, and so a triumph was graunted to M. Fulvius. Who after he had rendered great thanks to the LL. of the Senate, added moreover and said, That the very day wherein he forced the citie Ambracia, he had by vow promised, to the honor of Iupiter Opt. Max. for to exhibit the great and solemne Romane games. And to that effect the cities of Greece had contributed toward the charges, a hundred pound weight of gold: his petition was therefore, that the Senate would ordeine that out of that masse of money which he was to cary and shew in triumph, and ment to bestow and lay up in the city Treasurie, the foresaid summe of gold might be sequestred and reserved apart for the proper use abovenamed. The Senate commaunded, that the Colledge of the Prelates and Priests in this case should be consulted with, and their advice demanded, whether they thought it necessarie that so much gold should be spent and consumed in the charges of the said Games? The Prelates made answer againe, that it was not materiall to religion and to the service of the gods, to how great a reckning soever the charges of the games should arise & amount. Whereupon the Senate permitted Fulvius to defray what he would himselfe, so as hee exceeded not the summe of 80000 [Asses]. Hee had purposed to triumph in the moneth of Ianuarie, but hearing that Aemilius the Consull (who was advertised by letters, that Aburius the Tribune of the Commons had renounced and let fall his opposition which hee commensed) was comming in proper person to Rome, onely for to hinder the triumph, and stayed by the way sicke; hee prevented the day, for feare hee should have had more anger and trouble in his triumph, than during his warre. So upon the 22 day of December he triumphed over the Aetolians and Cephalenia. Before his chariot there were borne a hundred crownes of gold, weighing twelve pound a peece: of silver 83000 pound weight: of gold 243 pound weight: of Attick Tetradrachmes 118000: of Philip peeces of gold coyne 12422: images of brasie 285: of marble 230. Likewise of armour, as well defensive as offensive, and other spoile of the enemies, an huge deale: besides Carapits, Balists, and other engins and peeces of batterie. Moreover there went before him 27 captaines either Aetolians and Cephalenes, or els under king Antiochus, leit by him in those parts. The same day before that he entered into the citie, he bestowed in the cirque Flaminius many militarie gifts and presents upon many colonels, captaines, horsemen and centurions, as well Romanes as allies. Generally to all the footemen he gave out of the pillage 25 Denarij apeece: twise as much to the centurions, and threefold to the horsemen.

Now approached the time of the solemne assembly for the election of Coss. and because M. Aemilius whose lot it was to be president thereof, could not be present at the day, C. Flaminius came of purpose to Rome. By whom were created Consuls Sp. Posthumius Albinus, and Q. Martius Philippus. After that were Pretours elected, to wit, T. Manius, P. Cornelius Sulla, C. Calpurnius Piso, M. Licinius Lucullus, C. Aurelius Scarnus, and L. Quintius Crispinus. In the end of the said yeere, after the Magistrates were thus created, Cn. Manlius Volsus, the third day before the Nones of March, triumphed over the Gaules who inhabit Asia. The cause why he triumphed so late, was this, for that he would avoid making his answer (according to the act of Paiulus) whiles Q. Terentius Culleo was Pretour: feare he should burne in the flame of the same sentence and judgement, whereby L. Scipio had bene condemned: or least the flame of another mans judgement, I meane the sentence whereby L. Scipio had bene condemned, would have bene too hote for him, and caught hold of him likewise: considering that the iurie and enquest were more incensed and provoked against him than Scipio; for that he succeeding after him, had spoiled and marred with all kind of licentious loosenes, the militarie discipline, which Scipio had observed most precisely and severely. Neither was he noted and touched in name for those things only which by bare heere say were reported to have bene done in the province, farre remote from the view of men, but also of those particular instances to be seene daily in the demeanour of his souldiours. For verily the forein excesse and strange superfluities tooke beginning from the Asian armie, who brought all with them into the citie. They were the first within Rome that tooke up the use of brasen tables, of rich counterpoints, carpets, cupboud-clothes, bushangings and curtens of sundry kinds of tyllaw. Likewise of one footed standing tables, bushangings, and cupbouds, which in those dayes were counted magnificent and stately moveables. Then came up the manner of having at bankets singing miniken wenches, and such as could play upon the dulcimers and other instruments of musick; with dauncers, jesters, and other pastimes and

A and delightfull pleasures and fits of mirth at the table. Then began the boud to be furnished and set out with more exquisit and deintie viands, and of greater expense. Then Cooks who in old time were reputed the most contemptible slaves as well for calling and estimation as for the use: they were put unto, came to be in great request and price: and that which before time was a mechanickall kind of manuall service, grew now to be accounted a science of deepe skill and understanding. And yet all these things that then bare so great a shew, were scarce so much as small feeds and slips, to the excessive superfluities that were to ensue.

B Well, C. Manlius caried in triumph two hundred crownes of masse beaten gold, weighing twelve pound a peece: of silver 220000 pound weight: of gold 2103 pound weight: of Attick Tetradrachmes 127000: of Cistophores 250000: of Philip golden peeces 16320. Also much armour there was, and spoiles of Gaules caried in shew upon wagons: and 52 captaines of enemies were led before his owne chariot. Amongst the souldiours hee gave a donative of two and forie denarij apeece, he doubled the same to every centurion. Also to every footman hee gave duple pay, and to every horseman triple. Many there were of all States and degrees, whom he rewarded with militarie presents for especiall service, and those followed next after his chariot. The souldiours chaunted such songs and sonnets, as a man might easily see they were composed to feed the humor of a Generall desirous of glorie, and one that made much of his souldiours especially; whereby his triumph was more honored with the affectionate favour of them, than otherwise recommended and celebrated with the heartie love of the people. Howbeit, the friends of Manlius served him in good steed to win the good will of them also, through whose solliciting and earnest endeavour, there passed an act of the Senate, that out of that money which had been shewed in triumph, there should be repaid unto the people that subsidie which had bene levied among them for souldiours pay, and not yet contented back againe. So the Treasurers of the citie made true and faithfull payment with all diligence of 25 asses and d. in every thousand [for the loane.]

About the same time two Colonels came out of both provinces of Spaine, with letters from C. Catinius and L. Manlius the governours there: by which letters intelligence was given, that the Celtiberians and Lusitanes were in armes, wasting & spoiling the lands of the Rom. confederates. The Senate referred the entier consultation of this matter to the new Magistrates. During the time of the Roman games that yeere which P. Cornelius Cethegus, and Aulus Posthumius Albinus represented, a certene mast or high pole which stood not fast in the shew place called Circus maximus, fell downe upon the image of Pollentia, and overthrew it to the ground. The LL. hereupon made some scruple in conscience, and ordeined, that the solemnitie of those games should continue one day longer, and caused two images to be set up for that one, and that the new should be all gilt. Likewise the Plebeian plaies were renewed one day more, by the Aediles C. Sempronius Blaesus, and M. Furius Luscus. The yeere following averted the Consuls Sp. Posthumius Albinus, and Q. Martius Philippus from the armie, from the regard I say of warres and government of provinces abroad, to the punishment of a certene intestine conspiracie at home. The Pretours cast lots for their provinces. T. Manius had the iurisdiction of the citizens, and M. Licinius Lucullus betweene citizens and strangers. Unto C. Aurelius Scarnus fell the governance of Sardinia, and to P. Cornelius Sulla of Sicilie: L. Quintius Crispinus was assigned to the higher Spaine; and P. Calpurnius Piso to the farther. Both Consuls were enjoined to make inquisition into secret conspiracies within the citie.

There was a certene Grecian of base degree and condition, who came first into Hetruria; a man not endued with any of those attes, whereof that nation (of all others most learned) hath brought many unto us, as well for the erudition of our minds, as the trimming of our bodies: but a sacrificing priest he was, and a divining wisard withall. Neither was he one that made outward profession of teaching men, and thereby getting a living openly, and so by an overt shew of religion possessed their heads and minds with feare and horror; but the knowledge he had forsooth of certene hidden and secret sacrifices. These mysteries of his at first he taught but unto a few, howbeit afterwards they began to be communicated and divulged as well to men as women: and to this religion were added pleasures and delights of wine and good cheere, to the end that more customers might be allured and enticed for to have a liking thereof. Now when as wine had drowned and droused the understanding: when the night season, when the entermingling of men and women together one with another (and namely, they of young and and tender yeeres, with those of elder age) had cleane put out & extinguished all respect and regard of shamefast honestie: there began first to be practised all sorts of corruption, for every one had all pleasures readie at commaundement, and his choise of those whereto by nature he was more prone and given to lust after. Neither was there wickednes committed here, of one sort, namely, the abusing of mankind & womankind one with another without distinction: but out of this shop and workhouse proceeded false witnesses, forging of scales, depositions, & testimonies; and more than so, wrong and untrue informations. From hence came the devilish craft of poisoning, & privie murders of the neereft of kindred in one house; and the same so secret, that otherwhyles the bodies would not be found for to be committed to the earth. Many sinfull parts were there played by way of fraud, guile, and cunning coufenage; but more by apert force. As for violence, it was kept close & hidden, by reason that with the hideous noises, with the sound and ringing of tymbrels, tabours and cymbals, there could no voice nor word be heard of such as cried out, when either they were forced to vilanie & abuse, or beaten and wounded to death. The infection of this catching poison out of Hetruria, spread as far as Rome, like a contagious maladie. At the first the spacious capacite of the citie, having bin used to wink & beare with such enormities, concealed all: at length revealed it was & detected to the Cof. Posthumius, much after this manner.

The Ezechianles directed.

P. Ebutius (whose father had served in the warres in qualitie of a gentleman of Rome with a citie horse) left an orphan, after that his guardians were likewise deceased, became ward to his mother Duronis and his father in law (her second husband) T. Sempronius Rutilius, under whom he had his bringing up. Now as his mother was wholly devoted and obsequious unto her husband, so his father in law had so handled the matter in his guardianship, that he could make no good accompt thereof, and therefore his desire was, that either the infant his ward should be made away, or else obliged and enthrall'd unto him. The only way to compasse and bring this about, was the corruption and abuse of the Bacchanales. The mother therefore upon a time called her sonne unto her, and told him, that she had made a vow for him when he was sick, that so soone as ever he should recover and be well againe, she would present him to the priests of Bacchus to be consecrated and professed in their mysteries: and now quoth she seeing that by the goodnes of the gods thou art amended, and I thereby obliged by the bond of that vow, I will acquit my selfe thereof, and performe it accordingly. She bare him in hand therefore, that he must for ten dayes live chaste, and not touch a woman, and at the tenth dayes end after he had taken his supper, and was well washed and purified after the manner, she would bring him into the holy place of those sacred mysteries. Now there was a famous stumper, by condition a bondwoman enfranchised, named Hispala Fessenia, too good ywis for that occupation which she used while she was a young wench and a bondservant: but yet still after that she was manumitted and in franke state of a freed denizen, she mainteined her selfe by the same trade and manner of living. Grown she was into familiar acquaintance with the foresaid young Ebutius, by reason they were neere neighbours, and dwelt not farre asunder: yet so, as she endamaged not the youth one jot either in charging his purse, or touching his credit. For she it was that first was enamored upon him, and him she wooed: and for as much as he had but short allowance every way from his mother and father in law, and by them kept hardly, he was mainteined well by the bounteous liberalitie of this loving harlot. Nay, more than that, in continuance of time she was so deeply ingaged in him, that when her owne patron was dead, and herselfe at the disposition of none, she sued unto the Tribunes and the Pretour for another tutor, because she ment to make her last will and testament, wherein she declared Ebutius her onely heire in remainder to all that she had. There passing thus betweene them these gages and pledges of love, and they using to empert the one unto the other the secrets of their hearts, the young youth by way of mery and pleasant talke, willed her one day not to marvell or thinke any thing in it, if for certeine nights he lay away and parted beds with her: for that upon a religious zeale and devotion that he had, he was minded to be professed and consecrated by the priests of Bacchus, and all to be afoiled from a vow made in regard of his health. The woman hearing him say so, and troubled in spirit, Mary god forfend, quoth she, and I would not that for all the good in the world. And better it were for me and you too to dye both at once, than so to do: and with that she threatned, she cursed and banned, wishing all mischiefe and plague to light upon them that had put such a thing into his head. The youth wondered much to heare her words, and to see her so to fare and take on beyond all reason and order, beseeching her of all

A all loves to be content, and to forbear those cursed speeches, and said withall it was his owne mother, by the consent of his father in law, that had enjoyned him so to do. And is it that father in law of yours, quoth she, (for peradventure I should not do well to blame your mother) that hasteneth you by this action of yours, to make shipwrack of your honestie and chastitie, of your credit and good name, of your hope another day, and lastly, to hazard your very life? Hereat the young man marvelled much more than before, and desired earnestly to know the depth of all this matter. Then after she had prayed all gods and goddes to pardon her, if for tender love and affection that she bare unto him, she could neither will nor chuse but reveale those secrets that in deed were to be concealed, she set tale on end and said, That she her selfe once entred into that chappell, when as she waited upon her mistresse, but since that she was made free and at her own libertie, she never set foote within the dore. And upon my knowledge (qd. she) it is the very shop and workhouse of all wickednes that can be devised. And now for certeine these two yeares last past, there is not one professed and admitted to those mysteries there, who is above 20 yeeres of age. So soone as any one is inducted and brought in thither, she or he is delivered to the priests as a very sacrifice to be killed: for they lead them to a place which resoundeth with yelling and crying, with singing of divers consorts, with jangling noyse of cymbals, with thumping and beating of tabers, to the end that the voice of any one that crieth and complaineth of force and violence done to the abuse of his or her bodie, might not be heard. Now I beseech you therefore and of all loves I pray you, that in any case by one meanes or other ye avoid this, howsoever ye do: and plunge not your selfe headlong thither, where first you shall be sure to be named. And never would she let the youth go from her, untill he had made her faithfull promise to abstaine and forbear such mysteries and ceremonies. When hee was come home, and that his mother was in hand with him, telling him what hee must do this day and that day, and so forth, she flatly denied and said plainly he would do neither the one nor the other, and at one word, professed and consecrated he would not be, whatsoever came of it. His father in law was present & at one end of this resolute speech of his. His mother straightwaies cried out and said, that he could not find in his hart to lie apart from Hispala one ten daies, and that he was so far bewitched and envenomed with the charmes & poisoned allurements & baits of that false serpent & perilous Hydra, that he had no respectie regard either of his mother, or mothers husband, nor any reverent feare of the immortal gods. The mother rated him of one side, the father bailed & coured him on another, till in the end they hunted him out of dores with 4 bondslaves besides. The yong man betooke himselfe to Ebutia, an aunt that he had by his fathers side, and shewed her the whole matter, why his mother had thrust him out of her house by the head and shoulders: which done, by her advise and counsell the next day he opened and declared the same in great secret, without the hearing of any earthly creature, to the Consul Posthumius. The Consul commanded him to repaire again unto him three dayes after, & so for that time dismissed him. Then the Consul in the meane while enquired of his wives mother Sulpitia, a grave and sober matron, whether she knew an old wife called Ebutia dwelling in the Aventine? Yes that I do qd. she, and I know her to be an honest dame, and a woman of the old world, and few her like now E adayes. I must needs speake with her (qd. he) and therefore I would have you send a messenger unto her, for to will her to come hither. Ebutia at the first sending came unto Sulpitia; and the Consul within a while sorted (as it were by chance) into their companie, and began to find some talke of her brothers sonne Ebutius: with that, the womans eyes stood full of water, and with teares she began to bewaile the case and mishap of the young man; who being spoiled of all his goods and patrimonie (by those who of all others should least have done it) was now at home in her house, chased and driven out of doores by his owne mother: for that the honest good youth (God blesse us all and be mercifull unto us) was unwilling to be consecrated and admitted to certaine filthie and detestable sacrifices (if all be true that is reported thereof.) The Consul had enough now, and was fully perswaded of Ebutius that he had told him no lie. Then hee gave Ebutia leave to goe her waies home, and requested his mother in law Sulpitia aforesaid, to send likewise for Hispala from thence out of the Aventine to come unto her; a woman (qd. hee) enfranchised and well enough known to all the neighbours of that street: for that I have somewhat also to say to her. Hispala was somewhat disquieted at this message, to think that she should be sent for to so noble and honourable a dame, and knew no cause wherefore. But after that she

law the Licitors before the entrie of the dore, the troupe and traine also belonging to the Consull, and withall, the Consull himselfe in person, shee was asstonied and (in manner) halfe dead. The Consull taking with him his wives mother, had the woman into an inward rume of the house, and said unto her, That shee need not to bee affraid, if so be she could find in her heart to tell the truth: and for assurance thereof, she should have the faithfull word and promise either of Sulpitia (a ladie of so good credit and reputation) or of himselfe, if need were. Only he would have her to utter and declare what was ordinarily done at the grove of Similla in the Bacchanals, where they used to sacrifice in the night season. The woman had no sooner heard that word, but she fell into such a feare, trembling and quaking all over her bodie, that for a good while she was not able to open her lips and speake a word: but after shee was come to her selfe againe out of this traunce, and by them heartened and encouraged, she said, That when she was a very young wench and a bond-maiden, shee, together with her mistresse, was there professed and consecrated: but for certaine yeeres of late, and namely since that she was enfranchised and made free, shee was not acquainted with the place, nor wist not what worke was there. I con thet thanks for this yer (quoth the Consull) that thou deniest not how thou wert there entred into that profession; but lay on and tell out the rest as truly and faithfully. Shee answered againe, That she knew no more than shee had already disclosed. The Consull replied upon her and said, That in case shee were taken in a trip, and that another came forth to her face and reprooved her, shee should neither find the same pardon nor have the like favour at his hands, as otherwise shee might if of her selfe shee confessed the thing, forasmuch as hee who had all from your owne mouth, hath already discovered the whole. The woman knew where he was then, and was persuaded verily (as it was indeed) that Ebutius was a blab of his tongue, and had revealed this secret: whereupon shee fell downe at the feet of Sulpitia; and first began in most humble manner to beseech her, that she would not suffer, that words of course passed betwene her an enfranchised woman and her paramour, should turne not onely to earnest and importance, but also to a capitoll matter, to touch her as much as her life was worth: for what I said (quoth shee) was but to fright him, and not for that I knew any such thing. Posthumius hereat was chafed, and fell into a fit of chol-ler: What? (quoth hee) thou thinkest belike that thou art jesting and cogging with thy lover Ebutius, and forgettest how thou art in the house of a right worshipfull ladie, and in communication with a Consull. But Sulpitia on the other side, willed her to stand up, (affrighted as she was) and withall, both exhorted her to be of good cheere, and also appeased the wrath of her sonne in law. In the end, after she had taken a better heart unto her, she greatly blamed and found fault with the disloyaltie and falshood of Ebutius for serving her so, and requiting her full badly again for so singular a good turne that shee had done him: and then said, That shee stood in great awe of the gods, whose secrets shee should reveale and divulge; but in greater feare of men, who no doubt for bewraying these matters, would be readie to teare her in pieces with their very hands. And therefore she besought Sulpitia, and entreated the Consull to take some order for her, and to send her into some place out of Italy, where she might passe the rest of her daies in safetie yet of her life. Be of good cheere woman (quoth the Consull) let me alone for that, I will provide well enough, that thou shalt live at Rome, and that without all daunger. Then declared Hispala the originall and first commencements of these sacrifices and solemnities. At the beginning (quod shee) it was a privileged place and consecrated for women onely, and they alone medled with those mysteries; neither was it the custome and manner, that a man should enter in among them: and three ser holidays they had in the yeere, during which time, the priests of Bacchus performed their ceremonies in the day time, and folke were admitted by them, to their religion and profession; and women they were all (and those matrons) who were created priests for that purpose, in their time and turne one after another. But Paculla Minia (a Campane woman) when she was the priest, changed all, as being advertised and admonished by the gods so to doe: for shee was the first that sacred and admitted men, to wit, her owne sonnes Minius and Herennius the Cerrinians: shee altered the solemnitie from the day to the night; and for three dayes in the whole yeere, shee ordained five in every moneth, to serve for the attendance and ministerie of M these mysteries. Since which time that these sacrifices and ceremonies were thus divulged, and men and women intermingled together, and the licentious liberty of the night time also to help all forward, there is no act so wicked, no fact so filthy, but there it is committed: and more full and unnaturall abuse there is, of mankind one with another, than there is of women. If any are are either unwilling to suffer this foule filthinesse, or bestirre themselves more dully in the beastly action and performance of that villanie, such presently are to be killed and sacrificed as beafts. And this is supposed amongst them, the principall point and summe of their religion, To hold and beleve that nothing is unlawfull whatsoever. The men shaking & wagging their bodies too and fro after a fanaticall fashion, as if they were beftaught and out of their right wits, seeme to divine and tell things to come. The women, attired like the shee-priests of Bacchus, with their heads unbound and their haire hanging loose about their eares, runne downe with flaming torches to the river Tyber; where they dip their torches into the water, and take them out againe light burning still, because they are made with sulphur vife and quicke lime: and they say, that certaine men are by the gods carried away from among them, no man knoweth whither; such as they bind fast to a certaine engine or frame, and harrie them out of sight into certain hidden caves: and those be such, as either would not sweare to be of their conspiracie, or be parteners with them in all their mischievous designments, or endure against kind to be abused. The number and multitude there assembled, is exceeding great, and growne now to be another bodie of a people: and among them are some noble persons, as well men as women. But now for these two yeeres last past, ordeined it is, That none should be there professed and sacred above twentie yeeres old; for such ages they lay for, to serve their turne, as are soonest seduced and drawn to enour, or most subject to be forced to suffer abuse and villanie. When shee had thus finished her information and discovered all, shee fell downe upon her knees againe, and lay at their feet, and repeated her former supplication the second time, to wit, That he would send her away out of the country. Then the Consull intreated his mother in law to spare some void corner of her house, whereunto Hispala might retire her selfe, and there make her abode. So he allowed her an upper lodging in her house, and the staires that led toward the street were stopped up, and the entrance turned into the house. Then presently were all the moveable goods and household stuffe of Fessenia remooved, and her family sent for thither, and there entertained. Likewise Ebutius was commaunded to goe and lodge with a tenant or client belonging to the Consull. Thus when both the informers were forth-coming and under Posthumius his hand, he declared the whole matter to the Senate. And after hee had laid every thing abroad in order, namely, what was reported to him first, and what he had learned afterwards by enquire, the LL. of the Senat were surprized with exceeding great feare, as well in regard generally of the commonweale, least those conspiracies, nightly meetings and conventicles, might import some secret complot of mischief and daunger: as also for doubt in particular, that some of their owne friends or familie should bee accessarie and culpable. The Senate yet were of this mind, that the Consull was highly to be praised and thanked, for that hee had found out and brought to light such a matter as this, both with so singular care and diligence, and also without any tumult and uprore. Then they tooke order and ordained, Imprimis, That the Consuls should have an extraordinary commission to make search and inquisition into these Bacchanales & night-sacrifices. Item, That Ebutius and Fessenia the informers thereof, should not bee prejudiced thereby, nor come to harme for it, yea, and that a recompence and reward should bee propounded to others that could give light and reveale the same. Item, That the priests belonging to these religions, bee they men or women, should bee sought out nor onely at Rome, but in all other market townes, faires and places of frequent resort, and convented before the Consuls to be and remain at their disposition. Item, That proclamation be made at Rome, and edicts sent out throughout all Italie, that no person whatsoever, who had beene sacred and professed religious by the priests of Bacchus, resort any more into assembly or conventicle for those sacrifices, never doe ought pertaining to such divine service. And above all things, that information and presentment be made of all those that had frequented such meetings or conventicles, to commit whoredome or any such filthinesse and wickednesse. And these were the ordinances of the Senate. The Consuls then granted their warrants out to the Aediles Curule, to make diligent search and enquire for those priests of that religion, and upon apprehension to keep them in free ward and large prison forth-coming for to be examined: also to the Aediles of the Commons to looke well, that no service of the gods be celebrated in secret. Moreover, the Triumvirs capitall were streightly charged to set good watch and ward throughout the cittie, and see to meetings by night, for feare that no skare-fire caught hold of any place. To those three Commissaries or Triumvirs were five other Quinquavirs adjoined assistants, who every one should watch well and take keepe of all the

humus for the

the houses of his quarter within Tyberis. Then the Consuls having set them about these their feverall charges, mounted up the Rostra or place of publicke audience. And when the people were assembled together, then the Consul after he had pronounced the solemne praier which magistrates are wont to use as a preamble, before they make speech unto the people, began his Oration unto them in this wise. Never in any of your assemblies, ô Quirites, was this solemne praier unto the gods, either so meet and convenient, or so requisite and needfull as in this, to advertise and put you in mind, that those be the true gods indeed whom your aunceltors ordained, that you should honour, serve, worship and pray unto, and not these here who pricke & provoke (as it were) with goads of furies, your spirits and minds transported and caried away with false and straunge religions, to commit all wickednesse, mischeefe, and filthie lust. Certes, for mine owne part I wot not either what I were best to conceale, or how farre forth to speake out and utter my mind. If you know not all, I doubt I should give you occasion to bee negligent; againe, if I discover all, I feare me that I shall affright and terrifie you too much. But what and how much soever I shall say, be yee sure it will bee farre lesse than the greatnes and enormitie of the thing requieth.
Yet endeavour will we so much to deliver, as may suffice to give you a warning and watchword to take heed. This am I well assured of, that you understand not onely by heare say and bare report, but also by the ringing noises and yelling cries in the night season, that the Bacchanales have been a long time kept over all Italie, yea and in many places throughout the citie of Rome, which resoundeth againe therewith. But what manner of thing it is, I am verily perswaded there is not one of you that knoweth. Some beleefe that it is a certaine worship and service of the gods; others suppose it is some foolerie and wanton pastime tolerated and winked at. But bee what it will be, they thinke there are but a few interested and employed therein. As touching the number and multitude of them, if I should tell you that they were many thousands, you cannot chuse but suddainely bee afraid, unlesse I also presently shew, who they bee and of what qualitie.
Know yee therefore first and formost, that the most part of them are women (and from thence is sprung the source of all this mischeefe.) Then are there men indeed, but such as for all the world resemble women, so effeminate they are: such I say, as have abandoned themselves as well to bee abused as to abuse others: fanaticall persons and bestraught of their wits by reason of excessive watching, past sence and even astonied with bibbing of wine without measure, with howling, hollaing and crying all night without intermission. This conventicle of conspiratours is yet of no great force, howbeit it gathereth much strength, in regard that they multiplie still, & their number is every day more than other. Your aunceltors in times past would in no wise admitt that yee should assemble together at a venture and without important and just occasion, unlesse it were either by rearing a standerd or banner upon the fortresse for to levie an armie; or to gather the people together to give their voices in elections of magistrates; or that the Tribunes proclaimed a generall congregation of the common people; or some of the magistrates summoned them to an open audience for to heare an Oration: and where soever a multitude were thus met together, there they ordained and thought meet to have a lawfull governour and overseer of them. But what kind of night conventicles thinke ye first these might be, and namely, where men and women are met and jumbled together pell mell one with another? In faith, if yee wilt at what age they of the male sexe are professed and made novices, yee would not onely pitee them, but also be ashamed and dismaied. Thinke yee my masters Quirites, that young men thus professed and having taken this oth, are meet to make souldiours of? and that yee are to put weapons into the hands of such as are taken out of that stinking and detestable chappell? Shall these, thus stained, polluted, and overwhelmed with filthie uncleannesse, as well of their owne kind as others, fight for the pure chastitie, for the honestie I say of your wives and children? Lesse harme had it beene, if they could have rested so, and become onely effeminate by their owne unchast impuritie (for that had redounded most to their proper shame and dishonour) and not have abused their hands to practise mischeefe, and busied their braines to contrive fraud and deceit. But never was there in Commonweale either so great and dangerous a maladie, or touching more persons, or reaching to farther matters of greater consequence. For wot yee well this, that all the sinfull parts committed for these late yeers, were it filthie lust, crastie coulening, or any wickednes whatsoever, proceeded and sprung out of this one ungracious chappell and place of counterset holinesse, and no other. Yet have they not put in practise all their mischeefes, which they have most cursedly plotted and sworne to execute. Hetherto their impious and detestable conspiracie

A spiracie hath broken out, and passed no further than to particular and privat mischeefs, because they have not gathered force and strength ynough to invade and oppresse the Common-weale. Howbeit the evill encreaseth, and the maladie spreadeth further daily, and by this time is growne so much, as it will not containe within the private fortune and condition of particular persons, but threateneth the very maine State of the Commonweale. And unlesse (Quirites) ye take order to prevent it, these night-congregations may soone bee as frequent and great as this present assembly, summoned by order of law and commaundement of the Consul, in the open day time. Now are they (singled by themselves apart) afraid of you, when they see you thus all assembled together; but so soone as you are retired either to your houses within the citie, or fannes in the country, and by that meanes severed asunder, they will surely meet together; devise they will and consult both to save themselves, and also to ruinate and destroy you at once. Then take heed to your selves: then shall you (singled one from another) bee in dread and daunger of them all in generall. It behooveth therefore every one of you to desire and wish, that all they who belong any way unto your charge, be wise and well given. Then, if either fleshy lust or furious rage, have drawne and haled any one of them headlong into that gulfe and sinke of sinne, to hold such a person to be of their crue, with whom he hath thus sworne and devoted himselfe to all sinne and abominable wickednesse, and not reckon him of your owne retinue & traine any more. Moreover, carelesse I am not of your owne persons in this behalfe, that none of you should be seduced and led away with error. For nothing is there in the world, that deceiveth more under faire semblance, than false religion. For when the name and majestic of the gods is pretended to cover and colour naughtinesse, suddainely there entereth into our mind a scrupulous awe, which doth captivate and possesse our conscience, for feare least in chastising and punishing humane trespas-ses, we violate and offend some divine right and power therewith. But of this scrupulositie discharge yee are, by an infinite number of Pontificall decrees, acts of Senate, yea, and answeres of divine Sages and Soothsaiers. For how many a time and often in the daies of our fathers and grandfathers, hath commision beene graunted to the Magistrates, To restraine and forbid expressly all forraine sacrifices and straunge liturges? To chase and banish all odde hedge-priests, wizards, tellers of fortunes, and Magicians out of the common place, out of the shew place and theatre, yea, and quite out of the citie? To search out all their bookes of Magicke and prophesies, and to set a fire on them? Lastly, to abolish all other order and manner of sacrificing, but according to the Cannon, forme, and order of Rome? For they judged (wise men as they were, and deeply scene in all divine and humane lawes) nothing so forcible to ruinate and overthrow religion, as when divine service is celebrated after some straunge and forraine fashion, and not according to the auncient custome of the place. Thus much I thought good by way of caveat to foretell you of, to the end, that no superstitious opinion should trouble your spirits when you shall see us to demolish and overthrow the Bacchanales, and scatter these unlawfull assemblies. For all this will we doe with the good leave, favour and grace of the gods. Who being highly offended to see their divinitie and godhead thus polluted with wicked and abominable filthinesse, have discovered the same, lying hidden in darkenesse, and brought it to light: neither in their wisdom and providence, was it their will & pleasure, that such enormities thus detected, should remain unpursued, but be suppressed and extinguished for ever. Now hath the Senate directed out unto mee and my colleague, an extraordinarie commision and warrant to make due inquisition hereinto: by vertue whereof, wee for our parts will accomplish our charge accordingly with all diligence and expedition. As for the night-watch throughout the citie, wee have given order alreadie to the inferiour magistrates to looke unto it. Semblably, meet and reason it is, that every one of you according to his place and calling, quit himselfe well in whatsoever shall bee imposed and laid upon him: and especially to endeavour and prevent, that no daunger or mutinie arise by the maliciousnesse of those that are culpable and offenders. Then the Consuls commaunded the acts of the Senate in this behalfe to be read openly: they propounded and promised also rewards to all informers, that either convented and brought before them any such persons, or presented their names, if they were absent and out of the way. And looke who soever were thus nominated and fled upon it, they would assigne him a certaine day to make his appearance: upon which day, if he answered not to his name when he were called, he should be condemned notwithstanding his absence. And if any of their names were presented, who happened at the time of the information to be without the land of Italie, he should have a longer tearme set downe, to come in and make his answer. After this, they published an edict, forbidding (least any one should be G desirous to sell or buy ought tending to flight and departure) to receive, conceale, aid or main-teine by any meanes those that were about to flie. After the assemblie of the people diffised, great feare there was over all the citie: neither was it contained within the walls, liberties, and territorie only of Rome, but in all parts of Italie they began to quake and tremble for feare; and namely after that letters came from their friends and acquaintance, touching the ordinance of the Senate, the solempne assembly of the people, and the Edict of the Consuls aforesaid. The night next following that day (wherein this matter was thus declared openly in audience before the people) many would gladly have started aside and bene gone, but apprehended they were and brought back againe by the Triumvers, who had set a good watch at every gate. Many presentments were made, and certeine persons thus presented, as well men as women, killed them- H selves. It is reported that there were found in this conspiracie of both sexes one with another above seven thousand. The principall heads were knowne for certeine to be M. and L. Catinius, Romanes both, and by calling * not so good as Senatours: L. Opitermius of Falernj, and Minus Cerinius a Campane. These were the ringleaders of the rest, from them arose all mischief and villanie whatsoever: these were the chiefe priests (surreverence) and the founders forsooth of this religion. To apprehend these persons with all speed, no possible meanes were neglected. And when they were brought before the Consuls, they confessed all, and for any let in them, they might presently have bene condemned. But such a number there was of them who fled out of the citie, that because the actions and goods of many men hereby were in danger to be lost and perish, the Pretours T. Manius and M. Licinius were constrained by the Senate to give thirte I dayes respite and delay for the pleas, untill such time as the Consuls went through with their inquisition. By occasion of the same infrequencie (for that they whose names were presented, neither made answer nor could be found) the Consuls were enforced to ride their circuit about market townes and places of resort, and there to hold Assise and Sessions for to make inquisition, and judicially to proceed in sentence against the offenders. As many as they found to be only entred, and to have taken orders, namely such as according to a certeine forme of words endited and prompted by the priest, had made their prayers saying after him (in which was contained a detestable sacrament and oth that they tooke, to commit all wicked acts and beately filthines, and yet notwithstanding had offered and done no such act either in their owne persons or in others, to which they were obliged by oth) those I say they left still in prison and durance. K But such as were defiled with filthines of lust, polluted with bloudie murders, such as were attaint and steined, with bearing false witness, with forging and foisting of wills and testaments, with counterfeiting of seales, and other such coufening casts, those they executed with losse of life, and the number of them that thus were put to death surmounted those other that suffred only imprisonment. But a wonderous multitude there was of both sorts the one and the other, and those as well women as men. As many of the women as were condemned, they committed over to their next kinsfolke, or to those guardians under whose tuition and subjection they were, that they might themselves privily at home punish them accordingly. But if there were none to be found meete to do the execution, then they suffred publicly abroad in the face of the world.

After this, a commission was graunted to the Consuls, for to overthrow and pull downe first at L Rome, and then throughout Italie, all the places of these Bacchanales, unlesse in any of them there stood some old altar or image consecrated. And for the time to come by an act of the Senate a prohibition went out, that there should be no Bacchanales any more either in Rome, or in all Italie. Moreover, if any person made some conscience of this religion, and held it for a devout, solempne and necessarie institution, and withall protested before the Pretour of the citie, that he could not lay away the same without prick, remorse, and clogge of conscience: then the said Pretour was to put the cause in question before the Senate, and if the Senate (assembled in no lesse frequencie than one hundred) would allow and permit the same, then might the partie solempnize that devotion and divine service: provided alwayes, that there were not above five persons present thereat, to assist him, nor any common silver to be used in the ministerie, M nor Offer-master, nor Priest. Over and besides, another act of the Senate there was joyned unto this, and the same moved by the Consull Q. Martius, That as touching those persons whom the Consull had for the enformers and revealers of this matter, the full authoritie in disposing of them, should be wholly referred to the Senat, so soone as Sp. Posthumius had finished his inquision, sition, and was returned to Rome. As for Cerinius the Campane, they ordeined that he should be sent to Ardea, there to lye in prison, and that the magistrates of Ardea should have a charge given them beforehand to looke to their prisoner more streightly, that neither hee brake prison and made an escape, nor yet might have meanes and opportunitie to make himselfe away.

After a certeine time Sp. Posthumius came to Rome againe, and when he put to question before the Senate, concerning the reward of P. Ebutius, and Hispala Fessenia, for that by their meanes the Bacchanales were disclosed, there passed an act and decree, That the Treasurers of the citie should deliver unto them out of the citie chamber 100000 asses apeece. Also that the Consuls should deale with the Tribunes of the Commons for to preferre a bill unto the people, as soone as possibly they might, that P. Ebutius for ever after might be exempt from souldierie, and have his pensión and fee, as if he had accomplished his terme of service by law required, so as he neither were compelled to go to warfare against his will, nor the Censors should assigne unto him a publick horse of service. Moreover, that Fessenia Hispala might have the libertie and power to make a deed of gift or alienation of her goods unto whom she pleased, yea and spend the same, and do therewith what she thought good. Item, that she might be wedded out of her owne famille into what house she would her selfe, and make choise of her tutor and patron to her owne liking and contentment, as if her husband by his will and testament had so ordeined & set down.
Item, that she might be wedded to one of franke condition or freeborne, and that he who had espoused and married her, should not thereby susteine discredit or receive damage. Finally, that not only the Cos. and Pretors now in place, but also those hereafter to come, should provide and C take order that no wrong be done to that woman, but secure her from all harme. This the Senat judged meet and requisite to be done. All these things were likewise propounded unto the Com. and executed according to the ordinance of the Senat. Finally, as touching both the impunitie and also the recompense of other the enformers, it was referred to the discretion of the Consuls.
By this time Q. Martius also having finished the inquisition in his circuit and quarter, made preparation to go into his province of Liguria, after he had received for to supply and make up his legions 3000 foot, and 150 horsemen Romanes, besides 5000 footemen and 200 horse of Latines. The same province with the like number as well of horse as foote, was decreed likewise unto his companion in government. Those armies they tooke charge of which the former yere D C. Flaminius and M. Aemilius the Consuls had: moreover by an act of the Senat, enjoyned they were to enroll two new legions besides: and withall they levied of the Latine allies 20000 foot, and 3000 horse; 3000 footmen also, and 200 horsemen Romanes. All these forces (setting aside the legions) it was thought good to be led to furnish out the armie in Spaine. And therefore the Consuls whiles they were themselves in person occupied about the foresaid inquisitions, gave commission to T. Menius for to take the musters. And when those enquests were performed and done as is before said, Q. Martius tooke his journey first of the twaine towards the Apuans in Liguria. But whiles in eger pursuit of them hee engaged himselfe into the secret and blind passages, wherein at all times they had their lurking retrails and places of safe receit: within those streights and passages which the enemies had seized before, hee was environed by them in a place of great disadvantage: where he lost foure thousand souldiours, with three ensignes of E the second legion, and eleven banners of the Latine allies, which were all taken by the enemies.
Also, much armour and many weapons were throwne away here and there, by reason that they were encumbered therewith as they fled through the woodie paths of the forest: neither did the Ligurians give over their chase, before that the Romanes ended their flight. The Consull, so soon as he was escaped out of the enemies territorie, sent his armie away into divers parts of the peaceable countrey, to the end, that it might not be seene, how much his forces were empaired, yet could not he for all that suppress and smoulder the bruit that was blowne abroad of his unfortunate journey, nor cancell the remembrance of the overthrow: for ever after, the forest out of which the Ligurians hunted him, was called The streights of Martius. A little before the F newes of the affaires in Liguria, the letters out of Spaine were read, containing sorrow mixed with joy; to wit, That C. Catinius (who two yeere before went as Pretour into that province) fought a field with the Lusitanes in the territorie of Asta; where, fixe thousand enemies fell upon the sword; and the rest were discomfited, put to flight, and driven out of their campe. Afterwards, hee conducted his legions to the assault of the towne Asta, which he forced and woun, with no greater adoe than before hee gained their campe. But as he approached nere the walles

and tooke no good heed to himselfe, hee was wounded, and of his hurt within few dayes died. C Vpon the reading of these letters (importing the death of the Propretour) the Senat was of advise to dispatch a messenger (to overtake the Pretor C. Calpurnius) as farre as the port of Luna, and give him to understand from the Senat, that their advise was, he should make all the hast he could in his journey, to the end, that the province might not be without a governour there to commaund. The courier which was sent, within foure daies arrived at Luna: and but few daies before, Calpurnius was departed and had put himselfe in his journey.

Moreover, L. Manlius Acidinus (who was gone into his province at the same time that C. Ca-tinus went) strucke a battaile likewise with the Celtiberians in the hither province of Spaine. But they departed on both sides out of the field with doubtfull victorie, save onely that the Celtiberians the next night following, dislodged and removed from thence: whereby the Romans had H libertie and time both to interre their dead, and to gather up the spoiles of their enemies. And within few daies after, the same Celtiberians having raised a more puissant armie, of themselves gave the Romanes battaile neere the citie Calagurris. It is not set downe in the historie, what I should be the cause why they were the weaker, considering their number was reinforced: but soiled they were in fight and had the overthrow. Of the enemies there died upon 12000, and not so few as 2000 taken prisoners: and the Romanes likewise were masters of the camp. And had not Manlius bene impeached and restrained in this traine of victorie (which hee hotly followed) by the comming of Calpurnius his successour in government, the Celtiberians had been utterly subdued. The new Pretours withdrew both armies to their wintering harbours.

At the same time that these newes came out of Spaine, the playes called Taurilia were exhibited two dayes together, in the honour of the gods. And after them, M. Fulvius set out (with great furniture in sumptuous manner for the space of ten daies) his plaies which hee had vowed in the Ætolian war. And for to doe him honor, and grace this solemnitie, many cunning actors and players came out of Greece. This was the first time that there was represented at Rome, the shew of champions and wraistlers for the best game: then also was exhibited the pastime of hunting and baiting Lyons and panthers: and in one word, these sports were celebrated with as great magnificence and varietie almost as the moderne pastimes and games in these daies. After all this, was holden a Novendiall feast; during which, there was much sacrificing, and all by occasion that for three dayes it rained stones in the Picene countrey: and because it was reported, that the lightning in divers places and in sundry sorts, had blasted and lightly singed the garments especially, of many folke. To the said feast, there was adjoynd a supplication of one day, K ordained by a decree of the Pontifies, for that the chappell of the goddesse Ops (standing in the Capitol:) was smitten with a thunderbolt. In regard of these prodigies, the Consuls procured expiation by sacrificing greater beasts, and so they purged and hallowed the citie. At the same time word was brought out of Vmbria, that there was an Hermaphrodite or Skrat found, almost twelve yeeres old. This was held for a detestable and abominable monster; and therefore order was given, that it should be kept out of the territorie of Rome, and killed out of hand.

The same yeere, certaine Gaules from beyond the Alpes passed into the territorie of Venice, without forraying, spoiling, and using any manner of hostilitie; and not farre from the place where as now Aquileia standeth, they seized upon a plot of ground to build a citie in. Certaine L Romane Embassadours were sent about this matter, beyond the Alpes; where they received this intelligence and answere from the inhabitants of the countrey, That neither those Gaules took that voiage and expedition by authoritie and warrant from the whole nation, neither knew they what they did in Italie.

L. Scipio likewise about the same time, set out his playes for ten daies together; for which hee said, that he had made a vow during the time of the warre against Antiochus, and he defraied the charges thereof with the mony contributed unto him by divers KK, and States for that purpose.
Valerius Antias writeth, that after he was condemned, and his goods confiscate and sold, he was sent in embassage into Asia, for to take up certaine controversies and differences betweene the two kings Antiochus and Eumenes; and then it was (saith he) that the said contribution was made, M and many skilfull artificers and players gathered unto him out of all Asia; and in the end, after this Embassage, he moved the Senate for these games, because hee had made no mention nor words at all of them after the said warre: by occasion whereof (by Valerius his saying) he vowed them.

The

A The yeere beeing now at an end, Q. Martius in his absence was to leave his magistracie: and Q. Posthumius having sitten upon the inquisition aforesaid, and with all fidelitie and carefull diligence that might be, brought it to an end, held the solemne assembly for election of magistrates: wherein were chosen Consuls, Ap. Claudius Pulcher and M. Sempronius Tuditanus. And the morrow after were elected for Pretors, P. Cornelius Cethegus, A. Posthumius Albinus, C. Afranius Stellio, C. Attilius Serranus, L. Posthumius Tempstanus, and M. Claudius Marcellus. At the yeeres end, upon the relation of Sp. Posthumius the Consull, that in his vifitation about the en-quests aforesaid, as he rode along the sea coasts of Italie on both sides, he found certaine colonies dispeopled and desolate, to wit, Sipontum upon the Adriaticke sea, and Buxentum upon the Tufcane. T. Manius the citie Pretour (by vertue of an act of the Senate in that behalfe) B created three commissaries called Triumvirs, for to enroll and plant new inhabitants there, namely, L. Scribonius Libo, M. Tuccius, and Cn. Babius Tamphilus.

The warre against king Persus and the Macedonians, which now was a breeding, arose not upon that cause and occasion which most men imagine, ne yet from Persus himselfe: for the first ground-woke thereof was laid by Philip, who if hee had lived longer, would have beene scene in open action. One thing there was above the rest which stung him, at what time as the Romanes imposed conditions upon him after he was vanquished, to wit, That the Senat laid a barre for to be revenged of those Macedonians who had revolted from him: which hee despaired not but it had ben possible to have obtained at their hands, considering that Quintius in the capitulations of peace, reserved that point entire and excepted not against it. Now afterwards, C when Antiochus was defeated in the battaile of Thermopylae, and that both Philip and the Consull entred upon severall exploits; Acilius went in hand to assault Heraclea, and Philip at the same time the citie of Lamia. Heraclea was no sooner forced, but Philip had commandement to levie his siege before Lamia, and the towne was yielded to the Romanes: and this hee tooke to the heart. Howbeit, the Consull appeased his choller for the time, in that making hast in person to Naupactum (unto which towne the Ætolians after their rout were retired) he suffered Philip to warre upon Athamania and Aminander; to adjoyne also and lay unto his kingdome those cities which the Ætolians had taken from the Thessalians. Now had Philip chased Aminander out of Athamania, and woon certaine cities without any great adoe. Demetrias also (a strong citie of great importance, and very commodious for all things) together with the nation of the D Magneres, he brought under his obedience. After this, he forced certain townes in Asia, which were troubled with the seditious variance of their principall and great personages, by reason that they knew not how to use their new libertie, wherewith they had not bene acquainted: hee woon these cities (I say) by taking part with those, who in this civile dissention were the weaker, and otherwise would have gone to the walles. By these meanes the wrath of the king against the Romanes was well allaid for the present: nevertheless, hee ceased not all the time of peace to bethinke how hee might gather more strength, and be able to warre againe, whensoever any good occasion should bee presented unto him. Hee encreased therefore the revenues of the crown, not onely by raising taxes out of all the fruits of the earth, and setting impost and customs upon all merchandise brought into his realme by sea from forrein parts; but also revived E the rents & issues of the old mines which had discontinued, yea & in many places ordained new.
Moreover, to replenish his countrey, which by many calamities following war, was dispeopled, he not onely tooke order that his subjects should multiplie by forcing them to get, breed, and bring up children, but also translated a great multitude of Thracians into Macedonie; and for a good time wherin he was in repose and rest from the war, he bent his whole mind, and employed all his studie how to make himselfe great, and augment the puissance of his kingdome. Then old matters and quarrels were renewed, which might whet his stomacke, and kindle his anger against the Romanes. For the complaints which the Thessalians and the Perrhoeians made for that their cities were by him possessed, likewise those greivances which the embassadours of king Eumenes laid abroad touching the Thracian townes, which hee seized and held by force, F were heard by the Romanes; so as it evidently appeared, that they neglected them not. But that which moved the Senate most, was this, That they had intelligence how hee intended to be lord of Ænus and Maronea: as for the Thessalians, they tooke lesse regard of them. Moreover, there came the embassadours of Athamania, who complained not for the losse of some part of their territorie, nor that hee encroched upon their frontiers, but that all Athamania full

full and whole, was reduced under the subjection and jurisdiction of the king. The banished persons also of Maronea, who had beene chased out of the citie by the kings garison (for that they stood in defence and maintenance of libertie) made relation, that not onely Maronea was in the hands of Philip, but the citie of Ænus also. Likewise there came embassadours from Philip, to purge him of all these matters laid to his charge, who averred, That their king and maister had done nothing but by commission and warrant from the Romane Generall. They pleaded and alledged, that the case of the Theſſalian, Perrhæbian, and Magnesian cities, yea, and the whole nation of Athamania together with Aminander, was all one with the Ætoliens: namely, That after Antiochus the king was chased and expelled, the Consull himselfe being employed and occupied in besieging the cities of Ætolia, sent Philip for to recover the States abovenamed, which being vanquished in warre, were now subject unto him. Hereupon the Senate, because they would not determine and set downe any thing in the absence of the king, sent three delegates or Commissioners, to decide these controversies, to wit, Q. Cæcilius Metellus, M. Babinus Tampilus, and T. Sempronius. Vpon whose arrivall, there was published a generall Diet of all those States that were at difference with the king, to bee holden at Tempè in Theſſalie: When they were all set there in counsell, the Romane legates, as umpiers and judges, the Theſſalians, Perrhæbians, and Athamanes as plaintifes and accusers, and Philip as defendant to heare and receive the challenges and accusations against him; the cheefe embassadours from the said cities, pleaded against Philip, bitterly or mildly, more or lesse, according to the severall disposition of their natures, and the proportion either of affectionate favour or malicious hatred which they bare to him. Now all the question and debate touching Philippopolis, Tricca, Phaloria, Eurymenæ, and other townes about them was this, Whether those peeces, considering the Ætoliens woon and held them by force (and wel known it was, that Philip had taken them from the Ætoliens) belonged in right to the Theſſalians, or appertained of old time to the Ætoliens? For Acilius had graunted them unto the king upon these conditions, namely, if they were any of the apperteanances of the Ætoliens, and if they combined and took part with the Ætoliens willingly of their own accord, and not by constraint & force of arms. Vpon like tearms stood the controverſie of the Perrhæbian and Magnesian townes. For the Ætoliens had brought a confusion in all their tenures, by reason that they held and possessed those citties, by taking their vantage upon divers occasions. Besides these substantiall points properly to be decided, the Theſſalians came in with their complaints also: for that those townes (in case they were out of hand delivered unto them yet) hee should render them spoiled, naked and desolate. For over and besides those who miscarried by casualtie of warre, Philip had carried away into Macedonie 500, even the principall floure of their youth, and abused them like slaves, in putting them to base ministeries & servile drudgeries, and looke whatsoeuer by compulsion he redelivered to the Theſſalians, he had taken order afore that they should be good for nothing. As for example (say they) Thebes in Phthia, the onely maritime citie for much trafficke and merchandise, was in times past gainefull and commodious to the Theſſalians, and brought them great revenues and profits. But Philip had turned the staple and all the trade and negotiation by sea from thence to Demetrias, and having gotten hulkes and hoyes, caused them to baulke and passe by Thebes, and direct their course for Demetrias. Nay he could not so much as hold his hands from evil entreating their embassadours, who by law of nations are inviolable. For hee forlaied them in ambush, as they were in their journey to T. Quintus. By which meanes the Theſſalians all in generall were so over-awed by him, and put in such feares, that there is not a man amongst them dare open his mouth, either in their owne citties, or in any of the Diets and Councils of the whole nation. For why? their patronnes of whome they hold their libertie are farre off, but an impetuous lord they have that lieth ever on their skirts, and pricketh them continually in the sides; and will not suffer them to use and enjoy the benefices graunted them by the people of Rome. For take away from them the libertie of speech once, what freedom have they left? And even at this present, for all the assurance and confidence they have in the privilege of embassadours, they rather sigh and grone out their words, than speake frankly, and parley with libertie. And unless the Romanes provide better in some good sort, that both the Greekes remaining in Macedonie, may bee void of fear, and Philip also curb'd and kept short for being so bold, it will be to no purpose at all, that either he was vanquished, or they enfranchised. He is therefore to be held in with a rougher and harder bit in his mouth, like an headstrong and frampold horse, that will not be ruled with a gentle de snaffe. In this sharpe and eager manner dealt the last, whereas the former had used faire language to appeale and mollifie his anger, beseeching his grace to pardon them in case they spake their minds for their libertie, to lay downe the rigour of a lord and maister, to beare himselfe like a kind allic and loving friend, and to take example of the Romanes, and them to imitate, who chose rather to gaine associates by love, than constraine them by feare. After audience given to the Theſſalians, the Perrhæbians came in place, and alledged, that Gonnocondylus (a citie which Philip named Olympias) belonged in right to Perrhæbia: and earnestly they were, that it might be restored unto them. They demanded also to have Malleæ and Ericinium again. Then the Athamanes put in, and spake for their libertie, and to have the forts of Athenæum and Poeræneum rendered unto them. Philip because hee would seeme more like a plaintife than a defendant, & to accuse rather than to be accused, began himselfe also with complaints. He found himselfe grieved, that the Theſſalians had woon by force of armes the citie Menelais in Dolopia, & part of the apperteanances belonging to his kingdom. Item, That the same Theſſalians and the Perrhæbians together had forced Petra in Pieria. As for Xyniæ (an Ætolian towne without all question) they had indeed laid it unto his seignorie, but Parachelois, which should bee under Athamania, by no right in the world was annexed to the Theſſalians, and comprised within their charter. For as touching the matters (quoth he) charged upon me so odiously, namely of laying awaite for the embassadours, of frequenting these port-townes or abandoning those: the one is a meer mockerie & ridiculous thing: namely for me to give account what havens, merchants, and mariners saile unto or arrive at; the other is clean adverse & contrarie to my nature, & that which I never could abide to practise. For this many yeeres (quoth hee) embassadours have never ceased and given over, to informe greivous matters against me to the Romane Generals, and to the Senate at Rome; and which of them ever to this day hath had so much as a foule word given againe unto him from me? Supposed and objected it is, that once they were forlaied by the way as they were going to Quintus, but it is not said withall what happened unto them. This manner of dealing and accusation favoureth of quarrellers that saine would have somewhat to say, bee it never so false, when they can find no matter of truth to charge a man withall. These Theſſalians beyond all meane and measure abuse the kindnesse and indulgence of the people of Rome, and saring as men who had endured a long drought and thirst, they drinke over-greedily, pouring in their libertie, and nothing els to it, and know not when to make an end, and to breake their draught: Like, for all the world to bondslaves sodainly set at freedome beyond their hope and expectation, whose manner is to breake out into broad tearmes and licentious language, and can not containe but revile and raile at their very maisters. And at last, in a furious fit of choler he burst forth into these words, That the sun was not set and gone to bed for ever, but would one day rise again. This minatorie speech of his not only the Theſſalians took to themselves, but the Romanes also construed as a glaunce at them. Vpon these words arose some bruit and murmuring in the assemblie, but being in the end appeased and stilled, hee answered the agents for the Perrhæbians and Athamanes in this wise, That the case and condition of those cities for which they stood, was one & the same, namely, that the Consull Acilius and the Romans passed them unto him by a deed of gift, as having aforetime belonged to their enemies. Now if they who have given, will also take away the same, then (qd. he) I must needs quit my hold, and leese them: but in so doing, they shall to gratifie their fickle, inconstant, & vaine allies, men of no regard, and good for nothing, do meer and manifest wrong to a far better and more faithfull friend. For nothing is there in the world more thanklesse and lesse while accepted than libertie, especially with them who know not how to use it, and by abuse thereof will soone spill the grace of such a benefite. Then the Romane Delegates, having heard the reasons and allegations of both parties the pronounced sentence, That the Macedonian garisons should quit the cities abovesaid, and the realme of Macedonie be confined within the auncient bounds and limits. As touching the injuries which they complained to have bene reciprocally offered from one to another, there was a forme and course of law to be set downe, which should containe a proceſſe and manner, how the matters betweene the Macedonians and the other nations might be reformed and composed. Hereat the king was highly offended and displeased, but the Delegates went their wayes toward Theſſalonica, to visit likewise the cities of Thrace, and to heare their causes; where the embassadours of king Eumenes made a speech to this effect.

If the pleasure of the Romanes be, that the two cities Ænus and Maronea shall be free, it is not not for us in modestie to say any more, but advertise and admonish them to leave the same in Greece which I held in possession aforetime; I refused all, and disdained his alliance, yea, and I professed openly, even before that M. Acilius came over with his armie into Greece, that I was his enemy, and together with that Consull, was employed in what part soever of the warre, which hee charged and laid upon mee. Also when L. Scipio the Consull his successor, determined to lead his armie by land to Hellespont, I not only gave him leave to passe peaceably through my realme, but also caused the high waies to bee paved and gravelled, bridges to bee made against his comming, yea, and furnished him with provision of victuals. And this did I, not in Macedonie alone, but also throughout all Thrace, where among other matters, this was not of least importance and consequence, to restraine those barbarous nations there, from running upon them, and to keepe them in peace and quietnesse. In consideration now of this kind affection of mine (if I may not call it a good desert) unto you, whether ought yee Romanes in reason to give mee somewhat to that I have, to augment and encrease my dominion by your largesse and munificence, or, to take from mee (as you doe) that which I have either in mine owne right, or by gift from you? The Macedonian cities, which you confesse to have been parcels of my kingdome, are not restored unto mee. Eumenes on the other side, he comes to make spoile of me, as if I were Antiochus (marke I pray you the devise of it) he pretendeth a decree of the ten delegates to colour his most shamelesse, impudent, and cautelous falsehood; even that by which himselfe may bee most refused and convicted. For in very expresse and plaine termes it is thus written, That Cherfonnesus and Lysimachia are given to Eumenes. Where I pray you, and in what corner of the instrument and patent stand Aenus, Maronea, and the cities of Thrace? Shall hee obtaine that at your hands, and by your means, as given and graunted from those ten Delegates, which hee never durst so much as once demand and require of them? Tell mee (if the thing bee worth so much) in what place yee would raunge and reckon me? If your purpose bee to persecute mee as an enemy and mortal foe, spare not, but goe on still as yee have begun: but if you respect mee as a king, as your allye and friend, I beseech you, repute me not worthe of so notorious and manifest a wrong. This Oration of the king in some measure mooved the Commissioners, and therefore by framing a meane and indifferent answer, they held the matter still in suspence undecided. If (say they) the cities in question were given to Eumenes, by vertue of a decree set downe by the tenne Delegates, wee will not chaunge nor alter anything therein. But in case Philip acquired them by conquest and force of armes, hee should have held them as the guerdon of his victorie. If neither, wee are of opinion, That the hearing and decision of this difference shall bee referred over to the Senate: and to the end, that all may remaine entire, the garrisons in those cities shall bee withdrawne and depart. These, I say, were the causes that principally estranged the affection of Philip from the Romanes, and wrought discontentment in his heart; insomuch, as evident it is; that the warre was not enterprised by his sonne Perseus upon any new quarrels and fresh occasion, but upon these motives left unto him by his father to be pursued.

No suspition was there at Rome of a Macedonian warre. L. Manlius the Pro-consull was returned out of Spaine: and when he demanded a triumph of the Senate, assembled in the temple of Bellona, the same in regard of his noble and worthie exploits might have been obtained, but for example sake it was not graunted. For an order it was in Rome, by ancient custome of their forefathers, that no man might triumph, who brought not his armie backe with him, unlesse hee left unto his successor the province fully subdued and settled in peace. Howbeit, Manlius was allowed an indifferent honour, namely, to enter into the citie by way of Ovation. In which solemnitie he had borne before him in a pompeous pageant two & fiftie coronets of gold. Moreover in gold a hundred thirtie two pound weight, and in silver sixe thousand three hundred. Also he pronounced aloud in the Senate, that Q. Fabius the Questour was comming, and brought with him ten thousand pound weight more of silver, and eightie of gold, which he meant likewise to bring into the chamber of the citie.

That yee a great commotion and insurrection there was of bondslaves in Apulia. L. Posthumus the Pretour had the government of Tarentum, and he sat in inquisition upon a damned crew of certaine herdmen and grassiers, who had conspired together, and used to rob by the

jeopardie; that when Antiochus of his owne meere motion offered to buy my societie with three thousand talents, and fittie covered shippes of warre, together with all those cities in Greece which I held in possession aforetime; I refused all, and disdained his alliance, yea, and I professed openly, even before that M. Acilius came over with his armie into Greece, that I was his enemy, and together with that Consull, was employed in what part soever of the warre, which hee charged and laid upon mee. Also when L. Scipio the Consull his successor, determined to lead his armie by land to Hellespont, I not only gave him leave to passe peaceably through my realme, but also caused the high waies to bee paved and gravelled, bridges to bee made against his comming, yea, and furnished him with provision of victuals. And this did I, not in Macedonie alone, but also throughout all Thrace, where among other matters, this was not of least importance and consequence, to restraine those barbarous nations there, from running upon them, and to keepe them in peace and quietnesse. In consideration now of this kind affection of mine (if I may not call it a good desert) unto you, whether ought yee Romanes in reason to give mee somewhat to that I have, to augment and encrease my dominion by your largesse and munificence, or, to take from mee (as you doe) that which I have either in mine owne right, or by gift from you? The Macedonian cities, which you confesse to have been parcels of my kingdome, are not restored unto mee. Eumenes on the other side, he comes to make spoile of me, as if I were Antiochus (marke I pray you the devise of it) he pretendeth a decree of the ten delegates to colour his most shamelesse, impudent, and cautelous falsehood; even that by which himselfe may bee most refused and convicted. For in very expresse and plaine termes it is thus written, That Cherfonnesus and Lysimachia are given to Eumenes. Where I pray you, and in what corner of the instrument and patent stand Aenus, Maronea, and the cities of Thrace? Shall hee obtaine that at your hands, and by your means, as given and graunted from those ten Delegates, which hee never durst so much as once demand and require of them? Tell mee (if the thing bee worth so much) in what place yee would raunge and reckon me? If your purpose bee to persecute mee as an enemy and mortal foe, spare not, but goe on still as yee have begun: but if you respect mee as a king, as your allye and friend, I beseech you, repute me not worthe of so notorious and manifest a wrong. This Oration of the king in some measure mooved the Commissioners, and therefore by framing a meane and indifferent answer, they held the matter still in suspence undecided. If (say they) the cities in question were given to Eumenes, by vertue of a decree set downe by the tenne Delegates, wee will not chaunge nor alter anything therein. But in case Philip acquired them by conquest and force of armes, hee should have held them as the guerdon of his victorie. If neither, wee are of opinion, That the hearing and decision of this difference shall bee referred over to the Senate: and to the end, that all may remaine entire, the garrisons in those cities shall bee withdrawne and depart. These, I say, were the causes that principally estranged the affection of Philip from the Romanes, and wrought discontentment in his heart; insomuch, as evident it is; that the warre was not enterprised by his sonne Perseus upon any new quarrels and fresh occasion, but upon these motives left unto him by his father to be pursued.

No suspition was there at Rome of a Macedonian warre. L. Manlius the Pro-consull was returned out of Spaine: and when he demanded a triumph of the Senate, assembled in the temple of Bellona, the same in regard of his noble and worthie exploits might have been obtained, but for example sake it was not graunted. For an order it was in Rome, by ancient custome of their forefathers, that no man might triumph, who brought not his armie backe with him, unlesse hee left unto his successor the province fully subdued and settled in peace. Howbeit, Manlius was allowed an indifferent honour, namely, to enter into the citie by way of Ovation. In which solemnitie he had borne before him in a pompeous pageant two & fiftie coronets of gold. Moreover in gold a hundred thirtie two pound weight, and in silver sixe thousand three hundred. Also he pronounced aloud in the Senate, that Q. Fabius the Questour was comming, and brought with him ten thousand pound weight more of silver, and eightie of gold, which he meant likewise to bring into the chamber of the citie.

That yee a great commotion and insurrection there was of bondslaves in Apulia. L. Posthumus the Pretour had the government of Tarentum, and he sat in inquisition upon a damned crew of certaine herdmen and grassiers, who had conspired together, and used to rob by the high way side, and in the common pastures belonging to the citie; which commission he followed with such severitie and rigor, that he condemned seven thousand of them. Many escaped and fled, but many were executed and suffered death. As for the Consuls, long were they kept in the citie of Rome, about the levie of souldiers, but at length they went into their provinces.

The same yeere, C. Calpurnius and L. Quintius the Pretours in Spaine, having in the beginning of the Spring led forth their armies out of their wintering holds, and joynted their forces together in Beturia, advanced forward into Carpetaine, (where the enemies were encamped) with a resolution to manage and conduct the warre with one joynt mind and common counsell together. Not farre from the cities Hippon and Toletum, there began a skirmish betwene the foragers of both parts, that were gone forth to make provision: seconded they were from the one campe and the other, by meanes whereof, the whole armies of both sides by litle and litle, came forth into the field to strike a full battell. In this tumultuarie medley, the enemies had the vantage, as well of the ground wherein they were embattailed, as of the manner of fight and service. By reason whereof, both the Roman armies were discomfited and driven back into their campe; but the enemies pressed not upon them, notwithstanding they were put in great fright and much disordered. The Romane Pretors doubting least their campe the morrow after should be assailed, dislodged in the night betwene, in great secret & silence, without any sound of trumpet, and departed. In the morning by breake of day, the Spaniards in ordinance of battaille approached the trench and rampier: and being entred within the campe (which they found void and empty beyond their hope and expectation) they rifled and ransacked all that the Romanes left behind them, whiles they made halt away in the night season: from whence the enemies returned to their owne campe, and there for certaine dayes abode in standing leaguer and stirred not. In that battell and in the chase together, there were slaine of Romans and allies 5000: and with the spoiles of their bodies, the enemies armed themselves: from thence they marched to the river Tagus. The Romane Pretours in the meane season employed all that time to levie and assemble new forces out of the confederate cities of Spaine, and in comforting and encouraging the hearts of their own souldiers after their fright, upon this adverse conflict and unluckie loyle. Now when they had gathered (as they thought) a sufficient power, and tookethemselves strong enough, and that the souldiers also desired to be doing with the enemy, for to rase out and cancel the former ignomie and disgrace, they encamped twelve miles from the river Tagus aforesaid: and about the third watch of the night advanced their standards, and marching in a foure square battell, by day-light they were come to the banke of the river (now were the enemies lodged upon a litle mount beyond the water:) and incontinently in two places (where the river shewed a fowrd) they waded through with their armes, Calpurnius on the right hand and Quintius on the left. All this while the enemies continued quiet and mooved not: but in the meane time, while as they wondred at their sodaine comming, and devised how to trouble and disorder the souldiers as they should make hast to passe the river, the Romans had transported over themselves, and their bagge and baggage also; yea and brought all together into one place. And because they perceived by this time the enemy to stirre and remooove, and had no time to fortifie their campe, they put themselves in battell array. In the mids, stood the fifth legion of Calpurnius, and the eighth of Quintius, which was the very flower and strength of the whole armie. Now they had a faire open plain all the way betwene them and the enemies camp, so as there was no cause to feare any ambush. The Spaniards so soon as they espyed two armies of their enemies upon that side of the banke which was next to them, all at once issued out of their campe, and ran to battell to the end, that they might surpris and empeach them, before they could joyne and raunge themselves together. The fight was sharpe and hore in the beginning: for the Spaniards of the one side were puffed up with the conceit and pride of their late victorie: and the Romanes of the other, were galled and incensed for anger of a dishonour received, which they were not used unto. The battaille in the mids (consisting of two most valiant and hardie legions) fought right courageously: which the enemies, seeing that they could not otherwise force to recule and give ground, began to charge upon them with a battailon in coin-fashon close together; and still they pressed hard upon them in the mids more & more in number, and ever thicker raunged. Calpurnius the Pretour seeing this battell distressed and in danger, sent with all speed L. Quintilius Varus and L. Iuventius Tula, two lieutenants, to either of the legions severally, to encourage and exhort them to stick to it like men, and to make remon-

A strange & relation, That in them alone consisted all the hope of conquering & keeping Spaine: if they never so little yeelded backe and lost their ground, there was not one of the whole armie that should ever see Italie againe, nor nor so much as the farther banke of Tagus. As for himselfe, he rooke with him the Cavallerie of two legions, and when he had wheeled a litle about and set a compasse with them, he charged hotly upon the flanke of the foresaid strong battailon of the enemies, which assailed and urged still the maine battaille. Quintius also with his Cavallerie flanked the enemies on the other side: but the horsemen of Calpurnius fought more fiercely by ods than the other, & the Pretor himselfe in person was foremost of them all; for he was the first that drew bloud of an enemy, & so far engaged himselfe within them, that hardly a man could know of which side he fought: by his singular valiance, the horsemen were mightily animated: and by the valour of the Cavallerie on horsebacke, the Infanterie also were enkindled to fight on foot. The principall Centurions were abashed and ashamed to see the Pretour in person among the pikes and swords of his enemies: and therefore every man for his part did his best, put forward the port-ensigns, willing them to advance their banners, to the end, that the soldiours might follow hard after. Then began they on all hands to set up a fresh and lustie shout; they tooke their biere and charged upon them as from the vantage of an higher ground: by reason whereof, they disarrayed them first, and like a forcible streame they bare them downe before them, so as they could not stand upon their feet and susteine this violence of theirs, but fell one upon another. As many as fled toward the campe, the horsemen pursued, and so entmingled themselves among the rout of the enemies, that they entred pell-mell with them into their hold; where, they that were left for the guard thereof, renewed the fight, so that the Roman horsemen were forced to light from their horses: and whiles they maintained the medley, the fit legion came to second them, and consequently more and more succours as they possibly could, ran to them: downe went the Spaniards, and were massacred in all parts of the campe; and not above 4000 of them all, fled away and saved themselves: of which number, about three thousand (who still kept their armour) seized upon a hill neere adjoyning: the other thousand, being for the most part armed by the halves, were scattered all over the fields. The enemies were at first above five and thirtie thousand, but after this battaille see how few of them were left: and from them were woon 133 ensignes. Of Romanes and allies, there died few above sixe hundred, of auxiliarie souldiers from out of the province, about 150. Five martiall Tribunes were lost, and certaine Romane gentlemen, whose death especially, made it seeme a bloudie victory. After which, the armie abode within the enemies campe, for that themselves had no time to fortifie their owne. The next morrow C. Calpurnius in an open audience, highly praised the horsemen, and rewarded them with rich harnish and trappings, declaring aloud, That by meanes of their good service principally, the enemies were discomfited and their campe forced. As for Quintius the other Pretour, he bestowed upon his men of armes, small chaines and buttons of gold. The Centurions likewise of both armies received gifts at their hands, and namely those who fought in the maine battaille.

The Consuls having finished the levie of souldiers, and accomplished all things requisite to be done in Rome, led the armie into their province of Liguria. Sempronius departed from Pisa, and made a journey against the Apuan Ligurians; where, by wasting their territories and burning their townes and fortresses, he made way into the Forrest and opened the passages as far as to the river Macra and the port of Luna. The enemies tooke a certaine mount (an ancient hold) where their ancestors sometimes had seated themselves: but from thence they were by force disceized, by reason that the Romanes overcame the difficulties of the avenues thereto. Ap. Claudius likewise for his part, was equall in valiance and good fortune to his colleague, as having fought certaine prosperous battailles with the Ligurian Inguames. He forced besides six townes of theirs, and tooke many thousands of prisoners within them. Of the chiefe authors of that rebellion, he caused three and fortie to loose their heads.

Now approached the time of the solempne assembly for election of Magistrates at Rome: and albeit Sempronius his lot it was to hold the said assembly, yet Claudius returned first to Rome, because P. Claudius his brother made suite to be Consull. He had for his competitor, L. Aemylius, Q. Fabius Labeo, and Servius Sulpitius Galba, all foure of the nobilitie. Old suiters they were all, and because they had suffered the repulse aforesaid, they renewed the suite for this dignitie, as being so much the rather due, because it had beene once denied them. And this was the cause that that these foure followed and pressed the harder for to obtaine the same, because it was not lawfull for any more than one of the Patritij at once to bee created Consull. There were also of Commoners certain persons well beloved and of good reputation that stood in election for the place, to wit, L. Porcius, Q. Terentius Culleo, and Cn. Babius Tamphilus: they also had taken repulse before time, and were put off still in hope one day yet to obtaine that honourable dignitie. Claudius of them all was onely the new Competitor. Now men thought verily without any doubt and question, yea, and destined in their conceits Q. Fabius Labeo, and L. Porcius Licinius to be Consuls. But Claudius the Consull together with his brother bestirred himselfe, and without his hui-fthers attending upon him, travelled and laboured hard in all parts of the common place: notwithstanding the adversaries, yea & the most of the Senators cried out upon him and said, That he ought to consider and remember rather that he was the Consull of the people of Rome, than brother to P. Claudius; why then sat he not still in the Tribunall either as president and judge of the court assembled, or els as a beholder and spectatour only, without saying any word himselfe? Howbeit, he could not possibly bee reclaimed from this disordinate affection of his which hee shewed in labouring for his brother. This election was divers times also troubled with the great debates and contentions caused by the Tribunes of the Commons: whiles some of them spake against the Consull; others againe maintained his suite, and tooke part with him. But in the end, Fabius tooke the foile, and Appius went away with the game, for his brother. So P. Claudius Pulcher was created Consull beyond his owne hope, and more than others looked for. L. Porcius Licinius held his owne, and obtained the second place in his course; for that the Commoners went moderately to worke, and shewed not so much affection and forcible meanes as Claudius did. After this, was holden the election of Pretours. And chosen there were, C. Decimius Flavius, P. Sempronius Longus, P. Cornelius Cethegus, Q. Nevius Matho, C. Sempronius Blaesus, and A. Terentius Varro. Thus much concerning the acts atcheevd both at home in the citie, and abroad in the warre, that yeere wherein App. Claudius and M. Sempronius were Consuls.

In the beginning of the next yeere, in which P. Claudius and L. Porcius bare the Consulship, when as Q. Caelius, M. Babius and T. Sempronius (who had ben sent to heare and decide the controversies betweene the two kings, Philip and Eumenes, and the States of Thessalie) had made report of their embassages; they permitted likewise the embassadours of the said princes and cities, to enter into the Senate. Who related the selfesame things againe, which had bene alleadged before in the presence of the foresaid Legates in Greece. After this, the LL. of the Senat addreised another new embassage into Macedonie and Greece, whereof App. Claudius was the cheefe, for to visite and see, whether the cities adjudged and assigned to the Rhodians, Thessalians, and Perrethians were delivered unto them accordingly. They also had in charge to cause the garrisons to quit Aenus and Maronea, and to looke that all the sea coast of Thracia, were freed from the subjection of Philip and the Macedonians. They were enjoined moreover to goe into Peloponnesus, from whence the former embassie was departed in more doubtful reumes than if they had never gone thither. For over and besides other things they were sent away without any answer for their dispatch: and albeit they requested the Achæans for to assemble their generall Diet, they mought not obtaine it. For which, when as Q. Caelius found himselfe discontented and greivously complained, & the Lacedæmonians withall made piteous mone, that the walls of their citie were demolished and rased, their common people lead away in captivitie into Achæa, and there sold, and the lawes of Lycorgus taken from them, under which their citie and Commonweale untill that day had been maintained and governed: the Achæans excused themselves most of all for the imputation of refusing to hold a Councell; and to that purpose they rehearsed a law and ordinance, whereby they were forbidden expressly to call and publish a Diet unlesse it were in the case of levying warre and contracting of peace, upon occasion that any embassadours came directly unto them from the Senate of Rome with letters, or commission in writing. But for that this manner of excuse should not serve their turne againe afterwards, the Senate gave them plainly to understand, that they ought to take care and order that the Roman embassadours might at all times have meanes of free access to their Councels, like as they also reciprocally should have a Senate held for their sakes, as often as they would themselves.

After these embassages were departed, Philip was advertised by his embassadours, that there was no remedie but he must abandon those cities, and withdraw his garrisons: and herewith being

ing mightily offended and angered against all, yet he discharged his choler onely upon the Maronites. Unto Onomastus, warden of the ports and sea-coasts, hee gave commaundement to kill the cheefe of the adverse part. And he by the meanes of Cassander, one of the kings supports and favorites, who a long time had dwelt in Maronea, procured certaine Thracians to bee let into the towne by night, and there he committed murder and massacre, as if it had bene a citie woen by force of armes. And when the Romane embassadours made complaint to him, namely, of such outrages committed so cruelly against the guiltlesse Maronites, and so proudly and insolently against the people of Rome; in that they should bee killed and cut in peeces as enemies, unto whom the Senate had ordained restitution of their freedome, hee made answer and said, that neither himselfe, nor any of those who belonged unto him, could doe withall: but it was long of themselves and their variance one with another; whiles some of the citizens drew to him, and others enclined to king Eumenes. Which ye may (qd. he) soone know to be a truth, if ye will but aske the Maronites themselves: for this account he made, that whiles they were all terrified with so late and fresh a massacre, there durst not one of them open his mouth against him. Appius replied againe and said, That they were not to make an enquire in this so evident and notorious a fact, as if it were in any respect doubtful: but if hee would discharge and cleare himselfe as innocent of the action, hee should send to Rome Onomastus and Cassander, who were named to have committed the outrage, that the Senate might examine them upon interrogatories. This word at the first so troubled and dashed the king, that his colour went & came in his face, & he knew not how to keep his countenance. But after he was come again to himselfe, he made answer, That (if they needs would) he cared not much to send Cassander, for that he had dwelt and continued in Maronea; but as for Onomastus, who neither was at Maronea, nor so much as in any quarter neer unto it, how possibly could he be charged or touched with the matter? Now as he spared Onomastus the rather of the twaine, and was loth to have him come in question, as being his more deere and honourable friend: so hee feared him much more than the other, least hee should bewray and disclose the thing; for that himselfe had conferred with him thereabout; and besides, he had served his turne divers times as a minister to execute, and been privie unto him as a complice to plot such like designements. Cassander also, as it is verily thought, was poisoned and made away, by certaine that were sent of purpose to accompanie him through Epirus to the sea side; and all because the villanie should not bee detected and come to light. Thus the Legates departed from the parley and conference with Philip, as shewing in their countenance, that they were nothing well pleased: and Philip on the other side went his wayes as resolute to levie warre againe: but forasmuch as his forces as yet were not sufficient to doe any exploit, and because he would delay the time betweene, he determined to send his younger sonne Demeirius to Rome, both to purge his father of those matters wherewith wee was charged, and also by humble request to appease the anger of the Senate; supposing, that this young gentleman, who had bene left as an hostage at Rome, and there had shewed a good testimonie of a princely nature and royall disposition, might much avale in the cause. In the meane while himselfe under colour of aiding the Bizantines, but in very truth to strike some terrour into the princes of Thrace, made an expedition against them: and when he had in one battaile discomfired them, and taken prisoner their cheefe captaine Amadorus, hee returned into Macedonie, having sent certaine messengers to sollicite the barbarous nations, inhabiting neere the river Ister, for to enter and invade Italie. In Peloponnesus also the comming of the Romane Legates was expected, who by this commission were enjoined to passe out of Macedonie into Achæa: against whom because the Achæans would not be to seeke what to say, Lycortas their Pretour summoned a publicke counsell aforehand. In which there was parley as touching the Lacedæmonians, namely, how that of enemies they were become enformers and accusers, and daunger it was, least when they were vanquished they would be more to be feared, than at the time that they waged war. For during the warres, the Achæans found the Romans to be their good associates, but now the same Romans are more friendly to the Lacedæmonians, than to the Achæans, seeing that Areus & Alcibiades (banished persons both out of Lacedæmon, and by the meanes of the Achæans restored againe to their place) had undertaken to goe in embassage to Rome, against the Achæan nation, which had so well deserved at their hands; and there gave so hard language against them, as if they had been chased and driven out of their countrey, and not restored thereunto by them. Hereupon arose a great outcrie from all parts of the assembly, for to put to question, what should bee determined expressly of them by name; and in this fit, where all went by choler, and nothing by counsell, condemned they were to die. Some few daies after came the Romane embassadours, for whose sake a Counsell was holden at Clitorea, a citie in Arcadia. But before any matter was treated on, the Achæans were surpris'd with exceeding feare, considering and thinking how this deciding of matters was not like to be managed and carried with any indifferencie for their behoofe; for as much as they saw Arcus and Alcibiades (condemned by them in the last counsell) to bee in the companie of the said embassadours, and no man durst open his lips and speake a word. Appius declared, That the Senate was much displeased at those matters whereof the Lacedæmonians had made complaint, namely, That first in a tumultuarie fray and conflict, they were murdered who had been called forth by Philopamen, and came to plead and speake in their owne cause: Then, after they had exercised their crueltie thus against their persons, to the end, that in no part their inhumanitie should be wanting, they had rased the walls of a right noble and famous cittie, abolished their most auncient lawes, and put downe the discipline & government of Lycurgus, so renowned throughout all nations. When Appius had made an end of his speech, then Lycortas, both in regard that hee was Pretour, and also because hee tooke part with the faction of Philopamen (who was the motive and author of all that had been done at Lacedæmon) made answer in this wise. More hard it is for us now Appius to speak before you, than of late it was in the presence of the Senate. For then we were to answer the Lacedæmonians, who accused us: but at this present we have you to be our accusers, before whom, as competent judges wee should plead in our owne defence. Howbeit wee have submitted our selves, and undergone this unequall and hard condition, presuming upon this hope, that you will lay aside that accusatorie heat which not long since you used, and put upon you the person of a judge to heare with indifferencie and equitie. For mine owne part, considering that you ere-while have but related those matters which the Lacedæmonians both here in place before Quintilius of late, and also at Rome afterwards complained of, I would thinke that I am to answer therefore not unto you, but unto them in your hearing. You charge us with the murdering of them, who being called out by the Pretor Philopamen to plead their cause, were killed. This crime I hold that it ought not to be objected against us by you Romanes, no nor so much by any other in your audience. And why so? because it was expressly specified in your own treatie and accord of covenants, that the Lacedæmonians should have nothing to doe with the maritime cities. At what time as the Lacedæmonians took arms, & seased by force in the night of those cities, which they were precisely forbidden to meddle withall; if Quintius, if the Romane armie had been in Peloponnesus, as aforetime, no doubt we must needs thinke, that being thus surpris'd and evill entreated, they would have had recourse thither for succour. But since ye were so farre off, whether els should they flie and retire themselves, but to us your allies? whom they had seene before to helpe and succour Gyttheum, whom upon the like cause they knew to have assailed Lacedæmon together with you? It was in your quarrell therefore that wee enterprised a just and lawfull warre. Which being an act of ours, by others commended, and which ought not by the very Lacedæmonians to be condemned, and considering that even the gods themselves have approved thereof, in that they gave us victorie, how commeth it then to passe, that you bring those matters into question which are by right of law warranted? And yet a great part thereof in no respect toucheth and concerneth you. That wee caused them to come forth to answer their cause, who had raised a commotion of the multitude, who had forced the maritime cities, who had ransacked them, who also had massacred the principall citizens, we are to answer therefore, and to us that properly appertaineth. But that they were murdered in the way as they came into our campe, was nothing to us, but your deed Arcus and Alcibiades, who now (forsooth) are become our accusers. The banished Lacedæmonians (of which number those two also are, & who at that time were with us, for that they chose the coast townes to retire into for their habitations) supposing that their owne death was sought, and that there would have beene outrage committed upon them, they ran upon those, by whose means they were driven out of their countrey; even upon an indignation, that they might not so much as passe their old age in banishment with safetie. They were the Lacedæmonians then, and not the Achæans that slew the Lacedæmonians: whether justly or unjustly, that is not the question, neither skilleth it. But what say ye to this, Achæans, how can ye denie but that ye are culpable, in that ye have abolished the lawes and the most auncient discipline of Lycurgus? and withall rased the walls of Lacedæmon?

And how is it possible that both these points should be objected unto us by the same men? considering that those walls were never built by Lycurgus, but contrariwise (and not many yeeres past) for to overthrow and annull the discipline instituted by Lycurgus? For the tyrants of late daies built them to serve as a fortresse and bulwarke for themselves, and not for a defence unto the citie. And if Lycurgus at this day should rise againe from death to life, hee would take joy in their ruines, and say that hee acknowledged now his owne native countrey and auncient Sparta indeed. You Lacedæmonians should not have expected Philopamen nor the Achæans, but your selves ought with your owne hands to have pulled downe and destroyed, all the tokens and memorials of tyrannie. Those walls were the very markes, and as a man would say, the unseemly and deformed skarres of your thraldome and servitude. And you who without walls for the space almost of eight hundred yeeres had lived in freedome, yea, and for a certaine time also had ben maisters of Greece, became slaves during a hundred yeeres, enclosed and restrained within walls as if yee had beene fettered by the feet. Now as touching the lawes, which yee pretend to have been taken away by us, I suppose verily that the tyrants they were, who deprived the Lacedæmonians of their auncient lawes: and that we have not taken from them theirs (for none they had of their own) but rather have given them ours: neither have we done otherwise than well by them, but regarded much the good of their citie and Commonwealth, in that we have united them in our solemne court of parliament, and incorporated them unto us; to the end, that in all Peloponnesus, there should be but one bodie, one State, and one Counsell. Then (I wote well) they might have justly complained to have beene wronged, then they might have greeved and said they had not been well used, in case we our selves had lived under one kind of lawes, and put them to be ruled by others. I know full well, Appius, that all my speech hitherto is neither becoming alies to use unto their allies, nor decent and meet for a nation that is free, but rather (to speake more truly) fit for slaves debating before their maisters. For if that sound of the trumpet, if that voice of the publicke crier were not in vaine, whereby ye ordained and declared, That we Achæans before all others should be free; if the confederation stand firme and stable; if our alliance and amitie bee entertained and observed equally and indifferently; why demaund not I of you Romans what you did after the winning of Capua? Seeing you will have us Achæans, to make account unto you, what we did to the Lacedæmonians whom we conquered by warre? Set case that we caused some of them to be killed. What of that? Commaunded not you (I pray) that the Senatours of Capua should leese their heads? Wee have demolished the walls indeed, but yee have not only ruined their walls, but wholly turned them out of citie and territorie. But (you will say) the confederation in behalfe of the Achæans is equall and indifferent in outward apparence, and in truth and effect their libertie dependeth upon the good will and pleasure of the Romans, who indeed have the preeminence of the seignorie and dominion besides. I know it Appius, as well as ye can tell me, yea, & (although it behoveth me not so to be) I am not overmuch offended and discontented therewith. But this I beseech you, let there be as great ods and difference as ye will betweene us Achæans and you Romanes: provide this only, that your enemies and ours be not with you in as good regard & account, nay that they be not in a better degree & condition, than we your allies and associats. For, that they should be equall to us, we have been the cause; in that we granted them our own laws, in that we admitted them to be incorporat in the generall Diet of the Achæan State and communitie. But will yee have the truth? the conquered have not sufficient to content and satisfie the conquerours: enemies demaund more, than allies have and enjoy; and those things which are confirmed by oath, ratified and consecrated by monuments and instruments of writings, cut and engraven in stone, for a perpetual memorie to all posteritie, they would force and wrest from us even with our perjurie. True it is, O Romanes, we honour and reverence you; yea, and if you will needs have it so, wee dread and feare you also: but yet so, as we both honour and also feare the immortal gods more than you. Audience hee, had with the accord and consents of the greater part: and all men judged, that hee had spoken like a magistrate indeed, and for the dignitie and majestic of his place: in such sort, as it was easily seene, that they were never able to hold their dignitie and mainteine their authoritie with the Romanes, in case they went coldly to worke and proceeded in mild tearmes with them. Then Appius answered and said, That he would gladly advise and persuade them, all that he possibly could, to be reconciled unto the Lacedæmonians, whiles they might doe it with full contentment; for fear least soone after they should be constrained and forced to seek unto them against their their wills and maugre their hearts. At this word they all sighed and groned againe; but afraid G they were and durst not refuse to doe that which they were commaunded. This petition onely they made unto the Romanes, that as touching the Lacedæmonians they would change and alter what they thought good; and not force the Achæans to sinne against their conscience, in disanulling those things which they had established and ratified with a solemne oth. So the sentence of condemnation onely (lately passed against Arcus and Alciades) was reversed.

In the beginning of this yeere (when at Rome they had sitten in consultation about the provinces of Consuls and Pretours) Liguria was assigned unto the Consuls for their charge and government, because there was no warre in any other place. Then the Pretours cast lots for theirs, To C. Decimius Flavius fell the jurisdiction of the citie: and to P. Cornelius Cethegus that other betwene citizens and forreiners: C. Sempronius had the government of Sicilie, and Q. Nevius H Mattho of Sardinia; with commission also to sit upon the inquisition in case of poysoning. A. Terentius Varro was deputed L. governor of high Spain, and P. Sempronius Longus of the low. Out of those 2 provinces it fell out so, that there came much about the same time two lieutenants, L. Iuventius Talsa and T. Quintilius Varus; who having related before the Senat how great a war was now dispatched and finished in Spaine, required withall, that there should be rendered praise and thanks to the immortall gods for the happie successe in the wars, & likewise that the Pretors might be permitted to bring away their armies. So there was a solemne procession ordained to be holden two dayes: but as touching the reducing of the armies, they gave order to refer it wholly to be debated, at what time as there should be question about the armies of Consuls and Pretours together. Some few dayes after, it was ordained, that the Consuls should have with them into Liguria, two legions apeece, which Ap. Claudius and M. Sempronius had the conduct of. As touching the Spanish forces, great contention there was betwene the new Pretours and the friends of Calpurnius and Quintius in their absence. Both sides had Tribunes and both had Consuls to take part with them. The Tribunes threatned to crosse the act of the Senat, if they ordained that the armies should be brought home. The Consuls againe protested, that if the Tribunes thus opposed their negative, they would not suffer any other decree and ordinance to passe. In conclusion, the respect of those that were absent, was of lesse importance: and an act of the Senate was entered, That the Pretours should enroll 4000 footmen of Romanes, and foure hundred horsemen: likewise five thousand foot and as many horse of Latine allies, to conduct K with them into Spaine. And when they had thus enrolled these foure full legions, lookewhat surplusage there remained over and above five thousand foot and three hundred horse in a legion, they should give them their congie and dismisse them of souldierie; first as many as had served out their full time, and then those who had borne themselves most valiantly in the warre under Calpurnius and Quintius.

After this debate and variance was appeased, there arose another in the necke of it, occasioned by the death of P. Decimius the Pretour. Cn. Licinius and L. Puppius (who had been Ædiles the last yeere before) likewise C. Valerius the Flamine of Jupiter, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus, laboured to be in his roume late deceased. As for the last of these rehearsed (because hee was Ædile Curule) he shewed not himselfe in his white robe; but he made more meanes and laboured above all the rest, having to his adversarie and concurrent the Flamine above said. At the first he seemed equall only unto him in the suite, but afterwards when he began to have the better of him, certaine Tribunes of the Commons stood upon this point, and alledged, That his name was not to be accepted as eligible; for that one and the selfesame person might neither take nor exercise at one time, the function of two magistracies; and namely, both Curule or of State. Others againe said, that it was meet and reason that hee were dispensed with and exempt from the lawes in that behalfe, to the end, that the people might be at libertie to elect whome they would for Pretour. L. Porcius the Consull was first of this resolution, not to admit his name: and afterwards, because he would seeme to do by warrant and authoritie of the Senat, he assembled the LL. together, and said, that he propounded and put to question before them, That for as much as an Ædile elect, sued to be Pretour without all right, or any precedent tollerable in a free state; for his owne part he was minded (unless they were of a contrarie opinion) to hold the generall assembly for the election, according to law. Then the LL. gave their advise, that L. Porcius the Consull, should commune and treat with Q. Fulvius, that hee would be no hindrance, but that the assembly for the substitution of a Pretour in the roume of C. Decimius departed,

A red, might be holden by order of law. As the Consull was thus in hand with him according to the act of the Senat, Flaccus made answer, That he would do nothing unfitting his own person. By this doubtfull and indifferent answer of his, he put those in good hope (who expounded and construed as they would have it) that he would accommodate and apply himselfe to the authoritie of the LL. of the Senat: but at the time of the election he sued more earnestly than before; complaining of the Consull and Senat, That they wrung and wrested out of his hands the benefit of the people of Rome intended unto him; and to bring him into ill will and obloquie of the people, they made much ado about two offices & a double dignitie: as if all the world saw not, that after he were declared & pronounced Pretour, he would incontinently resigne up the Ædileship. The Consull perceiving both him fully resolute and set upon a pitch in the suite, & also the favor & affection of the people inclined more and more toward him, brake up the assembly aforesaid, and called a Senat: where, in a frequent session of Senators it was ordained, That for as much as Flaccus was little or nothing mooved with the authoritie of the LL. of that honourable court, he was to be dealt withall in a generall assembly before the bodie of the people. When the people were met together at the summons of the Consull, hee proposed the matter unto him before them. Flaccus relented never a jote, but persisted still in his opinion, and gave the people of Rome thanks for their favour, in that they shewed themselves willing to elect him Pretour, so often as they had time and place wherein they might testifie and declare their love to him: which affectionate kindnesse of his fellow citizens, he never meant to reject and abandon. This constant and resolute speech of his, kindled and enflamed so great love and affection C in them toward him, that past all peradventure he had been chosen Pretour out of hand, in case the Consull would have received his name. Much strife and debate there was amongst the Tribunes, one against another; yea and between them and the Consull, untill at length the Consull held a Senat, and there a decree passed in this wise, That forasmuch as the wilfull stubbornnesse of Q. Flaccus of one side, and the inordinate affection of men on another side, was such, as the solemne assembly for subelecting of a Pretour in the place of the deceased, could not be holden according to the lawes, the Senat agreed and resolved, that there were already Pretours enough, and that P. Cornelius should administer and execute both jurisdictions in the citie, and exhibite the playes and games in the honour of Apollo.

After this troublesome debate about the election, was by the sage wisdom and valorous D courage of the Senat suppressed, there arose another far greater, by how much the thing was of weightier importance, and the persons agents therein more in number, and for qualitie and place mightier. There stood in election to be Censors (and that with earnest endeavour and exceeding heat of contention) L. Valerius Flaccus, P. and L. both Scipions; Cn. Manlius Velsio, and L. Furius Purpureo, all Patritij. And of commoners, M. Porcius Cato, M. Fulvius Nobilior, T. and Marcus both Sempronij, the one surnamed Longus, the other Tuditans. But M. Porcius overwent them all by many degrees, as well those of the Patricians as also of the commons, notwithstanding they were come of most noble families. This man caried with him so vigorous a spirit and pregnant wit, that howsoever he were borne and descended, it seemed he was able to make way of himselfe to advancement and honour. He wanted no Art and skill meet and requisite for the managing either of private busines of his owne, or publicke affaires of state: cunning E he was in country husbandrie, as well as in civill policie. Some are advanced to the highest dignities and most honourable places, by their deepe knowledge in the law: others attaine to promotion by eloquence: and there be againe, who have risen and become great through martiall prowesse and feats of armes. But this man was by nature so trainable and pliant to all alike, that whatsoever he added and gave himselfe unto, a man would have said, he had bene borne and framed even from his mothers wombe to it and to nothing else. In war, a most hardie and valiant souldiour: and in many foughten fields highly renowned. Being mounted once to high places of honorable calling, a right excellent commander he proved, & Generall of an armie. In peace again, for sound counsell in the civill law, passing well learned: for pleading at the bar and making orations, most eloquent. Neither carried he himselfe so, that his tongue flourished only F whiles hee lived, as leaving no monument behind him of his singular eloquence; but it liveth, nay it flourisheth still, immortalized as it were & recommended to posteritie in all kind of writing. Orations of his there be extant many, which he penned & pronounced as well in his own cause as for the defence of his friends, yea & invectives also against others: for able he was to put down and

and wearie his adversaries, not onely by declaiming and accusing them, but also by pleading G his own cause. Faction quarels and enmities there were exceeding many, that tormented him; and he plagued others with as many: and hard it is to say or set downe, whether hee were urged and pressed upon by the nobilitie, or himselfe coursed and baited them more. Doublelesse, by nature he was austere and rigorous, his speech was sharpe, biting, and beyond measure plaine and free: but he carried a mind with him that stouped to no desires and luits whatsoever: his life so severe and precise, as it was untouched and without all spot of blame: despising all fawning favours, and contemning earthly riches. In thrift and frugalitie, in sobrietie, in patience, in suffrance of travaile and daunger, his bodie was steele to the verie backe. And as for his mind and courage, it was such, as verie age and time (which abateth and consumeth all things els) was not able to breake and daunt: when hee was fourescore yeeres old and sixe, hee pleaded at the barre H for others: he made orations for his owne defence, and wrote bookes: and in the nintieth yeere of his age, he converted Sergius Galba before the people, to receive his judgement by them. As all his life time before, the nobilitie was set against him, so when hee stood now to be Censor, they pressed hard upon him: insomuch as all his competitor (excepting L. Flaccus, who had been his colleague in the Consulship) conspired together, how they might give him the repulse and put him besides the quishion: not only for that their owne teeth watered, and they were desirous themselves rather of that honour; nor because they repined to see a new risen gentleman, & one of the first head to be a Censor: but also because they looked for no other but that his Censorship would be rigorous and prejudiciall to the name and reputation of divers I men; considering how he had been crossed and hurt by very many, and was desirous himselfe to wait them a shreud turne, and be meet with them againe. For even then, whiles he laboured and sued for the place, hee used minatorie speeches, and gave out, that they onely were opposed against him, who feared they should have a Censorship sharpe exercised without partiality and respect of persons. And herewith hee maintained and upheld the suite of L. Valerius with him, saying, that if hee had but him of all others to be his colleague, hee should be able to repress the wicked enormities newly come up and rise in the citie, and to bring in request againe the ancient manners and fashions of the old world. Men were much mooved in these respects and considerations; and so maugre the heads of the nobilitie, they not onely created him Censor, but also adjoynd unto him L. Valerius for his companion in that government.

After the election of Censors was ended, the Consuls and Pretours tooke their journeyes into K their severall provinces, all save Q. Nevius; who before that hee could goe into Sardinia, was staied behind no lesse than foure moneths, about certain inquisitions of paysoning: whereof, hee fate upon many without the citie of Rome, in corporate burroughes, market townes and places of great resort, for that he thought that manner of proceeding more convenient. And if wee list to beleeve Val. Antias, hee condemned two thousand persons.

Semblably, L. Posthumus the Pretour, (unto whome the government of Tarentum by lot sell) did good justice upon great conspiracies made by certain grasiers; and with great care and diligence followed the enquest of the Bacchanals, and dispatched the reliques thereof quite and cleane. Many of them who were adjourned and made not appearance, but gave the slip and left in the lurch their sureties bound bodie and goods for them, and lurked in that quarter of Italy; hee either judged and condemned as guiltie and convicted, or caused them to be apprehended and sent to Rome unto the Senate; who were all cast in prison by P. Cornelius.

In the farther part of Spaine all was quiet, by reason that the Lusitanes were in the last warre subdued: but in the higher part, A. Terentius forced Corbio a towne of the Suefferanes, which he assaulted with mantlets and other fabricks of warre, and sold all the prisoners: which done, hee passed the winter peaceably in that higher part of Spaine also.

The old Pretours, C. Calpurnius Piso and L. Quintius returned to Rome; and both of them were with great accord and consent of the LL. of the Senat allowed to triumph. And first C. Calpurnius triumphed over the Portugals and Celtiberians. In which triumph, hee carried in shew 83 coronets of gold, and 12000 pound of silver. Within few dayes after, L. Quintius triumphed M over the same Portugals and Celtiberians. In which solemnitie, there was represented in shew, as much gold and silver as in the former.

The Censors, M. Porcius and L. Valerius, whiles men hung in suspence betweene feare and hope what they would doe, held a review and a new choise of the Senate. Seven Senatours they displaced

A displaced and deposed from that dignitie: amongst whome, there was one of marke, for his nobilitie of birth and honorable offices which he had borne, namely L. Quintius Flavianus who had been Consull. An auncient order (they say) it was in time of our forefathers, That when the Censors had put any out of the Senate, they should note them directly for those faults which they had committed: and at this day, extant there be divers sharpe orations of Cato, against them whome either hee casted and displaced out of Senate, or from whome hee tooke away horses of service: but of all others, the fourest and bitterest is that of his, against this L. Quintius; which if he had pronounced as an accuser before he had noted him with that disgrace, and not as Censor after the said note, his very owne brother T. Quintius (if he had been then Censor) could not possibly have kept L. Quintius in the state of a Senator. Among other grievous matters, hee articulated against him, That hee had trained with him from Rome into his province of B Fraunce (in hope of many great rewards) one  Philip Pænus*, a notorious and costly Ganymede. This boy, as he was fooling & playing the wanton with the said Quintius then Consul, used to upbraid him with this, That he was had away from Rome, against the very time that the shew of sword-players at utterance was to bee exhibited: and this hee said, to shew how readie hee was to satisfie the pleasure of him his lover. Now it chaunced as they were making good cheere together, and having taken their wine liberally were well heat therewith, newes came and reported it was in the banquet time, That a certain noble man of the Boians was arrived, with his children, as a renegade from the adverse part; and was desirous to speake with the Consull, for to have assurance from his mouth of safe-conduct: who being brought into the pavilion, began to par- C lie with the Consull by a truchman or interpreter. And in the mids of his speech; How saist thou (quoth Quintius to that wanton deintie, his Caramite) because thou hast missed & lost the sight of those sword-players at Rome, wilt thou see presently here this Frenchman die in the place before thee? He made not any great semblance unto him in good earnest of his desire that way: but the Consull at the first beck of that beastly filth & baggage, caught the naked sword which hung over his head, and first gave the poore Gaule a wound in his sconce as he was speaking unto him, & afterwards as he made shift to flie from him and called upon the protection of the people of Rome and the assistance of those that were present, Quintius ran him quite through the sides, Valerius Antias, who never had read the oration of Cato, but gave credit to a flying fable only, without any head or author, telleth the tale with some other circumstance, howbeit much like D in substance of matter, as touching his lecherous lust & bloudie crueltie. He writeth, that Quintius whiles he abode at Plaisance, sent for a famous courtisan (upon whom he was enamored) to a banquet; and as he courted and made love to this strumpet, vaunting himselfe unto her, among other discourses he recounted with what rigor hee had followed certain inquisitions; what a number of prisoners hee had in yrons condemned to death; and how many of their heads hee minded to chop off. Then this harlotry sitting next beneath him, said, That shee had never in al her life seen any man to cut ones head off; & it was a sight that of al other she would fainest see. Whereupon, this kind amorous knight, to gratifie the quean, caused one of those poor soules condemned to die, to be fet out of prison into the banketting rounge, and presently to be beheaded before her face. A cruell fact it was and inhumane, whether it were committed as Cato hath objected in his E Oration, or as Valerius hath written in his storie, that any human creature should be thus massacred like a sacrifice, and the table besprent with his bloud, amid the cups standing full of wine and the dishes furnished with viands, where and when the manner and custome was to tast and take the first sey in the honour of the gods, and that devoutly with grace and good praier; and also content and feed the eie of a wanton and shamelesse callot, lying in the bolome of the Consull. In the end of Cato his Oration, this condition was offered unto Quintius, That if hee would plead unguiltie, and denie this fact and others which he charged him with, then hee should put in a reall caution, and stand to his defence and triall: but if he confessed himselfe guiltie, then hee would him to consider whether he thought any man would greeve and be forrie at the ignominie which he was to receive, who being transported & caried beside his understanding with wine and F women, made but a sport & pastime to shew mens bloud at a very banquet. In taking a review of the Cavallerie or gentlemen of Rome, Scipio Asiaticus had his great horse of service taken from him. This Censureship was likewise executed with severitie and rigor to all sorts and degrees, and namely in the prising and valuation of their goods. For Cato commanded the sergeants to take a note of all the ornaments, jewels, & apparrell of women, also of their chariots and coaches

if they amounted to the sum of 15000 asses, & to enroll the same in the Censors booke. Item, all G bondslaves under twentie years of age, sold after the last tax or assessment for ten thousand asses or upward, that they should bee valued at an higher price by ten fold than they were esteemed worth: and that for all these things they should pay and contribute to the citie chamber after three in the thousand. These Censors cut off all water either running out of any common stream into a priuat house, or derived into particular fields and grounds. And all howes either built by privat persons upon common ground, or any waies encroching and leaning to publike places they caused to be demolished and pulled downe within thirtie dayes. After this they set out diuers peeces of worke to be wrought at a price, of that money which was ordeyned to that purpose, namely to pave certaine pooles with stone, to skoure and clesse the draughts and sinks where need was: and in the mount Aventine and other parts where none were alreedy to make new. And particularly of themselves Flaccus caused the causey or wharfe to bee made against the waters called Neptunia, that the people might passe too and fro that way: and also a street way through Formianum. And Cato for his part built two galleries, Moenium & Titium, in the Mineries; and bought foure shops for the citie: he built there also the stately hall or pallace called Porcia. As for the citie revenues, they did set and let them forth to farmers, at an exceeding racked rent: but al the city works they put out to undertakers by the great, at as low a reckoning as they could. These leases and bargains afore said being once cancelled by order from the Senate, and new made at the importunat suit and that with outcries and teares of the Publicanes, as well farmers as vndertakers: then the Censors by proclamation commaunded those to avoid farre from the subhastation, who had disanulled the former leases and bargains, and with some little abatement and easing of the former rents, they demised the same profits and revenues again to others. This was a censure ship of great note, full of repine, ill will, and heartburning, which troubled and molested M. Porcius as long as he had a day to live, for that he was reputed and held to bee the author of that severitie and rigor exercised therein.

The same yeare two Colonies were erected and inhabitants sent from Rome, to wit Pollentia into the Picene territorie, and Pisaurum into the Gauls countrie. Six acres of land were assigned to every one of the coloners. And the same Triumvirs, namely Q. Fabius Labio, M. Fulvius Flaccus, and Q. Fulvius Nobilior, were they that both parted the sayd lands, and also had the leading and planting of the foresaid Colonies.

The Consuls that yeare atchieved no memorable exploit at all, neither at home in citie nor abroad in warre. Against the yeare following they created Consuls M. Claudius Marcellus and Q. Fabius, who upon the fifteenth of March, on which day they entred into their government, put to question as concerning the provinces, as well their own as the Pretours. For there had ben chosen Pretours C. Valerius the Flamin of Jupiter (who also the yeare before was in election for the place) Sp. Posthumius Albinus, and P. Cornelius Sisenna, also L. Puppilus, L. Julius, and Cn. Sicinius. Vnto the Consuls was assigned the province Liguria, together with the charge of the same armies which P. Claudius and M. Porcius had conducted. As for both the provinces in Spaine as well beyond as on this side Iberus, they were reserved with their ordinarie forces, for the Pretours of the former yeare by speciall commission without casting any lots at all therefore. The new Pretours were enjoyned for to dispose and part their governments, that C. Valerius the Flamin of Jupiter might exercise one of the jurisdictions of Rome. So he was L. chief justice for the forreiners, and Sisenna Cornelius over the citizens. Vnto Sp. Posthumius fell Sicilie, to L. Puppilus Apulia, to L. Julius Gallia, and to Cn. Sicinius Sardinia. As for L. Julius hee was enjoined to make halt and set forward on his journey: for the Transalpine Gauls (beyond the mountains) had passed over by the streights of the forrests and waies unknowne beforetime, into Italie, as hath bene before said, and were building them a towne in that territorie, which at this day is called Aquilensis. This Pretour had in charge to impeach them in that enterpryse, so far forth as hee might possibly without warre and force of arms: and if there were no other remedie but that they must of necessitie use violence, then to certifie the Consuls thereof: for agreed it was that one of them should lead the Legions against the Gauls. In the end of the former yeare there was a generall M assemble holden for the chusing of an Augur: wherein Sp. Posthumius Albinus was created in the troume of Cn. Cornelius Lentulus late deceased. But in the beginning of this present yeare P. Licinius Crassus the arch-Pontifice departed out of this world, in whose place M. Sempronius Tuditanus was invested for the bishop. But C. Sernilius Geminus was created the archpriest afore-

A afore said. In the honor of P. Licinius at his funerals, there was given a dole of ffeith; and a shew exhibited of 120 sword-fencers fighting at sharp: likewise there were represented funerall plaies and games, which continued three dayes: and after that solemnitie, a least was holden; during which, when the tables were set and spread accordingly all over the grand-place of the citie, so dainly there arose a tempest with great stormes, which forced most men to erect tents & boothis there: but after a while when the weather was faire againe, they were taken down and had away: and men commonly gave out and said, That whereas the prophets and wisards had foretold among other their fatall prefiges, that they should be forced to quarter and pitch tents in the market place of Rome; now that prophetic was fulfilled, and they were freed and excused from farther danger. And no sooner were they eased and delivered of that scruple, but they were troubled with another; for that it had rained blood two daies in the court-yard of Vulcanus: and the Decemvirs published a solemne supplication for the expiation of that prodigious signe.

Before that the Consuls departed into their provinces, they brought into the Senate for to have audience, the embassages come from beyond sea. And never before that day were so many men of those forreign parts scene at Rome. For from the time that the bruit was blown abroad amongst the nations bordering upon Macedonie, that the Romanes gave no deafe care to the complaints and accusations commended against Philip, and that many had sped well by complaining; every citie and State in their owne behalfe, yea and many privat persons in particular (for an ill neighbour he was to them all) repaired to Rome, in hope either to be righted and eased of their wrongs, or to discharge their itomacks and be moned and comforted for their miseries. Likewise from king Eumenes there arrived an embassage accompanied with his owne brother Athenus to make complaint, as finding themselves grieved that the garrisons were not withdrawn out of Thracia: as also to enforce that Philip had sent certain aids into Bithynia to Prusias who made war upon Eumenes. Now Demetrius (Philip his sonne) at that time a very yong gentleman, was to answer to all these challenges: and an easie peece of worke it was not, either to beare in mind all the matters objected, or to thinke upon the points of every answer accordingly. For over and besides, that the articles were many in number, most of them were of very small consequence and importance; namely, strife about limits and land-marks, about carying away men and ravishing women; of driving of cattell, of ministring justice partially & with affection, or els of none ministred at all: of sentences given & judgements passed in causes either by force D or for favour. The Senat perceiving that neither Demetrius could speak to these points and give them good evidence, nor themselves be wel informed and cleerly instructed by him; being moved also and grieved to see the youth so raw a scholler in these affairs, & therewith much troubled in spirit, gave order to enquire and demand of him, Whether he had received any notes in writing from his father, as touching the premisses? And when hee answered and said, Yea, they thought the first and principall thing for them to do was, to see and heare what were the answers of the king to every specialie and particular. And therupon they presently called for that booke of his fathers, and then permitted him to read the contents thereof. Now therein were set downe certain brieve abstracts of pleas and defenses, to ech severall point; shewing, Imprimis, that some things he had done according to the decrees and awards of the Roman Delegates and commiss- E sioners. Item, Whereas hee had left somewhat undone, the default was not in him, but in the very parties that accused him. Hee had interlaced between, certeine grievances and complaints, as touching the iniquitie and hard penning of those decrees; and how matters were not scanned and debated before Caelius with that iudifferencie and equitie as was meet and requisite; and namely, that without desert of his part, all men were set against him & insulted over him. The Senat collected hereby good arguments, how the hart of Philip was wounded & galled against the Romans. But when the yong prince excused some of these matters, & for the rest promised and undertooke, that all should be done to the uttermost as it pleased the Senat to order & set down; then it was thought good to deliver this answer unto him, That his father had in nothing done better, nor more to the contentment of the Senat, than that he seemed willing (howsoever mat- F ters were passed already) to make satisfaction to the Romans by the means of his son Demetrius. As for the Senate, they could dissimule, forget, put up, and endure many things, done and past; yea and were perswaded verily in their hearts, that they might beleve and trust Demetrius; as knowing assuredly, that although they sent his body again to his father Philip, yet they had his heart and affection with them still, as a sure pledge and hostage: and that hee was a friend to the people of Rome, so farre forth as his reverent dutie to his father would permit and give him leave: letting him withall to understand, that for to doe him honour, they would send embassadours into Macedonie; to the end, that if ought had not bene so fully effectuall as it should have bene, it might be done yet in good time, without imputation of fault and blame, or poenall satisfaction to be made for any thing hitherto omitted: yea and desirous they were, that Philip should understand, that by the mediation of Demetrius and for his sake, he stood yet in good tearmes of peace and friendship with the people of Rome. These things intended and done for the increase of credit and reputation, presently turned to the displeasure of the young gentleman, and in the end to his utter ruine and overthrow.

Then were the Lacedæmonians admitted to audience in the Senate. They mooved many pettie matters and trifling controversies; but those that principally touched the mainepoint were these; to wit, Whether they should be restored againe whome the Achæans had condemned, or no? Item, Whether they were justly or unjustly killed, whome they murdered? Moreover, they put to question, Whether the Lacedæmonians were to be comprised within the generall assembly and counsell of Achæa; or, that this State (as before-time) should have their rights and franchises apart by themselves from all others in Peloponnesus? The Senate ordained and awarded; Imprimis, That they should be restored. Item, That the sentences pronounced against them, should be reversed. Item, That Lacedæmon should doe service to that high court and publicke Diet of Achæa: and finally, that this accord and award should be engrosed, subscribed, and signed as well by the Lacedæmonians as Achæans.

Q. Martius was sent embassadour into Macedonie: who also had direction and order given him by the same commission, to visite the state of the allies in Peloponnesus: for there also remained some troubles after the old quarrels and variance; yea and the Messenians refused to appeare at the generall councill of Achæa. Now if I would set in hand to record the causes and circumstances of that warre, I should forget my purpose in the beginning of my worke, wherein I resolved not to touch at all any discourse of forein histories, no farther than they wer linked to the Romane affaires. Howbeit one memorable occurrence there hapned, which I cannot passe by, namely, that albeit the Achæans had the better hand in warre, yet it chaunced that Philopamen their Pretour was taken prisoner by the Messenians, as he made an expedition to seize upon Corone by prevention, which the enemies were desirous to be masters of. Surprised hee was in a valley of great disadvantage, and some few horsmen with him. It is reported, that by the help of the Thracians and Candiots, he might have fled and escaped: but for very shame to abandon those men of armes, which were the noblest gentlemen of that nation, and whome hee lately had made choise of, he had not the power to doe otherwise, but stay to see the last. For whiles he came himselfe behind in the rereward, because he was desirous to make meanes for their evasion through the streights of that passe, and to that purpose valiantly received the charge of the enemies, his horse fell and cast him at once; so as with his owne fall and his horse lying upon him, he had like to have gone away in a swoone: a man now threescore yeeres old and ten; and withall, newly crept abroad and recovered of a long and lingering disease, which had mightily wasted and consumed the strength of his bodie. Well, thus lay he along, and the enemies ran over him; and so soone as they knew who he was, they reared him upon his feet from under his horse, no lesse respective than if he had been their owne Generall, in regard of a reverence they bare unto the man, and in remembrance of his noble exploits: they brought him again to himselfe, and forth of that by-valley standing out of the passe, they carried him into the high way: and were so farre possessed and overcome with joy so unexpected, that they could not well beleieve their owne eyes that they had gotten him. Some dispatched vauntcourriers to Messene with the newes hereof; namely, that the warre was brought to an end; considering that Philopamen was taken & a comming as prisoner. At first the tidings seemed so incredible, that the foremost messenger was held not only for a vaine liar, but also for one not well in his wits: but after that there came one after another, and all with one voice verified and affirmed the same, at length it was beleived. And then, see what they did! before they knew for certaine that he approached neere unto the citie, they all ran forth of the gates by heaps to see the man: all (I say) bond as well as free, women and children one with another. In so much, as the gates were choked up with the thrust and throng of the preafe: for no man could beleieve assuredly it was true, the thing was so straunge, unless he might see him with his owne eyes. They that had the charge of bringing him,

A him, found much adoe to put by the multitude whome they encountered, and to enter in at the gate: and so thicke they stood in the preafe, that they tooke up all the wayes besides, so as hee could not be brought forth to be seene. Now because the most part of the people might not possibly have a sight of him, they gat up all at once into the Theatre, which stood neere unto the way, and pestered it full; and with one voice they cryed aloud, That he might be brought thither and presented unto the view of the whole people. The magistrates and principall citizens, fearing least the compassion that mought arise in mens hearts upon the beholding of so worthy a personage, would raise some trouble and commotion; whiles some comparing the reverence of his former authoritie and majestie, with this present condition and calamitie: & others calling to remembrance his manifold deserts and passing good turnes, mought haply be touched with pitié; set him a far off in the open sight of them all, and then at once tooke him hastily out of their view: for their Pretor Dinocrates gave out openly and said, That the magistrates were to enquire and demanda certaine points of him as touching the maine summe of the totall warre. Then hee was brought into their councill-chamber, where their Senate assembled and began to consult about him. It was now well toward evening; and so far off they were from resolving in other matters, that they could not bethinke themselves and agree, in what place they might keepe him that one night in safeguard. Astonied they were and amased, to consider and thinke upon the greatnes of his estate past, and of his noble vertue and valour: and no man durst receive the charge and custodie of him in his owne house, nor trust any one besides with his keeping. At length some there were, that put them in mind of the publicke treasure of the Citie, vaulted under the ground like a dungeon, and walled al about with strong square stone. Into it was he let down bound as he was, and a mightie huge stone (being the cover of the vault) was by an engin laid over, to enclose him sure. Thus reposing more trust for his safe custodie in that place than in any perion, they waited and attended the next morning. When morrow day was come, the whole entier multitude in generall, recommending the benefits and good turnes done of old by him to their citie, were of mind to pardon and spare him, and by his meanes and mediation, to seeke for remedies and redresse of their present distresses and calamities. But those persons by whose motive and enducement the Messenians had revolted (and such were they as ruled all the common-weale) consulted apart in secret, and concluded with one consent to put him to death: only the doubt and question was, whether they should do the thing with speed, or by delay. But those prevailed in the end, who were more greedie of present revenge, & so they sent one unto him with a draught of poison. When he had taken the cup in his hand (by report) he gave not a word, but only asked, whether Lycortas (the other Generall of the Achæans) were escaped alive, and the foresaid horsmen safe? When answer was made, that they were in safetie; That is happie, (quoth he) and therewith drunke off every drop in the cup right heartily, and a while after yielded up his vitall breath. But long joyed they not of his death who were the bloudie authors of this crueltie: for the citie of Messene being conquered by force of arms, among other capitulations, delivered these malefactors into the hands of the Achæans, who demanded presently to have them. The bones and reliques of Philopamen were likewise rendred unto them, and interred he was by the generall councill of all Achæa, in such a solemn wise, that in heaping upon him all honours that could be devised for an earthly man, they forbore not also to adore him as a god immortall. The Historiographers, as well Greeke as Latine, attribute so much unto this man, that some of them have recommended to posteritie (as a memorable thing of all others that happened this yeere:) to wit, that in this one yeere there dyed three renowned captaines, Philopamen, Anniball, and P. Scipio. See how they have matched him in equalitie with the greatest Warriours and noblest Generals of the two most puissant nations in the whole world!

Then came T. Quintius Flaminius in embassage to king Prusias, whom the Romanes had in suspicion and jealousie, both for that he had received Anniball after the flight of Antiochus, and also because hee made warre upon Eumenes. Now, were it that among other matters Flaminius charged Prusias, that hee entertained in his court the most spightfull enemy of all men living, unto the people of Rome; who first solicited his own native countrey to take armes against the Romanes, and after the force and power thereof was abated and defeited, perswaded king Antiochus to doe the like: or rather that Prusias of his owne accord to gratifie Flaminius there present, and to doe the Romanes a pleasure, had a meaning and intent either to kill Anniball, or to deliver him alive into their hands. I wot not how it came about, but upon the first communication and conference between them, there were souldiours sent incontinently to beset and guard his house. Anniball evermore forecast in mind some such issue and end of his life, seeing the deadly and inexpressible hatred that the Romanes bare unto him; reposing besides no confidence at all in the fidelitie of these kings, and having withall some experience already of the inconstancie and levitie of king Prusias. Moreover, hee had in horreur this comming of Flamininus, as fatall unto him, and a meane to worke his finall destruction. To the end therefore hee might bee ever provided aforehand against those inconveniences and daungers, wherewith on all sides hee was encombered, and have a ready way of evasion to save himselfe, he had devised and caused to be made seven doores for egress out of his house, whereof some were very privie and secret vaults, because they should not bee environned with guards. But kings commaundments are of that force, that whatsoever they would have to bee searched out and discovered, cannot lie long hidden. For the guards so compassed & enclosed the whole circuit of the house, that it was impossible for any to get forth and make an escape. Anniball being advertised that the kings souldiours were at the gate, assailed to steale away at a postern, which stood forthest out of the way, and whereof the conveyance was most secret, but perceiving that the souldiours had beset it too, and lay for to encounter and receive him that way, and that every place was invested with a set guard, he called for the poison which he had of long time before readie prepared for all such occurrent occasions, and uttered these words withall, Let us ride these Romanes of this their continuall feare and paine wherein they have been all this while, since that they thinke it so long to stay for the death of one old man. Flamininus shall obtain no great nor memorable victorie of me, disarmed thus as I am, and betraied into his hands. But this very day shall prove and testifie, how farre the people of Rome are degenerate and chaunged from their ancient manners. Their forefathers (quod he) advertised king Pyrrhus their enemy armed in field, & lying with an host of men against them in Italie, they gave him warning I say to take heed of poison: but these living at this day, have sent their embassadour, even one that hath borne the dignitie of a Consull, to advise and counsell Prusias wickedly to take the life away of his owne guest. Then after he had cursed the person of Prusias and his whole realme, and called upon the gods, protectors of the law of hospitalitie, to beare witness how hee had violated his faith and broken promise with him, he set the cup of poyson to his mouth, and dranke it of. This was the end of Anniball. Polybius and Rutlius write, that Scipio also died this yeere. But I accord neither with them nor with Valerius. From them I square, because I find, that when M. Porcius and L. Valerius were Censours, the same L. Valerius being Censor, was elected President of the Senat, whereas Africanus had been President for ten yeeres space together, during the time of two reviews by Censours next before. And so long as the said Africanus lived, there would have beene no other chosen President in his rourne, unlesse himselfe were to have beene cased and deprived of the Senatours dignitie, of which disgrace and note of infamie, there is not one that maketh any mention. And as for Valerius Antias hee is sufficiently refuted by M. Nevius a Tribune of the Commons, against whom there is an Oration extant, and the same penned by P. Africanus, and bearing his name. This Nevius is recorded in the rolls and registers of magistrates, by the title of Tribune of the Commons, in that yeere when P. Clodius and L. Porcius were Consuls, but hee entred into his office during the Consulship of App. Claudius and M. Sempronius, the tenth of December. From which time to the fifteenth of March are three months, upon which day Pub. Clodius and L. Porcius began their Consulship. So, it seemeth that he was living during the Tribunehip of Nevius, and that he might well commence an action against him, and call him to his answer, but he departed this life before that L. Cato and M. Porcius were Censours. But in my conceit the death of these three (the most renowned personages each one of their owne nation) are not to be compared one with the other, in this regard, that they happened all just at one time, more than for this, that none of them all had an end correspondent and answerable to the portly state and glorious lustre of his life. For first and foremost in this they all jumped together, that they neither died nor were entered in their native countrey. Againe Anniball and Philopamen were both poisoned. Anniball was banished and betraied by his owne friend and host, Philopamen was taken prisoner, and left his life in prison and yrons. As for Scipio, although hee was neither exiled nor condemned, yet making default of apparance at the day assigned unto him, and being cited to his answer in his absence, willingly banished not himselfe onely for his life time, but his

A corps and funerals also after his death.

Whiles those affaires passed in Peloponnesus (from whence our pen hath a little digressed and digressed) the returne of Demetrius and the embassadours into Macedonie, diversly wrought in mens minds, & amused them some in one thing, & some in another. The common people of Macedonie, who were mightily afraid that the Romanes would make warre upon them, highly affected Demetrius, and cast a favourable aspect upon him as the authour of peace, and withall they destined him without all doubt to the kingdome, after the decease of his father. For albeit he were younger than his brother Perseus, yet men thought and spake, that hee was begotten in matrimony by Philip of his lawfull wife, whereas hee had Perseus by a concubine, who carried no token and marke of a certaine father, as having to his mother a woman that was nought of her bodie and common. Whereas Demetrius resembled his father Philip, and was as like him as might be. Moreover, men said, That the Romanes would place and establish Demetrius in the roiall throne of his father, but Perseus was in no credit and reputation among them. Thus folke stucke not to give out abroad in their common talke. Whereupon not onely Perseus was in care and doubt, that the preeminence of age onely would little boot and advantage him, considering in all respects els hee was inferiour to his brother, but Philip also himselfe, supposing verily that it would hardly lie in his power to leave the inheritance of the crowne to whom he pleased, thought that his younger sonne was a mote in his eye, and troubled him more than was for his ease. Offended otherwhiles he was, that the Macedonians resorted unto him so much as they did, and highly displeased that there should be any more roiall courts than one in his realme, during his life. And to speake a truth, the young prince himselfe returned from Rome more puffed up, no doubt, with pride, than was becomming, as who presumed and grounded much upon the opinion that the Senate had of him, perceiving that they had granted those things to him which had been denied unto his father before: but looke how much favor and honour (in respect of the Romanes) hee won among the rest of the Macedonians, so much envie and ill will hee procured himselfe thereby not onely with his brother, but with his father also: and especially after that other Romane embassadours were arrived, and that Philip was forced to part with Thracia and withdraw his garrisons, and to doe other things either by vertue of the old award of the first commissioners, or by a new ordinance of the Senate. Well, he performed all, but with an heave heart and many a deepe sigh and grone, and so much the rather, because hee observed and saw how his sonne Demetrius conversed more with the embassadours, and frequented their company oftener than his. Howbeit hee obeyed, and did whatsoever was enjoined him by the Romans, because he would minister unto them no occasion of levying war against him out of hand. And supposing it was good policie to avert their minds from all suspicion that hee minded any such designs tending that way, hee led his armie into the middest of Thracia against the Odrysiens, Danthelets, and Bessians. Hee won the citie Philippopolis, abandoned by the inhabitants who were fled, and had retired themselves with their whole families to the high mountaines next adjoining: and after hee had wasted the lands and territories of the Barbarians that inhabited the champaine countrey, hee received them under his subjection by composition. Afterwards, having left a garrison at Philippopolis, which soone after was chased and expelled by the Odrysiens, he determined to build a towne in Deuriopus, a region of Pæonia neere the river Erigonus, which issueth out of Illyricum, and keeping his course through Pæonia, discharged it selfe, and fallett into the river Axius. Not farre from Strobæ the old citie, hee built a new, and caused it to be called Perseis, thereby to doe honour to his eldest sonne Perseus.

During the traine of these affaires in Macedonie, the Consuls tooke their journey into their severall provinces. Marcellus sent a messenger before him to L. Porcius the Proconsull, to give him to understand that he should present his legions before the new towne of the Gauls. But at the first approach of the Consull, the Frenchmen yielded the place. Twelve thousand they were that bare armes, and most of them had by force gotten their armour out of their countrey villages, which was taken from them maugre their hearts, with all things else, that either they had gotten out of the countrey by pilling and robbing, or brought with them of their owne. Whereupon they addressed their Embassadours to Rome, for to make complaint of these abuses and wrongs: who having audience given in the Senat by C. Valerius the Pretour, declared, how by occasion that Gauls was furcharged with a multitude of people, they were constrained as well for want of ground and possessions, as also for need and povertie, to passe over the Alpes and seeke them-themselves some place of habitation. And where they saw any quarters for let, desert, and unpeopled, there they had planted themselves, without offering injurie to any person: where also they had begun to build a towne, which might be a good prooffe and argument, that they came not to doe violence upon any citie or countrie village. And now of late M. Claudius had sent unto them a message, that unless they submitted and yielded, he would warre upon them: whereupon they preferring certaine peace (although it were lesse honorable) before the doubtfull hazards and adventures of warre, surrendered, rather to be in the protection and safeguard, than under the subjection of the people of Rome. But a few daies after, they were commaunded to quit both citie and countrie. And thereupon resolved in their mind to depart in silence and saying neuer a word, into what place soever they could, there to seeke their fortune: but then they were disarmed, yea and spoiled and stript of all that ever they had, and nothing left, that either they drave before them, or carried about them. In regard whereof, they were humble suppliants to the Senate and people of Rome, that they would not proceed in more rigour and crueltie against them, harmlesse persons as they were, and submitting themselves unto them, than against professed enemies. To this Oration of complaint the Senate caused this answer to be returned: That neither they had done well in coming into Italie, and presuming to build them a citie upon other mens territories, without permission of the soveraigne Romane magistrate, who had the government of those parts: nor yet the Senate was well pleased, that they should be thus despoiled, considering they had yielded. And therefore minded they were to send with them their Embassadors to the Consuls, to commaund them in their name, to see that all their owne goods should be restored againe unto them, so that they made returne thither from whence they came: who also should go forward immediatly over the Alpes, to give the States of France warning to keepe in their people with them, & hold them in their native countrie: for as much as the Alpes were the frontier limits standing in the mids to confine between them, & therefore those mountains neither ought nor might be passed of one side or the other: & to make account of this, that they should speed no better now in transgressing their bounds, than at what time as they first made a way and passage over them into Italie. The Embassadors employed about this businesse, were L. Furius Purpurio, Q. Minutius, and L. Manlius Acidinus. Thus the French, after restitution made unto them of all that was their owne by good right, and without wrong of others, departed out of Italie. Now when these Romane Legates were come, they had good words and courteous answers from the Transalpine nations. And those amongst them that were more auncient than the rest, blamed the people of Rome for their overmuch lenitie, in that they let those persons goe, who without warrant from the whole State, durst bee so bold as to take a voyage to settle upon any landes belonging to the Signorie of Rome, and were so hardly as thereon to builde a towne. For surely they deserved not lesse than to abide greivous smart for their rash demeanure. Moreover and besides, whereas the Romans have given them their owne goods againe, they feared much that so great indulgencie of theirs, would enduce and encourage others to enterprise the like. So they friendly entertained and as kindly accompanied the embassadors, yea and liberally presented them with rewards.

M. Claudius the Consull having thus expelled the Gaules out of his province, began to lay the ground of the Istrieke warre, and for this purpose wrote his letters unto the Senate, for a warrant and commission to passe with his legions into Istria. The Senat was therewith contented. But whereas they were in question and consultation about conducting a Colonie to inhabit Aquileia, they could not agree whom to send, whether Latines or Romane citizens. But in conclusion the LL. thought it better to plant there a Colonie of Latines. The Triumvirs for to effect this, were created P. Scipio Nasica, C. Flaminius, and L. Manlius Acidinus.

The same yeere were two Colonies of Romane citizens erected at Mutina and Parma: and two thousand persons were to either place translated out of the territorie which lately was occupied by the Boians, and before time had bene in the tenour of the Tuscans. They of Parma were ended with eight acres of land, and those of Mutina with five a peece. The Triumvir Commissioner who had the disposing and manning of this businesse, were M. Aemilius Lepidus, T. Ebutius Carus, and L. Quintius Crispinus. Likewise the colonie Saturnia consisting of Romane cittizens, was brought into the territorie of Caletia, by the conduct of Q. Fabius Labeo, C. Afranius Stellio, and T. Sempronius Gracchus, deputed Triumvirs therefore: who set out for every every man ten acres of ground.

The same yeere A. Terentius the Pro-pretour, not farre from the river Iberus in the Aufetanes countrie, fought fortunatly against the Celtiberians, and forced certaine townes which they had fortified. Basse Spaine beyond Iberus was quiet this yeere, because both P. Sempronius the Pro-pretour lay sicke of a long disease, and also the Lusitanians (as good hap was) rested still & quiet, as being by no man provoked to stirre. Neither was there any memorable exploit atchieved in Liguria by Q. Fabius the Consull. M. Marcellus was called home out of Istria: and after he had discharged his armie, returned to Rome for to hold the election of the magistrates. For Consuls he created Cn. Babius Tamphilus and L. Aemilius Paulus. This man had bene Edile Curule together with M. Aemilius Lepidus, who was Consull five yeeres before; and yet the same Lepidus suffered the repulse twice ere he was created Consull. Then were Pretours chosen, to wit, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, M. Valerius Levinus, L. Manlius the second time, M. Ogulnius Gallus, L. Caelius Denter, & C. Terentius Isfra. In the very end of the yeere there was a solemne supplication holden by occasion of certain prodigies: for men beleevved verily that in the court-yard of the goddesse Concordia it rained blood for the space of two daies: & reported it was not far from Sicilie, that a new Iland was discovered out of the sea, where never any was before scene. Valerius Antias writeth, that Annibal died this yeere: and that to compasse and worke his death, there were sent in embassage to Prusias, L. Scipio Asiaticus, & P. Scipio Nasica, besides T. Quintius Flamininus, who in that action is named most.

THE XL. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the fortieth Booke.

When Philip had given commandment to make streight search for the children of those whom he kept in prison (and personages they were of most noble birth) for to put them to death: Theoxena fearing the king his malicious intent and wicked lust, in the chaste as well of her owne children, as of her sisters, little ones (God wot) and very young infants, brought forth and offered unto the said children naked keene swords, and a cup of deadly poison, perswading with them to avoid the imminent shaine & dishonour by present death: which after shee had obtained and scene effected, she likewise pleased her owne part, and slew her owne selfe. Moreover, in this booke are related the debate and variance betwene Perseus and Demetrius, the two sonnes of Philip king of Macedonia: and how Demetrius came to his death by poison, through the mischievous practise of his brother Perseus: who devised false crimes and raised slanders against him: and principally among the rest, charged him that he intended to kill his owne father, and meant to usurpe the kingdome, and last of all, because he was a friend to the people of Rome: by which means after the death of Philip, Perseus obtained the crowne. Also it containeth the happie exploits atchieved by many and divers commanders in Liguria, and in Spaine against the Celtiberians. The bookes of Numa Pompilius were by certaine highbanden as they laboured in the ground of L. Petilius a Notarie, under the Ianiculum found enclosed within a coffer of stone, and written both in Latine and Greeke. And when the Pretour of the citie, to whom the bookes were brought, had perused them and found therein many points tending to overthrow religion and the divine service of the gods, he swore before the Senate, that it was dangerous for the State and common-wealth, that they should be read and preserved: in such sort, that by an Act of the State they were burned within the Comitium or Hall of publick assemblies. The Colonie Aquileia was now erected. Philip exceedingly displeased with himselfe, & pricked with remorse of conscience, for that he had caused his sonne Demetrius to be poisoned, upon the false suggestions and accusations of his other sonne framed against him, devised to punish Perseus, and rather to conserve the kingdome upon Antigonus his friend, than that his sonne should succeed him: but in this disingement and purpose of his he suddainly died: and so Perseus tooke the crowne and kingdome upon him.

In

IN the beginning of the yeere next ensuing, the Consuls and Pretours cast lots for their severall governments. As for the Consuls, there was no other province to employ them in, but Liguria. The civile jurisdiction among citizens fell to M. Ogulnius Gallus; and the forreign over strangers to M. Valerius. High Spaine was assigned unto Q. Fulvius Flaccus; and the nether-land thereof to P. Manlius. L. Cecilius Dentor had the governance of Sicilie, and C. Terentius Istra of Sardinia. The Consuls were enjoined to take musters: for Q. Fabius had written out of Liguria, that the Appuans inclined to rebellion, and greatly to be feared it was, that they would breake out and make rodes into the territorie of Pisa. And well they knew alreadie, that of the two provinces of Spain, the higher parts were in armes, and the war with the Celtiberians was still in traine: and as for the lower, the militarie discipline there, was cleane corrupt and gone, by reason of riotous pleasures and idleness, whereunto the souldiours were wholly given, by occasion that the Pretour lay so long sicke. For these causes thought good it was, that new armies should be levied and enrolled; to wit, four legions for Liguria, and every one of them to containe 5200 foote and 300 horse: unto which, there was an addition of fiftene thousand footmen and nine hundred men of armes from out of the Latine allies. And these two armies were to serve the Consuls. But over and besides, they were commaunded to enroll seven thousand foot and sixe hundred horsemen of Latine allies, and them to send into Fraunce to M. Marcellus, who was to continue still in place of command, after the tearme of his Consulship expired. Likewise they had in charge to levie of Romane citizens 4000 footmen and 200 horse, and of allies 7000 of the one, and 300 of the other to be conducted into both provinces of Spain. And Q. Fabius Labeo had his commission of government renewed for one yeere longer, with the charge of that armie which he had in Liguria.

The spring season that yeere was very stormie and tempestuous. On the*even of the feast Palilia about noontide, sodainly there arose a mightie blustering wind, which overthrew many edifices as well sacred as profane. It cast downe the brasen statues and images in the Capitoll: it caught up the wicket of the dore belonging to the temple of the* Moone, (which is in the Aventine) carried it away and set it fast to the backe wall of the temple of Ceres. It overturned and laid along other statues in the great cirque or show-place called Circus maximus, together with the pillars upon which they stood. The lanternes and pinnacles it rent and tare after a strange sort, from the rouse and top of certain churches, and carried them cleane away. And therefore this tempest was held for a prodigious token, and the Aruspices gave order for the expiation and satisfaction thereof. Likewise the same provision was made in regard of a report from Reate, that a mule was soled with three feet: and from Formia, that the chappell of Apollo (and namely at Cajeta) was stricken with lightning. For these prodigies, there were twentie greater beasts killed for sacrifice; and a supplication holden one whole day. And about the same time, intelligence was given by letters from A. Tarentius the Pretour, that P. Sempronius having* continued above a yeere sicke, was departed this life, in the farther province of Spaine; which was the cause that the Pretours were willed to make more hast, and so much the sooner to passe into Spaine.

After this, the embassages from beyond the sea had audience given them in the Senat. The first was that, of the two KK. Eumenes and Pharnaces, and also of the Rhodians, who complained for the great losse and overthrow by the Sinopians received. And about the same instant arrived also embassadors from Philip, from the Achæans and Lacedæmonians, who had their answer and dispatch, after a speech made by Martius, who had been sent to visite the estate and affaires of Greece and Macedonia. But as touching the foresaid kings of Asia, and the Rhodians, this stood for their answer; namely, That the Senat would send their embassadors and commissioners to take knowledge and see to all things there in place. But as concerning Philip, Martius had so told his tale, that he put the LL. of the Senat in more feare and perplexitie: for in his declaration he confessed, that Philip indeed had accomplished the will and pleasure of the Senat, but in such sort, as it was evident to be seene, that he would doe so. no longer than hee were held thereto and compelled of necessitie; for apparant it was, that he minded to make war againe, considering that whatsoever he either did or said, tended to no other end. For first and formost hee caused all the multitude to be remooved and translated (with their whole families) out of the cities by the sea-coast, into that quarter which now is called * Emathia, and in times

A times past was named Pæonia; and gave those cities aforesaid to the Thracians & other barbarous nations to inhabit, supposing that this kind of people would be more fast and faithfull unto him in his wars against the Rom. And verily this deed of his bred a great discontentment & murmuring throughout all Macedonia: inso much, as few there were of them, who thus left their native habitations together with their wives and children, that could bite in & containe their secret griefe and heart-burning, and say nothing: but being pricked and nettled more to anger than curbed and bridled with feare, they brake out, and were heard to curse and cry out upon the king, as they went along the way in troupes and companies. Hereupon his fell stomacke by nature was so galled, that he had all men in jealousy, and no time nor place there was, but hee suspected. In the end, he began to give it out openly, that he could not make account to be in safetie and securitie, unlesse he apprehended and kept in prison the children of those persons whom he had beforetime killed, for to dispatch and make away them also (in time) one after another. This crueltie in it selfe hainous enough and enormous, the calamitie and wofull miserie of one house made more odious and detestable. Murdered hee had many yeeres before Herodius, a noble man and a prince of the Thessalians: and some time after, he slew also his sonnes in law, who had married his daughters. These gentlewomen being left widowes, had each of them by their husbands a little sonne: and the names of these women were Theoxena and Archo. As for Theoxena she would in no wise marrie againe, albeit shee had many suiters that wooed her: but Archo was wedded to one Poris, the verie principall & noblest personage of the Enean nation: and when he had borne him many children, she dyed, and left them all very young. Then afterwards Theoxena likewise was married to the foresaid Poris, to the end, that she might have the bringing up of those her sisters children with her owne hands: and in truth shee was not more kind to her owne prettie sonne than to those her sisters children; but so tenderly regarded them all alike, as if shee had borne them of her owne bodie. Now when shee heard once of the kings edict and proclamation which was gone forth, for the apprehension of all those infants whose fathers before had ben put to death; supposing that these children should be exposed not only to the abuse and scornfull mockerie of the king, but also to the lust and villanie of his guard, she conceived in her mind an horrible designment: yea and she stuck not to say, That with her owne hand shee would rid them of their lives, rather than they should come within the clutches of Philip. But Poris her husband (who abhorred the very naming of so abominable a fact) said, D that he would convey them out of the way as farre as Athens, to certain trustie friends of his there, and would himselfe in proper person accompanie them all the way thither, and take part with them of that exile and banishment. So they put themselves in their journey all together [he and his wife and children] from Thessalonica toward Enea, unto a solemne sacrifice and feast which yearly they use to celebrate with much ceremonious pompe, in the honor of Eneas their first founder. Now when they had spent that day in feasting full solemnly, about the third watch of the night (when all others were found asleepe) they were embarked in a ship prepared beforehand by Poris; making semblance, as if they would returne to the Thessalonica; but indeed purposing to cut over to Eubœa. But when they had labored and wrought to no purpose upon the wind, which was full against them, they were overtaken and prevented by the day-light before they were farre from the land, and past sight. And beeing discovered by the kings officers who had the charge and keeping of the haven, there was a pinnace or soist (well appointed with armed men) set out to fetch in that vessel, with expresse commaundement (as they would answer to the contrarie at their utter perill) not to come againe without it. Now as they approached neerer, Poris verily for his part was verie earnest with the rowers, mariners, and sailers, to plie their businesse and make way from them; otherwhiles stretching out his hands up to heaven, calling and praying unto the gods to helpe them in this their hard distresse. But the courageous ladie his wife, all the while (turning againe to execute that designment of hers long before purposed) tempered and mixed a potion of poison, and brought forth certain swords withall. Now when she had set the poisoned cup before the children in their very eye, and drawn the swords naked: Death (q d. she) is the only means we have to save our libertie; lo here the waies that lead to death: now as every ones heart standeth to this or that, take thereto, and avoid the crueltie and pride of the king. Come on lads and jolly striplings, lead you the way first that are the bigger and elder; take sword in hand, fall thereupon and worke the feat at once: or if yee list rather to be long a dying, drinke here of this cup. What should they doe? the enemies were fast upon them them readie to bourd their vessell, their mother on the other side, encouraging them instantly to take their death. In such wise, that to conclude, some dying the one way and some the other, were all cast headlong over shipboard, when they were but halfe dead. Then shee for her part embracing her husband about the middle (because she would die with him for company) threw her selfe and him both together into the sea. Thus the kings men seized upon the ship, when the matters thereof were gone.

The horrible example of this fact kindled more coales, and set the malice and hatred kindled against the king as it were on a light and flaming fire anew, insomuch as now commonly in all places they fell to open cursing of him and his children. Which maledictions & execrations, it was not long but all the gods listened and gave eare unto, and caused that he likewise exercised cruelty even upon his owne flesh and bloud. For Perseus seeing his brother Demetrius to arise every day more than other in favour, greatnesse, and reputation with the whole Macedonian people, and to grow also in credite and grace among the Romanes, supposing with himselfe how hee had no other hope left him of attaining to the crowne, but by the meanes of some wicked practise, bent all his thoughts and studies that way, and aimed onely at that marke. But beleiving verily that he was not strong enough & sufficient alone, to execute & bring forth so much only, as within that unmanly & womanish mind of his he had devised & conceived, he practised with his fathers friends, and estoones founded their hearts one by one apart, casting out ambiguous and doubtfull speeches. And at the first verily some of them shewed countenance, as if they could not abide to heare of any such thing, because they reposed more hope in Demetrius. But afterwards, as the hatred of Philip grew daily greater against the Romanes, which Perseus still fostered and maintained, whereas Demetrius with all his might laboured against it; they foreseeing in their mind the unhappie end of Demetrius, who lay too open and was not heedfull ynough to guard himselfe against the fraudulent and mischeevous plots of his brother, sided with Perseus; making this account in policie, to set that agoing and helpe it forward, which in the end would take effect, & namely to entertain and advance the hope of the mightier. For the execution of the rest they reserved every thing to a meet & convenient time therefore. As for the present, the best course they thought upon was this, to incense the king all that ever possibly they could against the Romanes, to induce and put him forward still to thinke of nothing but warre, where-to of his owne accord his mind stood well ynough and was enclined. And withall (to the end that Demetrius might be from day to day more and more suspected) they entred of purpose (as before they were agreed) into speech, as touching the hope and great port of the Romanes: where at when some of them would seeme againe in scornfull wise to elevate and debase their manners and fashions, others to deprave their deeds and acts, some scoffing in generall at the very forme and making of their citie, how it was not yet embellished and beautified either with stately edifices in publicke places, or with faire houses of private men; others mocking and having in derision the principall and cheefe personages of the citie in particular; the inconsiderat yong gentleman, carried away as well with an affectionate love to the Romanes, as with a desire to crosse his brother, would answer to all those points in the defence and maintenance of the Romanes: by which meanes hee brought himselfe both into more jealousy with his father, and also to be subject and exposed to slanderous imputations. Whereupon his father acquainted him no more with any counsell as touching the Roman affairs, but wholly relied upon Perseus, and with him conferred therabout, imparting unto him both day & night all his projects & designs whatsoever. By this time were they returned, whom he chaunced to send to the Basternes for tolevie succours and aid-souldiours, and brought they had with them from thence certaine noble yong gentlemen, and some among of roiall bloud. One of them promised to give his sister in marriage to one of *Philip*s sonnes, insomuch as the affociation by way of affinity with that nation, set the kings heart also aloft. But Perseus brake out into these words: What serves all this for (qud he) since we have not so much help and safetie by aids from abroad, as harme and daunger by a mischeefe and maladie at home. We keep here & foster in our bolome, I dare not say a traitor, but I assure you a very dangerous spie & no better; whose bodie verily the Romans have sent us again, but his heart & soule they are possessed of, ever since he was an hostage at Rome. All the Macedonians in a manner have their eies upon him set, him they court, & give out in plain terms, that they will no other king than whom the Romans shall set up. Old Philip was of himselfe badly ynough affected in his mind, but upon these suggestions buzzed into his head, hee was the worse, & more disquieted

A disquieted and set out of frame: hee entertained these surmises, and set them neerer to his heart than hee made faire in outward shew and countenance. Now it fortuned that the time was come of the ordinarie review of his armie, the solemnitie whereof was usually performed in this manner. They cut a dog overthwart the middest in two halves, the head and foreparts together with the entrals were set on the right hand of the high way; the hindparts on the left. Betwene this sacrifice thus divided, the companies in their armour passed in a shew. Before the front of the vauntguard were carried the coats of armes and roiall ensignes of all the Macedonian kings that ever had been from the beginning. Then followed the king himselfe in person with his children. Next marched the kings guard and cohort, with the squires of his bodie. And last of all, in the rereguard behind came the rest of the multitude and commons of the Macedonians. Of either side of the king went his sons, two lustie gentlemen. Perseus was about thirtie yeeres old, and Demetrius five yeeres yonger; the one in the mids and best of his age and strength, and the other in the very prime & flour thereof. An happie father had he ben for so fair issue, seeing this prooffe, this maturitie and perfection of theirs, if the grace of God had gone withal, & that they had ben well disposed and affected in mind. The maner & custome of this review & solemn sight was (after the sacrifice duly accomplished) for the whole armie to joust and tourney in this wise, that being divided into two battailons, they should one charge the other, & represent the shew of a very conflict and set field. And who should be the cheefe leaders and captaines in this brave pastime, but the kings two sonnes? But beleieve me they jested never a whit, nor made a vaine shew for disport, but went to it roundly in good earnest, as if they would determine now who should bee king another day. Foule worke they made with their wodden wasters and headlesse pikes; many were wounded, and nothing wanted there but sharpe yron, of a very bloudie battell indeed. That regiment which Demetrius commaunded, had the upper hand by ods. Perseus shewed himselfe highly displeased and angrie thereat; but contrariwise his friends and favourites of the wiser sort, rejoiced at it, and made remonstrance, That this was the onely thing to minister just occasion unto him for to challenge and accuse his yonger brother. Now the same day, the one as well as the other feasted their companions, who had thus performed the jousts and tournaments of either side with them. Perseus was invited by his brother to supper, but he refused and denied to come. Howbeit such was the good fellowship amongst them, and so merrie were the yong gallants and lustie Cavaliers, that they passed the feastivall day in all joy and mirth, either part with their captaine, and plied the wine full liberally. Then in their cups they fell to discoursing freely of their running and pastime, and began to cast out merrie conceits and broad jests at their adversaries of the contrarie side, insomuch as they forbore not to glaunce at the very cheefestaynes themselves. Now had Perseus sent a privie spie, one of his guests, to listen what good talke there was at his brothers board, but he demeaning himselfe & walking not so circumspectly as he should, was encountered by certaine youths, that chaunced to come forth of the hall or parlor where they sate at supper, and was evil entreated and well beaten for his labour. Demetrius nothing ware thereof, among other table talke, Why goe we not (quoth he) and banquet with my brother? and if there remaine any anger & displeasure behind after our jousting in jest, appease and mitigate the same in simplicitie of hart and mirth making? Mary, no better, cried they all againe with one voice, save onely those that feared to be met withall presently, and served alike for misusing and knocking the foresaid spie. Demetrius would needs draw even them also with him; whereupon they carried weapons hidden under their apparell, for feare of the worst, that they might defend themselves, if any violence were offered. But what can be caried so secret, but out it wil, where ther is intestine discord in one familie? All was full of spies & false knaves, as well in the one house as the other. For there ran a pickthanke and tale carrier before unto Perseus, and declared unto him that there were comming with Demetrius foure yong men with privie skeines by their sides. And albeit hee wist well ynough what was the cause thereof (for hee had heard that one of his guests was by them beaten) yet to aggravate the matter and make it more odious, he commaunded the dore to be fast locked, and from the upper roomes and lofts of the house and out of the windows to the street side, he kept off and repelled those (that came to banquet and bee merrie with him) from approaching the dore, as if their comming were for no other purpose but to murder him. Demetrius after hee had for a time cried out in the street and taken on for this disgrace and indignitie, saying it was long of the wine and nothing els that hee was thus excluded, returned againe to his own house to make an end of the banquet there: and all this while knew nothing thing what the matter was. The morrow after, Perseus, so soone as ever he thought hee might have access to the speech of his father, came to the court; & in the sight of the king, stood afar off with a troubled countenance and heave cheere, and not a word with him. How now (quoth his father) what is amisse with you? is not all well? Ah, my good lord and father (quoth hee) I would you knew, that it is the faire gift & grace of God that I am a livelingsman at this houre. That brother of mine, goeth not about us any more by way of secret practises & hidden ambushes: for the night that was, he came with armed men to set upon me in mine owne house, & to take away my life. I was driven (father) to shut the doores against him, and to save my selfe from his furious rage, within the defence of the wals thereof. When hee had thus possessed his father with feare and astonishment together; Nay (quoth he) I will prove all plainly before your face, that you shall know it is a trueth that I say, if your grace can be content to give mee audience. Audience? (quoth he) yes marie will I, and that with patience: and immediatly he commanded Demetrius to be called before him. And withall, he sent for two of his old friends to assist him, and to take their advise, to wit, Lyfsmachus and Oromastus, who wist nothing of the quarrell and variance betweene the two brethren, for that they had bene strangers a long time at the court. In the meane while, he walked up and downe alone, attending their coming, courting and discoursing many matters in his head, and his son Perseus stood still aloofe. After word was brought that the parties were come, he retired aside with those two friends, and as many of his guard, into an inner rounge, and permitted his sonnes to bring with them into the place, three friends a peece unarmed. And when he was set, thus began he to speake.

Here sit I a most wretched father, to be a judge betweene my two sonnes, the one plaintife, the other defendant in the case of parricide; and to find among those of mine owne house and bloud, the foule staine of that felonious crime, either falsely forged, or in deed committed. Certes, long ago I feared such a storme & tempest toward, & I saw it rising afar off, when I perceived your unbrotherly looks one toward another, when I over-heard some unhappie words to passe betweene you. Yet other whiles I was in good hope, that the heat of your anger might evaporate and flake, and the suspicions and jealousies be cleared and passe away: considering that even professed & mortall enemies, have laid downe armes, concluded peace, and become friends at last: yea and great quarrels and enimities betweene private persons have had their end. I hoped that one time or other, ye would remember how ye were naturall brethren, that ye would call to mind, how ye were little children together, and had conversed with all simplicitie and singleness of heart familiarlie in your infancie: and finally, that ye would thinke upon my good lessons and precepts unto you, which now I feare me much, that I have founded to your deafe eares in vaine. How often haue I blamed and detested in your presence and hearing, the examples of brethren at discord & variance, recounting unto you the stories of the fearfull sequel & horrible issue thereof: namely, how they have thereby undone themselves and their race, overthrowne their owne houses, yea and utterly subverted whole kingdomes? On the other side, I laid before you better patternes and precedents to follow, and namely of the concord, agreement, and unitie betweene the Lacedæmonian KK. that reigned two by two together, to their owne good and the publicke weale of their countrie for many hundred yeceres: but the same citie fell soone to decay and ruine, when the fashion once was taken up, to usurpe the tyrannie and soveraigne rule every man for himselfe alone. Moreover, I set before you these two brethren hereby, Eumenes and Attalus, who at the first began with so little, that they were in manner abashed and ashamed to take upon them the title and style of kings: and at this day are equall in graundeur of dominion to my selfe, to Antiochus, and to any kings of this age living: and that by no other means in the world, more than by brotherly love & mutual concord. Nay, I itaid not so, but discoursed unto you & recited sundrie examples of certain Romans, which either I had learned by heare-say, or observed by mine own eie-sight and experience: and namely, the two Quintus, T. and L. who warred both against me. The Scipios likewise, P. and L. who vanquished and subdued Antiochus: their fathers also and uncles, who were brethren, and whose concord and unitie all their life long was such, as it was not disjoyned in their verie death. But neither the wickednesse of those first recited, and a fembable end correspondent to their ungracious life, was able to skare you from outrageous discord; nor yet the good hart & meaning of the later sort, together with their happie fortune, draw & induce you to be wise. During my natural life, whiles my breath is within my bodie, both twaine of you, seduced by sfolish hope and disordinate desire, are readie to take possession of my kingdome over my head. And so long onely would yee have mee to live, untill that I surviving the one of you, might presently by my death put all out of question, and make the other (as I sole heire apparent) undoubted king. Sicke yee are I see well of father and brother, yee can abide neither the one nor the other. Ther is no goodnes in you at all: nothing is there that ye hold deere, nothing that you count holy and inviolable: but in lieth and steed of all, there is crept and entred into you an unsatiable desire to raigne, and that hath wholly possessed your hearts. Come on therefore now, greeve and wound your fathers eares with your ungracious tales and wicked words: debate and dispute the matter with reciprocally accusations, you that shortly will decide and determine it by dent of sword: say on & spare not; speake out all, that either you can allege truly, or list to devise and invent falsly. Mine eares are now wide open, but shall hereafter for ever be close shut, against all secret slanders that ye shal whisper & report one against the other. When he had breathed out these words with great indignation, the assistants there, began al to weepe a good and shed teares, and for a good time there was sad cheere and not a word untill at length Perseus began and said: I should belike have opened the dore in the night that I should, and received into my house armed guests to banquet with me, yea and held out my throat unto them for to be cut: since that nothing is beleaved, unlesse the deed had bene done and dispatched: since that the same is said unto me (who have bene forlaid, and whose life hath bene sought) which were more becoming to speake unto a wood-kerne and robber by the high-way side: It is not for nought I see well, that these heere, give out abroad and say, That you have no more sonnes but Demetrius, and call me a bastard, & a supposed sonne of yours, as begotten of a concubine. For if you held & avowed me legitimate, if you vouchsafed me the place, the degree and love of a sonne, you would never fare and storme against me so as you doe, for discovering the ambush set for me, and complaining thereof; but against him rather that laid in wait to surpris me: neither would you set so light and make so small account of my life, as to be mooved neither for the danger past wherein I was, nor at the perill to come, if such wait-laiers may escape unpunished. Now, if there be no remedie, but that we must die & say nothing, let us hold our tongue and be mute: let us onely pray to the gods before, that this intended mischief begun in me, may also take an end in me alone, and that you be not he, who is to be wounded and pierced through my bodie. But in case (like as by the verie instinct and suggestion of nature, they that are assailed and set upon in a desert wilderness, be taught to implore & call for mens helpe and succour, although they neither saw nor knew of any before) in case (I say) it be lawfull for me likewise to open my mouth and speake, when I see the naked sword drawne upon me: then I beseech you for your owne loue, even for the love of your good selfe, and the name of a father (which whether of us twain have more esteemed & regarded, you have full well known long agoe) to give me audience, & to hear me, as if you had bene awakened at my crie & pittifull lamentation in the last nights riot, & came in the way where I was forced to call, Help, Help: and as if you had taken Demetrius in the manner, within my gate, in the verie entrie of my dore, accompanied with armed men, at an undecent and undue houre of this night past. Those plaints and mones which then I would have uttered by way of disordered and confused cries, in that suddaine affright of mine upon the deed dooing; the same I now make the morrow after. Ah brother, wee have lived now a good while, not (ywis) as brethren that should banquet and make merry one with another. It is the crowne that you looke after, that is certain & past peradventure: but your hope to attain unto it, is crossed divers waies. My birthright & mine eldestship is a blocke in your way, between you & it; the law of nations is against it; the ancient custome of the Macedonians checketh it; and finally, the will, pleasure, and judgement of our father is opposite unto it. Mount you cannot possibly so high, but by the effusion of my heart bloud. You goe to worke, you assay all meanes, you leave no stone unrolled, and nothing unattempted to effect that: but to this day, either mine own warie diligence or happy fortune hath guarded me, and withstood your wicked parricide. Even yesterday, during the time of the solemne revieue and purging of the army, during the time of running at tilt & jousting, in time of the shew & pastime resembling a skirmish, you missed very little of making a bloudie battaile of it and a deadly conflict indeed; and nothing else saved me from death, but this, that I suffered my selfe and my men to goe by the worse and be overcome. From this martiall combat, as if it had been no more but a game and sport among brethren, you would needs have trained and drawn me to a supper.

Why? thinke you father, that I should have supped among those guests unarmed, who came in armes to banquet with me? Doe you beleve, that I should have beene in no daunger of their naked swords of Steele at night; who in the day time and within your sight, laid on such lode with wooden swords and bastons, that they had like to have killed me? To what end else came you, brother, at that time of the night? why came you as an enemy, considering I was in choller and my blood was up? or, wherefore came you accompanied with tall fellows, privily armed and with short swords under their garments? I durst not venture to sit at supper with you: should I have received you then, comming as you did with armed men to banquet with me? Father, if the dore had been opened; whereas you heare me now to make my complaints, you should have ben by this time busied about my winding-sheet, herse, & funerals. I lay not forth & urge matters in (understand) manner, after the fashion of these accusers at the barre; neither collect I bare conjecturall presumptions to enforce and conclude any doubtful points: for what need I so to do? Denyeth he that he approached my dore with a troupe of men? or that he had in his traine a compaignie, such as ware weapons covertly under their apparell? Do but send for them whom I shall name. But in faith, what will not they dare to doe, that can doe this? and yet I trow, they will never be so hardie and shamelesse as to denie it. If I had taken them in the manner with their weapons about them within mine entrie, and so brought them before you, then you would say, it were a plaine case and out of all doubt. If then, they confesse as much with their mouth, hold them as culpable as if they had been surprisid in the act doing. Now curse (& spare not) the greedy appetite and thirst after a kingdome; now fall to raise and call up the furies out of hell to set brethren together by the eares: but, good father, let not your curies and execrations thus sic at blind random: make some distinction yet and difference, between him that lyeth in wait, and the partie who is forelaid. Let him be holden guiltie that sought to kill his brother, let him feele withall the gods of his father to be his enemies and angrie against him. But as for him who was in daunger to loose his life through his brothers mischievous practise, let him have his refuge and recourse to the mercie and justice of his father. For alas, whether els should I flie for succour? seeing that neither the solemne revieu and purging of your armie, nor the running and jousting of the men at armes, neither mine owne house nor my table, ne yet the very night season (which nature hath given to mankind for covert and repose) affoordeth me safetie and securitie? If I goe to my brother (being bidden to supper) die I shall: if I receive my brother within my dores (comming to banquet) die I must. So that whether I go or stay, all is one; I cannot avoid but fall into traines and ambushes, laid for to take away my life. To what place shall I retire and betake my selfe? None have I regarded, nothing have I relied upon, but the gods and your good selfe, father. As for the Romans, I stand in no such tearms with them of grace and favour, as to trust upon their succour: nay they all wish me hanged, because I take the wrongs done unto you by them, to the heart; because I shew my selfe discontented and touched with the indignitie, that so many cities, so many nations are plucked from you; and namely, that of late they have despoiled and bereaved you of all the maritime parts and sea coasts of Thrace: and so long as either you or I live, they never looke to enjoy Macedonie. But if by the mischievous practise of my brother, I might once be rid out of the way; and withall, if old age had made an end of you, yea and peradventure before that day came, (which they would never stay so long for) then they know well and make full account, that both the king and kingdome of Macedonie, will be theirs sure enough. Indeed if the Romans had spared any piece at all without Macedonie, I should have thought and made reckoning, that it had been a place of retreat and refuge left for me. But what need that, so long as I have strength enough among the very Macedonians. You saw your selfe yesterday how violently the souldiours charged upon me: what wanted they but the sharpe sword and edged weapons? well, that which they failed and missed of in the day time, my brothers banquetters met with in the night. For what should I speake of the greater part of the nobilitie? they have grounded and built all their hopes of dignitie, promotion, and advancement, in the Romans, and namely in him who now can doe all in all with them, and is of greatest reputation. And certes, to speake a truth, him they preferre not onely before me his elder brother, but also they go within a very little to set him before your selfe, his liege king and naturall father. For this is he, for whose love and in favour of whome, the Senate hath remitted and pardoned you that penaltie which you had incurred. This is hee, who now protecteth you from the force of Romane armies: who deemeth it meet and reason that your old age should be

A obliged and beholden to his youth. For him stand all the Romanes: with him take part all those cities which are delivered and free from your subjection: of him hold the Macedonians that with peace with the Romans, and take contentment therein. Now for me, father, what hope or helpe can I have elsewhere, but in you alone? Where to thinke you tend those letters of Quintius sent lately unto you; wherein hee writeth, That you did passing well for your owne estate, in sending Demetrius to Rome: and exhorteth you withall, to send him againe the second time, accompanied with more embassadours, and those the very principall and best of all the Macedonians? This T. Quintius (if you will needs know the reason) is the man, who leadeth, induceth, and directeth him at this present, in all things: he is his counsellour and schoole-master. And Demetrius hath rejected and cast you off his owne father, and hath put him in your stead. There it is, where all these privie plots have heretofore been first contrived and set a hatching: and at this present in willing you to send more in embassage, and those the chiefe personages of the Macedonians with him, he seeketh nought els but helpers & assistants to put those designs in execution. As many as go from hence to Rome, be they never so sound & uncorrupt at their setting out, be they loiall subjects and acknowledging no other but Philipp for their king, returne from thence tainted and infected with the alluring enticements of the Romanes. Demetrius alone is altogether in their bookes. They are all for him, and passe for none els. Him they call their king, during the life of his owne father. Now, if I seeme to be touched, offended, and grieved hereby, by and by I am sure to have it charged reprochfully on both sides of mine eares, not onely from others, but also from your mouth father, that I aspire and seeke to be king. For mine own part, I would both they and you knew, that if the diademe and crowne were here let betwene us both, I would none of it. For who is he, that I should need to undermine and supplant, for to step into his place and succeed? None there is at all but my father before me, and long may he so be. I pray God, and I wish to survive him no otherwife, but if I be worthe and deserve that he should likewise desire the same. If my father will make me his heire and inheritour of the kingdome, I will accept thereof. Hee indeed coveteth to be a king, yea, and ungraciously coveteth it, who hasteneth to make pace forward, and to step before the course of nature, the order of age, the custome of the Macedonians, and the law of nations. But what imagineth Demetrius, suppose yet? Mine elder brother (thinketh he) stands in my way between me and home; to him appertaineth the kingdome by right and by my fathers will: Let us rid him out of the world. What? I am not the first that sought to be a king by murder of a brother. As for my father, he is aged, he is desolate, and bereaved of a sonne; hee will have more care to looke to his owne person, than mind to revenge the death of his sonne. The Romanes, they will rejoyce, they will approve and mainteine my fact. These be nice points, and these be ticklish and doubtfull hopes, but beleve me father, they are not altogether vaine and frivolous. For thus stands the case, and this is the sum of all: Well may you preserve me out of danger, now whiles I am alive, by inflicting punishment upon those who take weapon in hand to kill me; but let their enterprise speed once, and take effect, you shall never be able to pursue them to the purpose and revenge my death.

When Persus had made an end of his speech, they that were present in place cast their eyes wistly upon Demetrius, as if he would have made answer immediately, and so were all silent a long time, and said not a word; for they perceived evidently that hee could not for weeping open his mouth: but in the end hee was urged by them to speake, and then after that necessity had summounded his griefe, thus hee began, My father, all those meanes of helpe which were ever wont to serve the defendant in good speed, I am prevented and disappointed of, by the plaintive my accuser. By those false and fained teares of his, wrung out and shed to worke the ruine and undoing of another, he hath made my true tears suspected, which gushing out of mine eyes, proceed from a melting and wounded heart within. And whereas himselfe hath not ceased, (ever since that I returned from Rome) to practise secretly with his consorts and complices both night and day to lay wait for my life, now he begins first with me, and will needs put upon me the visor, and have the world beleve that I play the part not onely of a secret and cunning wait-laiier, but of an open theefe and a notorious murderer and cut-throate. Hee seemeth to fright you with his owne daunger, that he might make even you the very meanes and instrument to hasten forward the death of his innocent brother. He saith that he hath no place of refuge in the whole world: to the end that I might have no part at all of hope left, so much as in you. Thus circumvented as I am, left alone, forlorn, destitute and void of all succour, he chargeth me with

The creation of Demetrius in his owne defense, before his father.

with being in favour and grace with forraigne strangers; a thing ywis, that doth mee more harme G than good. Moreover, see how he proceedeth like a practised and cunning barrister, in that hee inserteth and minglith the last nights worke together with the blame of my former life; to the end that he might make more suspicious by the course of mine other yeeres passed, this criminous matter also (the simple truth whereof you shall know anon) and withall confirme and mainteine this vain surmise and slander, of my hopes, my will, & intended designs, by this subtle invention of his, by the fained & forged fable I say of that which was pretended the night that was. He hath not failed moreover to make you beleieve that this accusation of his was not premeditate and studied upon beforehand, but framed ex tempore, and occasioned only upon the suddaine fright and trouble overnight. But in good faith, Perseus, if I had been a traitour to the king my father and the realme, if I had complotted with the Romanes and other of my fathers enemies, me thinks H you should not have waited for this nights devised fable, but you ought to have accused me before this time, of treason. And if that imputation were vaine and frivolous without this surmise, and served to discover & bewray your envie & spight which you bear against me, more than it de-tecteth any crime which is in me; yet you should have let me alone & forborne this day, or put it off untill another time; that it might have beene cleerely seene whether of us twaine laid wait for the other, you or I, upon a strange and extraordinarie manner of hatred. As for me (so far forth as I possible can, in this suddaine trouble of my spirits) I will endeavour to speake severally of each point, which you have heaped up together so disorderly, and reveale I will the ambushes & trains of this night, yours or mine, fall out as it shall. He would have it thought that I practised to kill him, for this intent forsooth, that when mine elder brother were once made away, unto whom I the inheritance of the crowne appertained by the law of nations, by the custome of the Macedonians, and also, as he saith, by your judgement, I the younger might step into his place, and succeed him whom I had killed. What meaneth then, and wherto serveth that other part of his Oration, wherein he saith, that I have been so respective to the Romanes, and that upon the affiance that I have in them, I hoped to be king? For if I were perswaded thus of the Romanes, that they could set up whom they pleased to be king of Macedonie, and if withall I presumed so much of their good grace and favor to me ward, what need had I then to commit a parricide? Was it because I had a mind to weare a diademe embrued with my brothers blood by mee murdered? and was I desirous to make my selfe odious and execrable among them, with whom either for mine honestie indeed, or at leastwaies for a counterfeit shew thereof, I have woon some credit, such as it is, if haply it be anie at all? Vnlesse perhaps, you thinke that T. Quintius (by whose vertue and counsell, you reproch mee that I am ruled) advised mee to kill my brother, Quintius, I say, who is so kind unto his owne brother, and liveth with him so lovingly. This plaintife and accuser of mine, hath collected not onely the affection of the Romans which they beare unto mee, but also the opinion which the Macedonians have of mee, yea, and in manner the consent of all gods and men in my behalfe; in which regards all, hee tooke himselfe not able to match mee in this quarrell and difference about the kingdome: and yet see, how the same man laith to my charge, that as if I were in all other respects inferiour unto him, I was faine to have recourse to this last shift of practising mischeefe and wickednesse. Will you have this to be the case? Will you bee content to joine issue in this point? That whether of us twaine L feared the other to bee reputed worthier of the kingdome, hee should be judged and conden-ned to have sought and contrived the death of his brother? But let us discusse and examine in some sort or other, the order and manner of this pretended and devised crime. Hee hath burdened me, that I have laid for him many and sundrie waies; yet hath hee knit up all these meanes and couched them together in one daies worke. I purposed to kill him (saith hee) in the open day-light, after the solempne review and affoiling of the armie, even when wee jousted together, and seemed to charge one another in battell-wise: yea upon the very day (God hee knoweth) of the said solempnie. I intended ywis (beleieve him if you will) when I invited him to supper, to make him away with a cup of poison. I would have stabbed him (what els?) or run him through with my sword, when I came to banquet with him, & was accompanied with some of my train armed and having weapons about them. You see, father, what proper and choise opportunities I had picked out to commit this pretended murder; namely, the very day of disports, the time of supper, of banquet and collation. As for the day, let us examine it and the maner thereof: was it any other than that, wherein the armie was surveied and solempnely purged? when betweene

A betweene a sacrifice cut in twaine, the royall coats of all the armes of Macedonian kings that ever had beene, were carried aloft in a stately shew; and wee alone your two sonnes (father) G marched on either side of you before the rest, and the whole Macedonian armie followed after. When I was thus cleansed and purified by this expiatorie sacrifice (if haply I had committed any sinne before that deserved expiation) and especially at the very same instant when I beheld before mine eyes (on either side of the way) the parcels of the beast sacrifici-ced: entertained I then in my thoughts the practise of poison, and the handling of swords prepared aforehand against the banquet, to performe a parricide: that afterwards I might with some other sacrifices expiat and cleanse my conscience thus stained and defiled with all kind of wickednesse? A like matter surely. But a spirit corrupt and blinded with the humour of slaunders B another, upon a desire to gather matter and make all suspicious, careth not to huddle one thing upon another confusedly. For if I meant to have poisoned you at supper, what was there more unfit to set forward that designement, than to provoke you to anger, by running so eagerly upon you and fighting with you so toughlie, that thereby you might take good and just occasion (as you did) to refuse being requested, for to come to supper? And when in your choller you had once denied to suppe with me, was it not the next way for me then, to endeavour how to appease you, and seeke some other opportunitie and occasion, since I had prepared the poison for that present only? But I must leape straightwaies from that designment to another, even to the killing of you by the sword, & that upon the very same day, under a pretence of banquetting with you? If I thought that for feare of death you forbore my table at supper time, how comes it that C I imagined not seembly, that for the said feare you would avoid my companie at banquet after supper? There is no cause why I should be ashamed and blush, Father; if upon such a fest:vall day as it was I dranke wine liberally, and tooke perhaps a cup too much among my companions.
 Nay I would it might please your majestie to enquire with what mirth, pastime, and merriment I feasted yesterday at home in my house, and this joy (undecent happily you will say and unseemely) let us the farther out, because in that skirmish and warlike pastime of lustie youths, our side went not by the worse. But this miserie & unhappie fear upon that our niirth and jollitie, hath well delaied and cooled the wine; spent it hath the strength thereof suming up into our heads: which if it had not come betweene, we as great laiers await as we were, had to this houre lien fast and found asleep in our beds. Well, if I had minded to assaile and force your house, and that done, to D murder you the master thereof, would I not think you, have for born for my part one day to bib & quaffe wine so freely? and likewise kept my soldiours from drinking drunke? But because I should not alone plead my simplicitie and make my excuse thereby, this my good brother also, who God wot is none of these naughtie and suspicious creatures, comes in with his vie and faith, I know nothing, I charge no bodie, neither wot I what to say els, but that they came armed to banquet with me. If I might be so bold as to aske how you came to that knowledge, you cannot chuse but confesse that either my house was full of your spies, or those armed men of my traine tooke their weapons so openly, that everie one saw them. And because hee would have you believe of father, that neither himselfe made any enquire before, nor at this time pursueth the matter with any accusatorie spirit, he willed you to demand of them whom he named, whether they E had not their swords about them? to the end that after you had sought into it as a matter doubtfull, and found them to confesse it, they might thereby be held convicted. But why rather will you not, that examination should bee taken in this manner; whether they tooke their swords with them to kill you or no? And whether they did so by my warrant, direction, and privity? For this is it that you (brother) would make the world believe, this is it which you would have to appeare, and not that which my men confesse. But the case is plain and evident, yea, and they will bee knowne no other, than that they were armed in their owne defence. Whether it were well or ill done, they are of age to make account and render a reason of their doings. Doe not you mingle my cause with that action of theirs, which interesteth it nothing at all. But rather declare and make it plaine, whether we meant to assaile you openly or secretly? If openly, why F were we not all armed? why was there none of us besides those persons that did beat your spie?
 If secretly, what was the train and order of the execution of that designe? After the banquet ended, & I the setter of the banquet retired from thence, should those four have staid behind to salu-on you when you were asleep? How could they have caried it so close as not to be spied (strangers as they were & my men besides, & above all other most suspected) for that a litle before, they had been

been seen in a brant? And say, they had killed you by what means could they escape & save themselves? Was it possible that your house should be forced & kept with four swords? Fie, fie Perseus, speak no more for shame of this night, but come again to that rather which galleth you at the heart, which kindleth your envie, and setteth you on fire. How cometh it to passe, O Demetrius, that men speake abroad that you shall be king? why should you be deemed of some more worthy than my selfe, to succeed the roiall estate of my father? How is it that I am in doubt and feare of my hope, which, but for you, were sure and certaine? These are the secret thoughts of Perseus, although he saith nothing: these make him of a brother to become an enemy: these cause him to be mine accuser: these conceits they be that fill your pallace, your court, and your realme, with surmises, slanders, and suspicions. But for mine owne part, father, like as I ought neither to hope for your roiall crowne, nor at any time peradventure, to make words and dispute about it; because I am the younger, and because it is your will and pleasure, that I should give place unto mine elder brother: so, it became me not heretofore, neither doth it become me yet, to demeane and carrie my selfe so in any action, that I should seeme unworthie to have you for my father, but to bee capable of all dignities whatsoever. The one point I should attain unto by indirect courses and wicked vices, in not yeelding unto him, as right and reason would: but the other, by my good carriage and sober behaviour. You reproach me with the Romans, brother; & those things which in right ought to turne to my praise & glorie, you blame & reprove me for. It was no seeking of mine, that I was delivered to the Romans as an hostage, or sent to Rome as embassadour: but when I was appointed by you, father, I refused not to goe. At both times, such was my dealing & demeanour, that I had an eye still and good regard, not to discredit either your highnesse, or your kingdom, or the Macedonian nation. And therefore you were the cause, father, of that amitie and friendship which I have with the Romans. As long as you and they are at peace, I shall be well affected to them: begin warre once; I that was an hostage and embassadour among them, and (though I say it) not unprofitable for you my father, even I, will become a most spitefull and mortall enemy unto them. Neither doe I at this day require, that the favour I have among the Romans might steepe mee any way; onely I beseech you, that it may not prejudice and harme me. It began not by occasion of warre, neither is it reserved for the time of warre. For assurance of peace, I was a pledge and hostage: for maintenance of peace, I was employed in embassage. Content will I be, by the one and the other, in case I neither purchase fame nor incur blame. If I have committed any impiecie against you, father, if I have done or designed any wicked part against my brother, I refuse no punishment, I crave no pardon or favor. If I be innocent, I desire only and humbly beseech your grace, that I be not overweighed with the heave load of envie and ill will, since I can be overthrowne by no crime justly objected unto me. This is not the first day, that my brother hath accused me: but this is the first day, that he is seene to be my accuser: and full little have I deserved it at his hands. If my father had bene displeased and angry with me, I would have thought that you of all others, being the elder brother, should have bene a mediatour and intercessor for mee (the younger) to my father, and a meanes to purchase a pardon for my follie & the error of tender youth: but see! where my succour and refuge should have bene, there contrariwise is my ruine & overthrow. From my feasting and banquetting, from my mirth and good cheere, by his means have I bene haled hither not halfe waked, but with mine eyes full of sleepe, to answer in the case of particide: & forced I am to plead mine own cause without my counsell, without my proctor or advocate. If I had bene to speak in the defence of another, I would have taken time to studie, premeditate & frame an oration. And yet, what was I to hazard there, but the reputation of wit and learning. Instead thereof I, not knowing for what cause I was sent for, heard your majesty first (with wrath and angry as you were) to command us to plead our causes: & then my brother, who hath stood up to accuse me. As for him, he hath pronounced an Oration studied for, & devised long before hand: but I was allowed no longer time (than whiles I heard my selfe accused) to bethinke mee what to plead, or to examine & take knowledge of the matter that he hath laid forth against me. In that present moment of time, could I, thinke you (so suddenly taken as I was) either give eare to my accuser, or consider & thinke duly of mine own plea? stoned so I was, with that sodain trouble & unexpected occurrent, that much ado I had, to understand what I was charged with: so far was I from devising what to speake in mine own defence, What hope should I have now? and in what case were I, if I had not my father for my judge? at whose hands (albeit I am not so well beloved as mine elder brother is, yet since I am the partie defendant, I ought at leastwise to find as much pittie and compassion. For I beseech you (O father) to save mee, in regard of my selfe and you: but he requireth you to take away my life, onely for his own assurance and better securitie. And what will hee do against me thinke you, after you have made over the crowne & scepter into his hands; who now already thinketh it meet and reason, to dispose of my blood at his good pleasure? In uttering of these words, the teares gushed forth so abundantly, that they stopped his mouth so, as uneth hee could either speake or draw his breath. Then Philip after hee had commaunded them to go apart, and communed a while with his friends, spake & said, That he wold not decide their cause upon these words of theirs, nor upon one hours debating, but by enquire into both their lives, and observing their behaviour in deed and word, as well in great matters as in small. Hereby they all saw well enough, that the accusation of the precedent nights act, was sufficiently refuted and evicted, and the only thing in Demetrius to be suspected, was the over-great favour that the Romans bare toward him. This was the verie seed of the Macedonian warre, sowed as one would say, during the life of Philip, but the warre was after to be waged most of all against Perseus.

The two Consuls tooke their jurnie into Liguria, the sole consular province of them both; and because they had atchieved their exploits fortunately there, ordained there was a solemne procession for one day. It fortuned that there came two thousand Ligurians or thereabout, to the utmost frontier of the province of Gaule, where Marcellus lay in league, requesting to bee received under his protection. Marcellus after hee had commaunded the said Ligurians to give attendance upon him in the same place, required by his letters the advise of the Senat. The Senate gave order to M. Ogulnius the lord chiefe justice of the citie, to write backe againe unto Marcellus to this effect; That it was more meete that the Consuls, unto whom that government appertained, should give order and determine (as touching the Ligurians who yeelded and submitted) what was expedient for the common weale in that behalfe, than the Senate. As for them; if they were to give their opinion, they thought it not good to accept of the Ligurians surrender: and being once received, then to be disarmed: but they were of this mind and advise, that it was requisite they should be sent and referred over to the Consuls.

The Pretours at the same time arrived in their provinces, to wit P. Manlius in base Spaine, where he had bene governour before during his former Pretourship; and Q. Fulvius Flaccus in the higher: where he received the armie of Terentius, for that other side of Spaine beyond Iberus, had bene left without a lord Deputie, by occasion of the death of P. Sempronius the Pretour. While Fulvius Flaccus assaulted a towne in Spaine named Vrbicula, the Celtiberians made head and came upon him; where many and sundrie hore skirmishes passed, and wherein many Romane souldiours were both hurt and slaine: Howbeit Fulvius held still his resolution, and by no forcible meanes whatsoever, could be brought to levie the siege. The Celtiberians toiled out of heart with divers combats, retired and departed. The citie then seeing their succours dislodged and gone, within few daies was forced and ransacked; and the Pretour gave the pillage thereof to his souldiours. Thus Fulvius after hee had gained this towne, and P. Manlius, when hee had retired and rallied his forces into one place, which had benee dispersed; without any other memorable act performed, brought their armies within the wintering harbours. And these were the exploits in Spaine, during that summer season. Terentius who was departed out of that province before, entred the citie of Rome in a pettie triumph, by way of ovation. He carried before him in shew, eight thousand three hundred & twentie pound weight of silver, and fourescore of gold: besides two golden coronets weighing 67. pound.

The same yeare the Romans were chosen Arbitratours betwene the people of Carthage and king Masaniissa, as touching their territories: & came personally to see the place in controversy. And thus stood the case: Gala the father of this Masaniissa, had woon the ground in question from the Carthaginians. Syphax afterward disseized Gala thereof: and consequently to gratifie Asdruball, his wives father, freely gave the same to the Carthaginians, and set them in possession again. Now last of al, even this very yeare, Masaniissa had dispossessed the Carthaginians of the same. This matter was debated by the parties of both sides in the presence of the Romans, with no lesse courage and fervencie of spirit, than at other times when they tried the issue by dint of sword in open field. The Carthaginians laid claime and put in their plea, For that first it appertained to their ancestors in right of inheritance, & afterwards was conveyed to them by the free free gift and donation of Syphax. Masanissa counterpleaded againe and alledged, that hee had both recovered the said territorie, as parcell of his fathers realme, and also held it by the law of nations: and that the case was cleere on his side, in regard as well of the just title as also of the present possession wherein he was; saying, that in this cause he doubted nothing else but that the modestie of the Romans should prejudice him, for feare least they might be thought to be partiall in the cause and respect to him, a king their allie and good friend, and in favour of him to give up their award against the common enemies both to him and them. The commissioners and arbitrators would not infringe and alienate the right of possession, but left all as they found it, and referred the entire decision of the matter to the Senat of Rome.

Nothing was there done after this, in Liguria: for first, the enemies were retired for safetie into their wilds and Forrests out of the way; and afterwards they cased their armie, and slept away everie man to their owne villages and castles. The Consuls likewise were willing to break up and dismisse their forces; and thereupon sent to the LL. of the Senat to know their pleasure in that point: who advised the one of them to discharge his owne regiments, and to retire to Rome for the election of magistrates the next yeere: and the other, with his legions to winter at Pisa. A tumult there ran, that the Transalpine French put their youth and serviceable men in armes: but it was not known what quarter of Italie this multitude thus leaved, would invade. But the Consuls thus agreed together, that Cn. Babius should be present at the generall assembly at Rome, for the election aforesaid, because M. Babius his brother sued to be Consull. Then was the assembly holden for the creation of Consuls, and elected there were, P. Cornelius Lentulus; and M. Babius Tamphilus. This done, the Pretours also were chosen, namely the two Quintij Fabij, the one Maximus, and the other Buteo; T. Claudius Nero, Q. Petilius Spurinus, M. Pinarius Posa, and L. Duronius. When these were entered into their magistracie, the provinces were by lot after this manner disposed. The Ligurians fell to the Consuls: as for the Pretours, Q. Petilius was lord chiefe Iustice for the citizens pleas, and Q. Fabius Maximus for the strangers: Q. Fabius Buteo had the government of Gaule, T. Claudius Nero of Sicilia, M. Pinarius of Sardinia, L. Duronius of Apulia together with the Istrians; for that the Tarentines and Brundusines had given intelligence, that the sea-coasts were much troubled and annoied by the robberies of pirats and men of war from beyond-sea: and the like complaints were made by the Massilians, of the Ligurian navie. For these causes order was given, and warrants went out for to levie armies: that the Consuls should have four legions betweene them, conteining in every one 5200 Romane footmen and 300 horse: also to enroll 15000 footmen and eight hundred horsemen of Latine allies. In the provinces of Spaine (both the one and the other) the old Pretours continued still in their government, with the charge of those armies which they had already: and for a supplement to reinforce and make up their broken companies, there were appointed three thousand foot and two hundred horse of Romane citizens, together with sixe thousand of the one and three hundred of the other, from out of the Latine nation. All this while they forgot not their navie at sea. And the Consuls had in charge to chuse for that purpose, two wardens called Duumvirs, who after they had out of the Arsenall shov into the sea twentie ships, and set them afloat, should furnish them with mariners, and those Romane citizens, such as had been slaves and were enfranchised: and that naturall Romanes free-borne, should onely be captaines and have the conduct of the said vessels. These two Duumvirs so parted and ordered betwixt them the defense of the maritime coasts, with ten ships apiece; that the cape of Minerva should be as it were the middle point and marke between them: so as the one should guard that part on the right hand as far as to Massilia; and the other the left side, even to Barium.

This yeere were seene at Rome and reported from forrein parts many uncouth and strange prodigies. In the church-yards belonging to Vulcan and Concordia, it rained sheere blood: and the bishops made relation, that the speares [of Mars] shooke and mooved of their owne accord. Also at Lanuvium the image of Iuno Sospita shed tears. Moreover, the plague reigned so hote in the countrey villages, market townes, marts and places of frequent resort, yea and within the city of Rome, that they were not able to furnish the funerals accordingly & enterre the dead. The LL. of the Senat, being in great anguish and trouble, in regard of those fearefull tokens and the losse of their people, ordained, That as well the Consull should kill greater beasts for sacrifice unto what gods they thought good, as also the Decemvirs should visit and peruse the propheticall bookes of Sibylla. And by vertue of their decree, there was a publick supplication proclaimed

A proclaimed at Rome for one whole day, at all the altars and shrines of the gods and goddesses. By their counsell also and direction, both the Senate advised and the Consuls also published throughout all Italie for three daies space, solemne litanies and devout holydaies. The rage of this pestilence was so great, that whereas there passed an act by the Senate to enroll 8000 footmen and three hundred horse from out of the Latines (in regard that the Ilanders of Corsica were revolted and the Iolians up in arms within Sardinia) with which power M. Pinarius the Pretour was to saile over into Sardinia: the Consuls made report againe unto them, that such numbers of people were dead already, and so many lay sicke, that it was not possible to levie that proportion of fighting men. So the Pretour had commission to furnish out that defect of soldiers, with a supply which he was to receive of Cn. Babius the Proconsull, who then wintered at Pisa; and from thence directly to take the seas and passe over into Sardinia.

B L. Duronius the Pretour (unto whome the province of Apulia was allotted) had a commission besides to make inquisition for the Bacchanals; for there remained yet some seedes of the former enormities, which began already the former yeere to sprout and bud forth. But L. Pappus the Pretour last yeere, had entred into the enquire and search of the matter, rather than effected ought and brought it to a final end: and therefore the LL. gave order to this new Pretour to cut off this mischief in the spring and breeding thereof, before it gat more head a second time, and upon growth spread farther. Moreover, the Consuls by the advice and authoritie of the Senat, preferred certaine lawes unto the people, as touching the inordinate suite and ambitious seeking after offices of government. After all this, they brought into the Senat the forcine embassages; and gave audience first to them that came from the KK. to wit, Eumenes, Antiochus the Cappadocian, and Pharnaces of Pontus. But no other dispatch and answer they had than this, That they would send certaine Delegates and commissioners, to heare, decide, and determine their controversies. After them, the Embassadors of the Lacedæmonian exiles, and of the Achæans, were admitted into the Senat house. The banished persons aforesaid were put in some good hope, that the Senat would write their letters to the Achæans, for their restitution. The Achæans declared as touching the recoverie of Messene and the pacification of all troubles there, with the great contentment of the LL. of the Senat. There arrived moreover two Embassadors from Philip king of the Macedonians, namely Philacles and Apelles, about no suit that they had to the Senat, but sent rather as spies to under-prie and to learne somewhat as touching those points that Perseus had charged Demetrius with, and namely, of certaine speeches that he should have with the Romanes, and especially with T. Quintius, against his brother about succession in the kingdome. These twaine were chosen by the king as indifferent persons, and nothing affectionate either to the one brother or the other: howbeit they were the ministers, consorts, and complices of Perseus, in his intended mischievous plot against his brother. Demetrius (as one ignorant of all designments against him, but onely of the late wicked pranke of Perseus which last brake out) at the first, was neither in great hope, nor yet in utter despaire, to be reconciled unto his father. But afterwards, he had lesse confidence every day than other in the good affection of his father toward him, seeing his brother continually to buzz into his eares many matters, and possesse his head with tales against him. And therefore hee looked circumspectly about him that he trode not awrie, and namely, that hee let no words fall, or did anything that might be offensive and breed more jealousy; and above all, hee wholly forbore conference and commerce with the Romanes; in such sort, that he would not have them so much as to write any letters unto him: knowing full well, that his fathers heart would be exasperated against him, by such imputations and informations especially.

Philip, because he would provide that his soldiors & men of action should not pair & wax worfe through idleness & disuse of arms, & that under one he might avert from himself al suspicion that he intended any war against the Romanes, appointed the cittie Stobi for the Rendezvous of his armie, & marched into the quarters of Mædica. A great desire he had, to mount up the crest and top of the hill Æmus, because there was an opinion commonly received, & which he had given credit unto, that from thence a man might discover within one prospect, the Porrick & Adriatick seas, the river Arno also and the Alpes: for thus he thought, that the view of these places would stand him in no small stead in projecting and plotting the war against the Romanes. When after diligent inquirie of them that knew those quarters well, as touching the ascent of that mountaine, he had learned and found it cleere and certaine, that there was no way at all for to conduct an armie thither, and that a few men, and those deliver & lightly appointed, should find ynough G to doe and exceeding much difficultie to passe, he taketh his younger sonne apart, whom hee was resolved not to have with him in that expedition; and because he would seeme to dulce and mollifie his discontented mind with some familiar and private speech, first hee demaunded of him, considering so great difficulties of the journey presented unto them, whether hee were better to hold on the way still and follow his designe, or give over? But if I should goe forward (qd. he) I cannot forget that which befell to Antigonus in the like case, who beinge upon a time much tossed at sea in a boisterous tempest, and having with him in the same ship all those that were of his bloud, is reported to have given this good advertisement and lesson to his children, that they should alwaies remember, & also give their posteritie warning, never to venture al their goods in one bottome, nor to engage themselves together with their whole race & off-spring in any perill and danger. Remembring therfore (qd. he) this good precept & counsell of his, I will not hazard both my sons at once in this present jeoparddie which I see before mine eyes: but for as much as I propole to take mine elder son with me, I will send my yonger backe into Macedonie, for to uphold & maintain the hope of my posterity, & for the defence of my kingdome in the mean while. Demetrius found him streight, & wist wel ynough that he was sent away for no other intent but that he should not be present in counsel, when upon the view of those places above said, he was to devise & consult in what coast lay the neereft and shortest way to the Adriatick sea and to Italie, and what course they should plot for the management of the warre. But there was no remedie; he must not onely then obey his father, but also sooth him up and seeme to approve and like well of that which hee said, for feare least it might bee thought, that it went against his stomacke to yeeld obedience unto him, and so bee held in more jelousie and suspition than before. Howbeit, to the end that he might passe into Macedonie with safety, Didas one of the kings Deputies and L. governor under him of Pæonia, was commanded to accompanie and conduct him with a meane guard and convoy. Now was this Didas one of those conspiratours that had sworne the death of Demetrius; whom Persius had made sure to his part, like as he had many other of his fathers friends, ever since that men began to make no doubt, unto whom Philip in affection was enclined, and whom he meant to make the heire apparent of the crowne. And at this verie instant Persius had charged him and given him instructions, by all obsequious services to inflame and wind him selfe into most familiar talke, and to come so neere within him, that he might draw from him all his secrets, and discover the very inward and hidden thoughts of his heart. K Thus departed Demetrius attended with a traine about him more dangerous to his person, than if he had travelled alone without any companie. Philip first passed through Mædica, and then forward over the deserts lying betwene Mædica and Æmus, and at the seventh daies gisse was come as farre as to the foot of the mountaine. Where after hee had rested and staid one day, to make choise of those whom he minded to take up with him; the morrow after he set forth and put him selfe in his way. At the first, the labour was not great, nor the paines much to overcome the nethermost hills; but the farther they went and the higher that they advanced, the more wild and woodie still they found everie place; yea, and they met with many that had no passage at all. At length they were mounted to a passe or way so shadowed and darke, that for the trees standing so thicke together, and their boughes plaited and interlaced one within another, un-neth or hardly could a man see the skie through them. But when they approached once the pitch and crest of the mountaine, behold (a thing not lightly seene in other parts) they light upon so grosse and thicke a mist, which overspread and covered all, that they had as much ado to march forward, as if they had travelled in the darke and mirke night. At last by the third daies end, they gained the verie top of the mountaine. Now when they were come downe from thence againe, they made no lesse report thereof than the common opinion was that went of it; which I be-leeve verily they did of purpose, because they would not bee mocked and scorned for this their foolish and vaine voiage, rather than for that they could indeed within the same prospect and from one place, view seas, mountaines, and rivers, situate and distant so farre asunder. Much moi-led they were all, and sore toiled in this untoward way; but the king above the rest, by reason that he was farr step in age, and unwelddie of bodie. Vvell, after hee had done sacrifice there upon two altars consecrated to Iupiter and the Sunne, he descended in two daies, whereas he had made three of it in ascending; and that which hee feared most, was the cold nights, which there in the beginning of the dog-daies were like to those of midwinter in other places. Many difficulties he wrestled

A wrestled and strove withall during those daies, & being returned into his camp, he found no better. Nothing was there but extreame want and penurie, as being pitched in a place compassed about on everie side with deserts and wildernesse. And therefore when hee had staid there but one only day to rest & repose his men, whom he had taken with him in that journey, he hastened away, and in a running march, as if hee had fled in rout, entered the countrey of the Dentheletes.
These Dentheletes were his owne confederat allies, but the Macedonians (such was their need & necessitie) pilld and spoiled their confines, no lesse than if they had ben professed enemies. For first they wasted and destroyed their holts, graunges, and farme houses, afterwards certaine wicks and villages also, robbing and rifling as they went, to the great dishonour of the king; who could not chuse but heare the pittieous complaints and mones of his associates, crying to the gods, patrones of alliances, and calling upon his name for helpe, but could have no meed and remedie.
B When he was purveyed of corne from thence, and returned into the countrey Mædica, he began to assaile a citie which they call Petra. Him selfe in person lay encamped in the avenue and readie way upon the plaines, but hee sent his sonne Persius with a small companie to fetch a compasse and give the assault from the higher places that commaunded the towne. The townemen thus hard bested with terror on every side, for the present yeelded upon composition, and gave hostages; but after the armie was retired, they forgetting their pledges, abandoned the citie, and fled for refuge into certaine forts, fenced places, & high mountains. Philip having wearied his soldi-ours with all manner of travell to no effect, and withall entertained more jelousie and suspition of his sonne Demetrius, by the leaud practise and false suggestions of Didas (the governour of Pæ-onia) returned into Macedonie. This Didas (as hath been said before) sent to conduct Demetrius home, abused the simplicitie of the young gentleman, who was nothing circumspect and warie, but seemed discontented and complained to him (as good cause hee had) of those that were nee-rest in nature and bloud unto him; he, I say, by flattering, by soothing him up, and seeming withal to bee offended and grieved for his part at such hard usage, laid snares and grinnings, & set traps for him; and in conclusion, by his double diligence, and offering his voluntarie service to doe him pleasure, protesting also to be true and fast unto him, yea, and to keepe his counsell, fetched out of him the very secrets of his heart. Now had Demetrius a purpose with him selfe to flie to Rome, and to effectuate this designement of his, hee was persuaded, that of a speciall grace and favour the gods had sent and offered unto him this Didas the Pretour of Pæonia to be his helper and assistant; for through his province he conceived some hope to passe and escape with securitie. This intent and plot of his was both immediately disclosed to his brother Persius, and also by him declared to his father. And first were letters hereof brought unto him, whiles he lay at the siege of Petra. Afterwards Herodorus (the principal friend that Demetrius had) was committed to ward, and withall, order was taken to watch and observe Demetrius that he started not aside; but all underhand and close, without semblance of any such matter. These occurrences above all others, caused the king to have a dolorous and heavie returne into Macedonie. These new accusations thus presented, troubled him much: howbeit hee thought good to expect the returne of those whom he had sent to Rome as spies to heare all and find out the truth. In the anguish and agonie of these cares and perplexities, when the king had continued certaine months, in the end those embassadours came home; who at first ere they set foot out of Macedonie, had devised and framed before hand what reports they would make from Rome. These messengers, to make up the full measure of all their wicked and divellish practises, delivered also into the kings hand a false and forged letter, sealed with a counterfeit signet of T. Quintius. The said letter was endited to this tenour and effect, That Quintius should seeme for his owne excuse to say, that albeit young Demetrius, caried away with an inordinat desire to be king, had slipped a little, & treated with him about some such matter, yet would he doe nothing to prejudice any one about K. Philip, neither would he be thought or found a man, to give any ungodly and ungracious counsel. These letters struck it dead sure, and made the king beleeve, that all the former imputations fastened upon Demetrius were true & past al peradventure. Whereupon Herodorus presently was put to the rack and examined, but after he had endured intollerable paines a long time, & confessed nothing, he died in the end under the tormentors hand. Persius accused Demetrius againe before his father, for that he entended and provided to take his flight through Pæonia. And there came forth certain to testifie against him, saying, that hee had corrupted, inveigled, and enduced them to accom-panie him in that journey. But that which made most of all against him, was that same devised letter of T. Quintius. Howbeit there was no greivous sentence pronounced openly against him, G to the end, that rather by some covert and cautelous practise, hee might come to his death: and this, not for any feare that hee had of him, but doubting least some ouvert punishment executed upon him, might reveale and discover his secret designment, of making war upon the Romanes.

murdered.*

Philip himselfe taking his journie from Theffalonica to come to Demetrius, sent Demetrius his sonne to Æstreum, a citie in Pæonia, and the same Didas still to accompanie him: but Perseus he addressed to Amphipolis, for to receive the hostages of the Thracians. Now it is reported, that when Didas tooke his leave of him and departed, the king gave him in charge to kill his sonne Demetrius. Didas then, either purposing indeed or making semblance to sacrifice, invited Demetrius to the celebration and feast thereof, whereupon he came from Æstreum to Heraclea. And (as men say) at this supper he met with a cup of poyson. He had no sooner drunke it, but immediately hee felt that hee was sped; for within a while it began to worke extremely, and for very dolour and paine, he was forced to rise from the table and retire into his bed-chamber: where hee pitiously complained of the hard heart and cruelty of his father, of the murderous mind of the parricide his brother, and of the trecherous vilanie of Didas: and all this while endured deadly wrings and torments in his bellie. But afterwards there were sent into the chamber, one Thyrhis a Stuberæan, & Alexander of Berthæa, who enwrapped his head and throat with the bed-cloathes, carpets and counterpoints of tapistrie, and held them so hard, that they throttled & smothered him, and in the end stopped his breath that he died. Thus was this poore innocent young man piteously made away; whose enemies one single kind of death could not content and satisfie, but needs they must kill and murder him twife.

Whiles these things hapned in Macedonie, L. Æmylius Paulus, who continued still in government after his Consulship expired, marched with his armie against the Ligurians Ingaunes in the beginning of the spring. So soone as he was entred into the confines of his enemies cuntry, and there encamped, there came Embassadours unto him under colour of seeking peace, but in deed onely to eskout and spie. Paulus made them aunswere, That hee could contract no accord with them, unlesse they yeilded first: which they seemed not so much to refuse, but said, That they needed some time to persuaide their nation unto it, being a rude and uncivil kind of people. And when they had ten daies truce allowed to effect this, they requested moreover, that the Romane souldiours might not passe over the next hills adjoyning, either for K. Jewell or forage, for as much as those lands were the onely tilled and well manured grounds of their appertinances and territorie. When they had obtained so much, they assembled all their forces on that side of the hills, from whence they had averted the enemies, and suddainly with a mightie multitude charged upon the Romane campe, and assailed all the avenues and gates thereof at once. With all forcible meanes they continued the assault in such sort, as the Romans had not so much as either time enough to set forth and display their ensignes, or roume sufficient to put their armie in order of battaile: but were compelled to defend their campe more by standing thick thronged together against the enemies in the very gates, than otherwise by hardie fighting. But about the going downe of the sunne, when the enemies were retired, Paulus dispatched two light horsemen with letters to M. Babius the Consul, as farre as Pisæ, that hee should come away with all speed to succour him, being in time of truce besieged. But Babius had delivered up his armie before to M. Pinarius the Pretour, as hee went into Sardinia. Howbeit he both certified the Senat by his letters, that L. Æmylius was invetted by the Ligurians, and he wrote also to M. Cl. Marcellus, whose province was next adjoyning, to bring over his forces (if he thought so good) out of Gaule into Liguria, and deliver L. Æmylius from siege. But alas, these succours should have come all too late: for the Ligurians the very next day returned and advanced against the campe. Æmylius albeit he not onely knew that they would come, but also might have brought his power forth into the field and ranged them in array, yet he kept himselfe so close within the strength of his rampiar, minding to hold off and not to fight, untill Babius might with his armie come from Pisæ. Now the letters of Babius caused great fear at Rome: M. and so much the more, for that Marcellus being returned to the citie, some few daies after he had made over his armie unto Fabius, put them out of all hope, that the armie which was in France, could not possibly passe into Liguria, by reason of the war with the Istrians, who impeached the planting of the colonie at Aquileia; against whom Fabius was gone, & might not possibly retire

A tire from thence, now that the warre was once begun. The onely hope they had therefore of aiding Æmylius was this, (and yet the same seemed to bee with the latest, considering the urgent necessitie of the time) in case the Consuls made hast to goe into their provinces: which to doe, all the LL. of the Senat called aloud and earnestly unto them. But the Consuls denied flatly to sturre one foot, before the levie of souldiours was fully finished; alleging that it was not their slacknesse, but the violence of the plague, which caused it to bee so late ere it were performed. Yet for all this, such was the general accord and consent of the Senat, that they could neither will nor chuse but go forth of the citie in their rich coates of armes, and by proclamation to assigne a certaine day, upon which all the souldiours whom they had enrolled should shew at Pisæ: and B commission they had to take up subitarie souldiers, all the cuntry over as they went, to prest them forth presently and have them away. Moreover the Pretours, Q. Petilius and Q. Fabius were both of them commaunded, the one, namely Petilius, to enrol in hast two tumultuarie legions of Romane citizens, and tender the militarie oth to all that were not above fiftie yeeres old: and Fabius, to levie of the Latine allies, fiftene thousand foot, & eight hundred horsemen. The two Duumvirs or Wardens for the navie and the ports were created, namely C. Matienus and C. Lucretius: who were soone provided of ships readie rigged, trimmed and furnished to their hands. And Matienus, who had the charge of the coasts upon the gulfes of Gaule, was commaunded to bring his fleet with all speed possible along, to the tract of the Ligurians, if happily he might any way steed L. Æmylius and his armie. Æmylius after he perceived that no aid appeared from any place, supposing verily that the two horsemen above-said, were intercepted and staid by the way, thought good to put off no longer, but alone with his owne forces to C trie the fortune of a fight. And thereupon before the enemies came (who now already began more coldly and heavily to assaile them than before) hee put his men in battaile array at the foure gates of the campe, to the end that upon the signall given, they should at once from all parts fallie forth. To the foure extraordinarie cohorts, hee adjoynd two other, under the conduct of M. Valerius a Lieutenant, & commaunded them to breake forth at the false porterne gate called Extraordinaria: within the gate Principalis on the right hand, he embattailed the Hastari or Javeliniers of the first legion, & the Principes of the same legion in the arriere guard to second them, commaunded both by M. Servilius & L. Sulpitius, Kn. marshals, or Tribunes militarie. The third legion hee marshalled full against the other gate Principalis on the leit hand. This D change onely was here, for that the Principes were set in the front, and the Hastati behind in the taile of them. Sex, Julius Cesar and L. Aurelius Cotta, two militarie Tribunes had the leading of this legion. Q. Fulvius Flaccus a Lieutenant having the conduct of the right wing, was placed at the gate Quæstoris. Two cohorts and the Triarij of two legions had commaundement to stay behind for the defence of the campe. The Generall himselfe in person rode all about from gate to gate, exhorting and encouraging his men: using all the forcible meanes hee possibly could devise, to provoke and whet the stomackes of his souldiours, and to give a pointant edge to their courage and choler: one while reproching his enemies for their fallhood and treacherie, who having craved peace and obtained truce; during the time of the said truce, against all law of nations were come to assaile the campe: another while shewing and declaring unto them what E shame & indignitie it was for the Roman armie to be besieged by the Ligurians, who more truly may be accounted thieves and robbers, than go for warlike enemies. If (quoth he) you should escape from hence, not by your owne vertue and valour, but through the helpe and succour of others, with what face shall any of you be able to meet, I say, not those souldiours who have vanquished Anniball, defeated Philip, and subdued Antiochus, the mightiest kings and greatest commaunders of our age: but even them who many a time have hunted & chased the very same Ligurians like brute beasts, over the wilds and Forrests as they fled, and hewed them a peeces in the end? That which the Spaniards, that which the Gaules, that which the Macedonians & Carthaginians dare not enterprise, namely to approach and enter upon the rampier of the Roman campe: shall a Ligurian enemy adventure to do? shall he of his owne accord presume to besiege F and assail our camp, whom heretofore when we beat all the blind bushes, by woods, & thickets, to start him out, we had much ado to find, he lay so close and lurked so covertly? At these words the souldiers set up a consonant cry in token of applause, & answered him with a general shout, saying: There was no fault on their part, seeing that no man had given them the signall to yssue forth and make a fallie. For let him once say the word to sound the trumpet, hee should see and find, that both Romanes and Ligurians were the same still, as before-time. G Now the Ligurians kept two campe on the neere side of the mountaines affront the Romane leaguer; from whence (for the first daies so soone as the sun was up) they used to advance their ensignes and march forward, well armed and raunged in battell array: but then, they put no armours upon their backs, nor tooke weapon in hand, before they had filled their bellies well with meat and their nollies with wine: they came forth (I say) dispeared and out of order; as who hoped and trusted assuredly, that the enemies would not march under their ensignes without their rampier. Against them (comming thus in disarray) the Romanes issued forth at once, out of all the gates in one instant with a mightie shout, which not onely they who were within the campe set up, but also the lackies, scullions, launders, and other drudges that follow the campe redoubled. This was such an unlooked for occurrent to the Ligurians, that they were set in as great an affright therewith, as if they had been surprised and beset all about with sodaine ambushments. H For a small while there was some shew of a conflict, such as it was; but anon they tooke their heelles and fled for life; but as they fled, they left their lives behind them in every place. Then the men of armes had the signall given to mount on horsebacke, to pursue them and not suffer one to escape alive: and so in this fearefull rout they were driven to take their campe for safetie: but in the end were diseized and turned out of it also. That day were slaine of the Ligurians not so few as fifteen thousand, and 2500 taken prisoners. Within three daies after, the whole nation of the Ligurian Ingauces, yielded absolutely, and put in their hostages. A search was made for all the pilots and mariners, who had exercised pyracie on the sea, and they were all laid up fast in prison. Semblably C. Matienus one of the Duumvirs or wardens of the navie, met with two and thirtie ships of that sort, belonging to men of warre upon the coast of Liguria, and bounded them. To carie these newes to Rome, and letters to the Senate, L. Aurelius Cotta, and C. Sulpicius Cotta were sent to Rome: who also were to require that L. Aemilius (when his time was expired) might depart out of his province, and bring his souldiours from thence with him, and so discharge them of service. Both these demaunds were graunted by the Senate, and a solemne procession besides was ordeined in all churches and chappels, and at every shrine and altar for three daies space. The Pretors also were commaunded, Petilius, to casse and dismisse the legions of the citie; and Fabius, to remit the Latine allies the levying and mustering of their souldiours.

Also there was order given to the Pretor of the citie, for to write unto the Consuls and give them to understand, that the Senat thought it meet and reason, that the subitarie souldiours (who were enrolled in hast for the sodaine tumult and alarme) should with all speed be licensed to depart. K

The same yeere the colonie of Gravisca was planted in the territorie of Tuscanie, which in times past had been conquered from the Tarquinians; and five acres of land was set out to everie man. The Triumvirs who had the charge thereof to distribute these lands, were C. Calpurnius Piso, P. Claudius Pulcher, and C. Terentius Lysia. A yeere it was of note, in regard of the drought that happened, and the dearth of corn and all other fruits of the earth. For recorded it is, that in six moneths space it never rained one drop.

The same yeere it fortun'd, that as certaine plow-men and labourers plowed and digged somewhat deepe within the ground, in the lands of L. Petilius a secretarie, (which lands lay under the hill Ianiculum) there were found two coffers of stone, each of them about eight foot long and foure foot broad, the lids and covers wherof were bound and foudered with lead. Both these chests had a superscription upon them in Greeke and Latine letters to this effect, That in the one of them lay buried Numa Pompilius the sonne of Pompo, sometime king of Rome: and in the other, were bestowed the bookes of the said Numa. The owner of this ground opened these coffers by the advice and counsell of his friends: and that which carried the title and inscription of the kings sepulture, was found empty, without any shew or token of the reliques of a mans body or any thing els, by reason the bones and all were rotten and consumed, in continuance of time after so many yeers past. In the other were found two fardels, wrapped within waxe candles (or ceare-clothes) containing either of them seven bookes; which were not only whole and sound, but also seemed very fresh and new. One seven of them were written in Latin, as touching the Pontificall law: the other seven in Greeke, entituled, The discipline or doctrine of Philosophie, such as those daies might affoord. Valerius Antias saith moreover, That they were the bookes of Pythagoras; according to the common received opinion of Numa, that he was the disciple of Pythagoras; herein giving credit to a probable lie, resembling a truth. L bookes

A books were first read by those friends of his who were present at the place where the chests were opened; but afterwards as they came into more mens hands to be read, it chanced that Q.
Petilius the lord cheefe justice of the citie, desirous to peruse those bookes, borrowed them of L. Petilius, with whom he was familiarly acquainted, by reason that the abovenamed Quintus Petilius had chosen the foresaid Lucius into the decurie of the Scribes and Secretaries. Who after he had read the titles with the summaries and contents of every chapter, and finding the most part thereof, tending directly to abolish the state of religion then established, said unto L. Petilius, that he purposed to fling those bookes into the fire; but before hee did so, hee would permit him to use what meanes hee thought by order of law or otherwise would serve his turne to recover the said bookes out of his hands, and good leave hee should have to take that course without his displeasure, or any breach of friendship betwene them. The Scribe or notarie aforesaid goeth to the Tribunes for their assistance, the Tribunes put the matter over to the Senat, before whom the Pretour said plainly, That he was readie to take his corporall oth, if he were put to it, that those bookes ought neither to be read nor kept. Whereupon the Senate judged, that for such a matter the offer onely of the Pretors oth was sufficient, and that the bookes should be burned with all speed possible in the open place of assemblies called Comitium: but they awarded withall, that there should bee paid unto Q. Petilius the right owner as much money for the bookes, as the Pretour and the more part of the Tribunes of the Commons esteemed them worth. The Scribe would touch none of the money: but his bookes were burnt in the foresaid place before all the people in a light fire, made by the ordinarie servitours attending upon the C sacrificers.

The same summer there arose suddainly a great warre in higher Spaine. The Celtiberians had gathered a power of five and thirtie thousand men, a number more than lightly at any time before they had levied. Now was Q. Fulvius Flaccus lord Deputie of that province. Hee for his part, because he was advertised that the Celtiberians put their youth in armes, had raised and assembled as great aids of the confederates, as he could, but nothing came hee neere to the ene-mie in numbers of souldiours. In the beginning of the Spring hee led his armie into Carpetania, and encamped before the towne Eburac, after hee had planted a meane garrison within it. A few daies after the Celtiberians pitched their tents within two miles from thence, under a little hill. When the Romane Pretour perceived they were come, he sent his brother D Marcus Fulvius with two companies of the horsemen of allies in espiall, to view the enemies campe, willing him to approach as neere to the trench and rampier as hee could, and to see what compasse the campe tooke, but to forbear skirmish, and in any hand to retire, in case he perceived the Cavallerie of the enemies made out against him. According to this direction, hee did in every respect. And so for certaine daies together, there was nothing done, but onely these two companies of horsemen shewing first, and afterwards retiring backe, so soone as the Cavallerie of the enemies issued out of their campe. At length the Celtiberians also came forth and advanced forward with all their power, as well horse as foot, and having set them in ordnance of battell, staid as it were in the middes betwene. The whole ground was a smooth and even plaine, fit to joyne a battaile in. There stood the Spaniards (I say) expecting their enemies: but the Romane Pretour kept his men within the rampier foure dayes together; and they likewise of the other side held the same place still in battaile array. The Romanes all that while stirred not a foot. The Celtiberians then, seeing the enemies refused fight, held themselves quiet also within their camp: onely the horsemen rid forth, and they kept a corps de guard, to be in rea-dines if peradventure the enemies should be busie & come abroad. Both of the one side and the other, they went out at the back-side of their camp to purvey forage & fewel, and impeached not one another. The Roman Pretor, supposing now, that after so many daies rest, the enemies were borne in hand and hoped fully, that hee would never begin first, commanded L. Atilius to take with him the left wing of the cavallerie, & six thousand of the provincially auxiliaries, and to fetch a compasse about the hill which stood behind the enemies; and from thence, so soone as they heard a crie, to run downe amaine and charge upon their campe. And because they might not be discovered, in the night time they departed. Flaccus the next morning by peepe of day, sent out C. Scribonius (a colonell of the allies) against the enemies campe, with the extraordinarie horsemen of the left wing: whom when the Celtiberians beheld both approaching neere toward them, and also more in number than usually they had bene, they put forth all their Cavallerie at once

once out of the gates: & withall, gave the signal to the Infanterie also to come abroad. Scritonius, G according to the direction given him, so soon as ever he heard the first noise & shour of the horsemen, turned the head of his horse, and retired back full upon the campe: therewith the enemies followed more freely: first the horsemen, and within a while the footmen also, making full account to be masters of the Roman leaguer that day, & verily now were they not past halfe a mile. When Flaccus supposed that they were trained farre enough from their owne camp, for succouring it, he issued forth at once in three places, with his armie arraigned before in order of battell withinforth, and caused them to set up a mightie crie, not onely to animate the souldiours to the combate, but also that their fellows behind the hill might heare it. Who made no stay, but presently ran downe and set upon the enemies camp as they had in charge, where there were left in guard not above five hundred armed men. By reason therefore, that they within were so few, the enemies without so many, and the enterprise so suddaine and unlooked for, they were mightily terrified, and so in manner without any skirmish and resistance at all, their hold was forced and woon. Acilius set on fire that part also, which might easiest becene of them that were fighting in the plaine. Now the Celtiberians which stood behind in the rereguard, were the first that discovered the flame, but afterwards it was noised and went currant through the maine battell, that their campe was lost and all on a light fire. The enemies hereby were greatly amated, but the Romaps much more animated. For now they might heare the shour of their fellows, having the upper hand; now might they see the tents of their enemies burning with bright flames. The Celtiberians for a while stood in suspence, doubtfull what to doe; but afterwards, perceiving they had no place of safe retreat, if upon their discomfiture they should fall to running away, they saw no other hope but in fighting it out, and so they began to renew the medley afresh, with more resolution than before. Fiercely they were encountered and charged in the midst of their battell by the fifth legion: but against the left flanke and wing, where they saw the souldiours of their owne nation raunged (who came to aid the Romanes) they made head, and advanced their ensignes with more boldnesse and confidence. And verily that left wing of the Romanes was at the point to have reculed, but that the seventh legion seconded and succoured them: & withall, they that were left within Ebura in garison, came from the town in the very middelt and host of the conflict; and Acilius from another part plaied on their backs. Down went the Celtiberians along time, and were cut in peeces betwene. As many as remained, made shift to flie and escape on all hands into every quarter. The Cavallerie was sent out after them two waies in severall bands; who also committed a great carnage and execution. That day were slaine of the enemies about 23000, 4800 taken prisoners, with 500 horse and above; besides fourescore and eight militarie ensignes gotten from them and caried away. A great victorie this was, but not without bloudshed of the Romanes part: for of two legions there dyed somewhat more than two hundred, but of Latine allies 830; of torrein aids, much about 2400 lost their lives in the field. The Pretour then retired with his victorious armie into his owne campe. Acilius was commaunded to abide still in that of the enemies, which he had forced and woon. The next morrow they fell to gather up the spoiles of their enemies: and those who had borne themselves valiantly in that service above the rest, were rewarded with gifts in a full and frequent assembly of the whole armie. Alter this, when the hurt and maimed were brought backe into the towne Ebura, the legions were led through the cuntry Carpetania, towards Contrebia. This citie when it was once besieged, sent to the Celtiberians for succour; but they came not in timent for any slacknesse of their part, but because after they were departed from home, and had entred on their journey, the foule wayes hindered and staid them, which they were not able to passe for the continuall raine that fell: over and besides, the waters were out and the rivers swelled so high, that possibly they could not come forward: whereupon the besieged inhabitants being in despaire of help, from their friends, rendered the towne. Flaccus likewise was forced by the storme and tempestuous weather to put his armie within the same citie. Now the Celtiberians, who were on foot in their journey, and not ware that their friends had surrendered, at length having passed over the rivers (when the raine gave over and the weather tooke up) came to Contrebia; but seeing no campe without the walls, and supposing that either it was removed to the other side, or the enemies dislodged and gone, they approached the towne, and marched lightly and retchlessly forward in disarray. The Romanes sallied out upon them at two gates, fell upon them (disbanded as they were) and put them to the rout. But see what happened! that thing which hindered them that

A that they could not make head, resist, and settle themselves to begin fight (namely, because they came not together in one entire band, nor yet by great companies about their colours) the same stood them in good steed to save many of their lives that fled. For they ran so scattering, and were so spread all over the plaines, that in no place could the enemy meet with them in any number thicke together, to compasse them about on every side. Howbeit twelve thousand of them were killed, & above five thousand taken prisoners, besides four hundred horse, and threescore and two ensignes of warre woon from them. Those who after their straggling flight retired homeward, met with another troupe of Celtiberians coming forward, unto whom they recounted the yeelding up of Contrebia and their owne misfortune: by which meanes they caused them to turne and goe backe againe, who immediately slipped away into their villages and forts.

B Then Flaccus departed from Contrebia, and conducted his legions through Celtiberia, wasting and spoiling as he went: where he forced many castles, untill the greater part of that cuntry was reduced under his obedience. These affaires passed in high Spaine that yeare. As for the lower province, Manlius the Pretour fought fortunately in certaine battels against the Portugales.

The same yeare a Colonie of Latines was planted in Aquileia, within the territorie of the Gauls, and thither were conducted three thousand footmen, and every one of them were endowed with fiftie acres of land. The Centurions besides had a hundred, and the horsemen a hundred and fortie acres apeece given unto them. And the Commissioners for this conduct and distribution were P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, C. Flaminius and L. Manlius Acidinus. In which yeare also two temples were dedicated, the one to Venus Erycina neere the gate Collina (which L. Porcius Licinius the sonne of Lucius dedicated, being a Duumvir deputed for that purpose, and had been vowed before by L. Porcius the Consull in the Ligurian warre) the other to the goddess Pietie, in the hearbe marker: and of this chappell M. Acilius Glabrio the other Duumvir, had the dedication; where, hee erected and set up in the honour of his father Glabrio, a gilt statue, which was the first gilden image that ever was made in Italie. This Glabrio the father was hee, who had vowed to edifie the said temple that very day on which hee fought the battell against K. Antiochus, at Thermopylae, and by warrant from the Senate, had bargained for the building thereof at a price. In those daies wherein these holie houses were consecrated, L. Acilius Paulus the Proconsull, triumphed over the Ligurian Ingaunes. He had borne before him in shew five and twentie golden Coronets, & besides them there was no gold or silver els caried in that triumph.

D But many principall Ligurians, men of marke, whom hee tooke captive, were led before his chare. He dealt among his souldiours, three hundred Asses apeece. The same of this triumph of his, was much more renowned by this occasion, that the Ligurian embassadours craved to have a perpetuall peace with the Romanes; saying, That their whole nation were resolved, never to take armes againe, but by commandement and licence of the people of Rome. Q. Fabius the Pretour, returned this answer unto them by the advise of the Senate, That it was no newes to heare this language from the Ligurians; but it stood them upon and was becomming rather, to carrie a new mind, and the same agreeable to their speech: and therefore they should go to the Consuls, and doe that which by them they were enjoyned; forasmuch as the Senate would beleeve none but the word onely of the Consuls in the behalfe of the Ligurians, as touching their true and sincere meaning to observe peace. Thus was peace concluded with the Ligurians: but there was a battell fought in Corsica with the Islanders there; in which M. Pinarus the Pretour slew 2000 of them in the field: which disfigurement compelled them to give hostages, and besides, 100000 pound weight of waxe. From thence the armie was conducted into Sardinia, where passed some fortunate battailes against the Ilians, a nation at this day not fully quieted and appeased. In this very yeere also were the hundred hostages rendred backe againe to the Carthaginians; with whom the people of Rome made and maintained peace, as well for their owne part as in the behalfe of K. Masinissa, who at that time with an armed garison, held the possession of that territorie which had been in question. The Consuls in their province sat still and had nothing to doe. M. Bibius was sent for to Rome, against the generall assembly for the election of magistrates: who created Consuls, A. Posthumius Albinus Lusius, and C. Calpurnius Piso. After this were elected Pretors Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, A. Posthumius Albinus, P. Corn. Mamerus, T. Minutius Mollicubus, A. Hostilius Mancinus, and C. Manius; and they all entred into their magistracie upon the 15 day of March.

In the beginning of that yeere wherein A. Posthumus Albinus, and C. Calpurnius Piso were Consuls: A. Posthumus the Consull brought into the Senat those persons who were come from Q. Fulvius Flaccus out of the hither province of Spaine; to wit, L. Minutius his Lieutenant generall, and the two Colonels, T. Manius and L. Messalio. These men after they had made report of two fields fortunately fought against the Celtiberians, of their countie yielded & brought under subjection, and that the tearme of government in that province was expired, & no more left to be done there; so as there was no need either of the ordinarie money which was wont to be sent for souldiours pay, or of come to bee carried unto the armie for that yeere: requested of the Senate first in regard of their happie successe, to yeeld honour and praise to the immortall gods: and then, that Q. Fulvius might depart and come his waies out of the province, & bring with him that armie of his from thence, whose valiant service, both himselfe and also many Pretors before him had used: which (say they) was not only meet and convenient, but also requisite and needfull in a maner to be done: for as much as the souldiours were so stiffnecked & obstinate, that it seemed impossible to hold them any longer in that province, but that they would be gone and depart without licence, if they were not dismissed: or else breake out into some dangerous fire of a mutinie, if a man should goe about to keepe and hold them backe by strong hand. The Senate gave order that Liguria should bee the province for both Consuls: which done, the Pretours also cast lots for theirs. To A. Hostilius fell the civill jurisdiction over the citizens: and to Minutius over the forrainers. P. Cornelius had the government of Sicilie: C. Manius of Sardinia. Vnto L. Posthumus was allotted the farther part of Spaine, and to Tib. Sempronius the hither. This Sempronius (because hee was to succed Q. Fulvius) fearing that his province should be left naked and disurnished of the old souldiours, I demaund (qd. he) of you, O L. Minutius, since you bring word, that there is no more trouble behind in that province, whether you thinke that the Celtiberians will continue fast in their alleagance for ever, so as, that province may be protected and held in obedience without any armie at all? And if you cannot undertake to assure us of the faith and loyaltie of these Barbarians, and doe advise us in any hand to maintaine an armie in those parts, whether you will give counsell to the Senate, for to send a supply into Spaine, that they onely should be cased and discharged, who have served out their full yeeres required by law, and so that new and raw souldiours bee mingled with the rest of the old: or that the old legions should full and whole be removed out of the province, and new levied, enrolled, and sent thither in their steed? considering that the small account that usually is made of such fresh and untrained souldiers, were enough to induce and moove even the more quiet and peaceable sort of Barbarians to rebell and make warre againe: Soone said it is, but not so easilie done, to have made an end of all troubles in such a province, especially where the people are naturally inclined to warre, and prone ever and anon to make insurrections. Some few cities, as far as I can heare, and namely those which being neere unto the souldiours lying in winter garison, were by them held in awe and kept down, have yielded and are become subject: but they that are farther off, be in armes still and have weapon in hand. Which being so, I tell you (my L.L.) even now beforehand, that I will performe my service to the Commonweale, with the help of that armie which is there already at this present: but in case Flaccus bring away those legions with him: I will chuse those quarters which are in peace, to winter in, and not hazard my yong and new souldiours among them, to be presented to the devotion & mercie of most fierce and warlike enemies. The Lieutenant answered to these demaunds in this manner, That neither himselfe nor any man else was able for his life, to divine and foresee what was in the heart of the Celtiberians now, and what they would mind and intend to do hereafter: & there fore he could not denie, but the better policie it was to send an armie among these Barbarians (peaceable though they seemed to be at this present) because as yet they are not inured to government, & cannot well skill of being subjects. But whither it be more expedient to employ new forces, or the old, it is for him to speake and set downe, who upon his knowledge can say, how loyally the Celtiberians will carrie themselves in time of peace; and is withall assured, that the souldiours will hold them content and keepe quiet, if they bee detained any longer in the province. But if a man may conjecture and give a guesse what they thinke in their heart, either by their grumbling words secretly one to another; or their speeches uttered in the presence & hearing of their Generall, when hee maketh orations to them in publike audience: I tell you truly, they have cried out with open mouth, that either they will keep their Generall with them in the province,

A province, or home they will with him into Italie. This debate betwene the Pretour & the Lieutenant, was interrupted and broken off, by a new matter propounded before the Senate by the Consuls, who thought it meet and reasonable, that order should be taken for their owne furniture and setting forth with men, money, and munition to their provinces, before any thing were spoken or treated of as touching the Pretor his armie. So, ordained it was, that the Consull should have their entire armie of new souldiours, to wit, each of them two legions of Romane citizens with their cavallerie, together with the usuall and accustomed number at all other times of Latine allies, namely 15000 foot and 800 horse. And with this power they had in charge to make warre against the Ligurian Apuans. As for P. Cornelius and M. Babius, they continued still in place of command: and were willed to hold their provinces, untill the Consuls were thither come. Then they were commaunded to discharge the armie which they had, and so to returne to Rome. After this, speech there was concerning the armie of Tib. Sempronius; and the Consuls had warrant to enroll one new legion, consisting of five thousand and two hundred foote, and foure hundred horse: over and besides, one thousand footmen, and fiftie horsemen of Romane citizens. Likewise the Latine nation was charged with a levie of seven thousand foot, and three hundred horse. With which armie it was thought good, that Tib. Sempronius should go into the higher province of Spaine. As for Q. Fulvius, he was permitted to bring back with him (if he thought well thereof) all those souldiours, as well Romanes as allies, which had bene transported over into Spaine before the Consulship of Sp. Posthumus and Q. Martius: & more than that (after a new supply was come) the surplusage in two legions above ten thousand and foure hundred foot, and sixe hundred horse; and the over-deale of twelve thousand footmen of Latines, and sixe hundred horsemen; and namely those whose valorous service C. Furcius had tried and found in two batailles against the Celtiberians. Moreover, solemne processions and thanksgivings were by authoritie ordained, for his happie managing of the affaires of the common weale; and then the rest of the Pretours were sent into their provinces. Q. Fabius Buto had his commission renewed to governe Gallia still. Thus it was agreed in the Senate-house, that there should be eight legions maintained and kept in pay that yeere, over and above the old armie in Liguria, which was in good hope shortly to bee dismissed. Howbeit even these forces (being no greater than they were) hardly could be made full & compleat, by reason of the pestilence which now three yeeres had raigned, & dispeopled the citie of Rome & all Italie. During which plague the Pretour I. Minutius, and not long after him, the Consull C. Calpurnius died: with many other brave and famous persons of each degree and qualitie. So as, at length these men began to hold this depopulation & calamitie for a prodigious token & straunge wonder. Whereupon C. S. virilis the Arch-bishop was charged, to search out means for to appeale the wrath & anger of the gods; & the Decemvirs likewise to peruse the bookes of Sibylla: the Consull also to vow certaine presents and oblations, to Dan Apollo, Aesculapius and Ladie Salus, and to set up their images garnished with gold: which he vowed and erected accordingly. The Decemvirs proclaimed supplications and praiers two daies together for the health of the people, throughout the citie, and in all market townes and places of frequent resort and assembly. All above twelve yeeres of age, ware chaplets and garlands of floures upon their heads, and bare braunches of lawrell in their hands, whiles they were at their praiers and devotions. Moreover, there was crept into mens heads a suspition that some devilish and wicked hand might bee the cause of all this. Whereupon by an Act of the Senate, a commission was granted out unto C. Claudius the Pretour (who was substituted and chosen in the roume of T. Minutius) to make search and diligent inquisition after all confections of poison, and the praefisers thereof, within the citie, and for the compasse of ten miles about it every way: In like manner, to C. Manius, for to sit in the enquire thereof (before he crossed over-sea into his province Sardinia) in all the mart-townes and places of assembly which were more than ten miles off, from Rome. Of all others, the Consull his death was most suspected. For given out it was, that Quarta Hostilia his wife, had murdered him: but when it was seene once that her owne sonne Q. Fulvius Flaccus, was declared Consull in place of his father in law and mothers husband, the death of Piso the Consull began to bee more infamous and suspicious a great deale than before. And witnesses came forth readie to depose, that after Albinus and Piso were pronounced Consuls (in which election the said Flaccus was rejected and suffered a repulse) his mother reproched him therewith, and laid it in his dish, that this was the third time that he had sued for the Consulship & gone without:

out: adding moreover, and willing him to be readie to stand for it againe, for that hee would worke and bring it about, that within two moneths he should be Confull. Among other testimonies and depofitions making for the caufe and tending to the fame, that fpeech of hers alfo, taking effect too truly and fo juft within the time, was thought fufficient to condemn Hofthia.

In the beginning of this fpring, whiles the levie of foldiours ftayed the new Confuls at Rome, whiles the death of the one and the choofing of the other into his place, caufed all things there to goe more slowly forward; in the mean time P. Cornelius and M. Babius who had done nothing worthy of remembrance during their Confulship, led their armies againft the Ligurian Apuans. Thefe Ligurians, who before the coming of the Confuls into the province looked for no warre, were furprized at unawares, and to the number of 12000 of them yeelded: whome Cornelius and Babius refolved (upon advife had firft with the Senat by letters) to tranfplant from the mountains, into the plains and champion country from their owne home; to the end they should have no more hope to returne, for otherwife they fupposed the Ligurian war would never have an end. Now there was in the Samnites countrey a certaine territorie belonging in common to the people of Rome, which sometime had been in the tenure and poffeffion of the Taurafines. In which place they being defirous to plant the Ligurian Apuans, published an edict, That they should defend downe the mountaines Anidos, together with their wives and children, and bring away with them all that ever they had. But the Ligurians fent their embaffadors oftentimes to intreat, that they might not be forced to abandon their domefticall gods, the place of their natiuite, and the fepulchres of their auncestors: and therewith promifed to deliver up their armor, and to put in hoftages. Howbeit, feeing they could not prevaile, and having not ftrength and power enough to wage warre againe, they obeyed the edict and proclamation. So there were tranfated from thence at the publicke charges of the citie, to the number of four thousand perfons free-borne, together with their women and children: and unto them was allowance made of 150000 Sesterces, toward the building of new houfes. And for to diftribute and deuide land among them, the fame men (to wit, Cornelius and Babius) had commiffion; who alfo removed them into thofe parts. Howbeit at the request of thefe twaine, there were Quinquervirs or five commiffioners graunted unto them by the Senate, by whole advife they might manage all. Thefe affairs being finifhed, after they had brought with them to Rome their old armie, they obtained of the Senat a graunt to triumph. And thefe were the firft that ever triumphed and made no warre before. Only the enemies were led in fhew before their chariot; for nothing had they gained and woon for to be caried or led in pompe; neither was there ought to be feene in their triumphs, which might be dealt and given among the fouldiours.

The fame yeere Fulvius Flaccus the Pretor in Spaine, by occafion that his fuccelfour ftayed long ere hee came into the province, brought forth his armie into the field out of his wintering campe, and began to walt and fpoile the farther parts and territories of Celtiberia; from whence the inhabitants came not in to fubmit and doe their homage and fealtie. By which deed of his, he rather provoked and angered the barbarous people, than terrified them: for when they had fecretly gathered together certaine forces and companies, they befet and barred the paffage Manlium, by which they were affured that the Roman armie would paffe. As L. Posthumus Albinus was upon his journey into the nether province of Spaine, Gracchus his colleague charged him, to advertife Quintus Fabius for to bring his armie to Tarracon, for that he purposed there to difcharge his old foldiours, to diftribute the fupply which he brought, and to raunge in order all his armie by companies. Notice alfo was given to Flaccus of the very day (which was neere at hand) upon which his fuccelfour would come. This new occurrent caufed Flaccus to lay afide thofe enterprifes which he intended, and in all haft to withdraw his forces out of Celtiberia. The barbarous people knowing not the caufe hereof, but fupposing that hee had fome inkling of their revolt & how they had in fecret taken arms, and that therupon he was fore afraid, guarded and ftopped the paffage fo much more ftreightly. Now fo foone as the Romane armie was entred into the paffe, one morning betimes at the break of day, the enemies arofe fuddenly at once out of two parts, and charged the Romans: which when Flaccus perceived, he gave commandement by the minifterie of the Centurians, that every man should keepe his place and ftand his ground, and to have his arms and weapons in readineffe; by which means he appeased the firft tumult and affright in his hoaft. Then after he had brought all his labouring beafts with the baggage, unto one place, he embattailed and put in array all his bands and companies, partly

A by himfelfe in perfon, and partly by his lieutenants and colonels, according as the ground and the time required, fhewing no figne at all of feare, but putting his men in mind of the enemies, in thefe tearmes: Yee have (quoth hee) to doe with thofe that twice already have yeelded unto us, who are inured and praftised ftill in wickedneffe and perjurie; not bettered in vertue and courage: thofe (I fay) who are like to make our return home honorable and glorious, which otherwife would have been obfcure and nothing memorable: fo as we fhall carrie to Rome for a triumph, our fwords all bloudie and newly bathed in the greene wounds and freth maffacre of our enemies; and beare away the fpoiles of their bodie, all embred and ftill dropping with their bloud. Time would not permit him to fay any more, for now the enemies advanced forward, and the charge was already given in the utmoft skirts of the armie, and anon the main battailes encountered and joyned conflict. The fight was hote & cruell alike in all parts, but the fortune divers: for the Roman legions in the main battell fought right valiantly; & the two wings of either hand did their devoir as bravely. The auxiliarie ftraungers had to deale with enemies armed in deed at all points like to themfelves, but better fouldiours by ods than they were; in fuch fort, as they were over-charged by them, and could not make good their ground. The Celtiberians perceiving they were not able to match the legions in raunged battaile and close hand-fight, caft their companies into a pointed and coin-formed battaillon, for to pierce perforce and enter upon their enemies: in which maner of fight they are fo ftrong, that it is not poffible to withftand them, wherefoever they give their violent charge. And then the legions alfo were put in difarray, and the whole maine battaile after a fort, was difbanded and broken. Which diforder and fearefull trouble when Flaccus perceived, he rode a gallop to the legionarie men of arms: What? (quoth he unto them) Is there no helpe at all in you? and fhall this armie here be thus ditted utterly and come to nought? Whereat they cryed on all hands to him, to give direction & fpeake only the word what he would have done, and he should fee how they would beftirre themfelves in the execution of his commaund. Mary (quoth hee) double your troups, you that are the horfemen of two legions, and run your horfes with full carriere againft that wedge-formed battaillon of the enemies, wherewith they preffe upon our men; and this fhall you performe with the more violence of your horfes, if you difbridle them and let them have full head, and fo fet furs and ruffin among them: which we have read in ftoories, that the Romans many a time have praftised to their great praife and honour. No fooner faid, but done it was; pluckt were the bridles over their horfe heads; twife they ran through the mids of them too and fro from one fide to another, brake all their launces upon the enemies, overthrew them, and made foule worke and carnage among them. When this pointed battaillon of the Celtiberians was once broken, (even the whole and onely hope they had;) then they began to feare and tremble, then were they at the point to quit the fight, and to looke about them which way to take their flight. The extraordinarie Cavallerie in the out wings (feeing fo brave a fervice performed by the Romane horfemen) were enkindled and incensed by their valorous example, and of their own accord alfo without attendance of any mans commaundement, charged upon their enemies, thus difordered and in difarray already. Then the Celtiberians ran away and fled on all hands. The Romane Generall feeing them once turne backe and fhew their hin-parts, vowed to build a chappell to Fortuna equeftris, and to exhibit games in the honor of Imp. Opt. Max. The Celtiberians, thus difbanded and fattered in the rout all over the length of the ftreight paffage, were killed and cut in pieces. It is recorded, that there died that day feventeen thousand enemies, and were taken prifoners alive more than three thousand, together with 277 field enignes, and well-neere eleven hundred horfes. For that day, the victorious armie lodged within no camp at all: yet was not this victorie fo cleere, but it coft them the losse of fome foldiours: for of Romans were flaine, four hundred feventie and two, of allies (and namely of Latins) 1019; & together with them, aid-fouldiours three thousand. Thus the armie having by this good hand recovered their auncient honour and glorie, was conducted to Tarracon. Tib. Sempronius the Pretor, (who was arrived two dayes before) went out to meet Fulvius in the way as he came, and fhewed how he joyced on his behalfe, for this good managing and happie achieving the affaires of the common-weale: which done, they agreed together with great accord as touching the fouldiours, namely, whome to caffe and fend away, and whome to reteine ftill in fervice. Then Fulvius having fhipped the fouldiours that were difcharged, tooke his journey to Rome: and Sempronius conducted the legions into Celtiberia.

Both the Consuls led their forces into Liguria, and entered the country in two divers quarters. Posthumus with the first legion and the third, beset and invested the two mountaines, Baliffa and Suiffmontium, and so straightly hee kept the narrow passes of those parts with his garrisons, that he cut them off from all victuals, and tamed them with extreme scarcitie and want of all things. Fulvius with the second legion and the fourth, after hee had assailed the Apuan Ligurians from the coast of Pisæ, received submission and homage of as many of them as inhabited about the river Macra; and when he had embarked upon seven thousand of them, hee sent them over to Naples, coasting along the Tuscan sea. From whence they were brought into the Samnites country, and a certaine territorie assigned them to inhabit among the rest of their countrey-men. As for A. Posthumus, he cut downe the vineyards, and burnt the corne of the Ligurian mountainers, so long untill they were driven by all manner of calamities following war, to come in and submit, yea, and to deliver up their armour and weapons. From thence Posthumus departed and tooke the sea, because he would visite the coasts of the Ligurian Ingaunes and Intemelians. Now, before that these Consuls came to the armie which was appointed to meet at Pisæ, it chaunced that A. Posthumus and M. Fulvius Nobilior, the brother of Q. Fulvius, were the commanders, and had the conduct thereof. This Fulvius was a Colonell of the second legion, who during the time of those moneths, wherein by tyme he had the command and charge thereof, dismissed that legion, having bound the Centurions by an oth, that they should make payment backe of their wage money well and truly to the Questors in the chamber and treasure of Rome. Notice hereof being given to A. Posthumus at Placentia, (for thither it happened that hee was gone) hee rode after those called souldiours, and pursued them with a companie of light horsemen. As many of them as hee could overtake, after he had checked and rebuked them for their fault, he brought to Pisæ; of the rest he gave information to the Consull. Who put the matter to question, and after it had beene debated in counsell, an act of the Senate passed against the said M. Fulvius, that he should be confined and sent into Spaine beyond new Carthage. And letters he had given him to carie from the Consull to P. Manlius into the farther province of Spaine. As for the souldiours, they were commaunded to returne againe to their colours, and for an ignominious disgrace of that legion, ordained it was, that for a full yeares pay they should be content and take up with fixe moneths wages. And looke what souldiour repaired not to the armie accordingly, the Consull had warrant and commission to make sale of him and all that hee had.

The same yeare L. Dronius, who was returned with ten ships to Brundisium from out of Illyricum (where hee sat as Pretor the former yeare) leaving his ships there in the rode, came to Rome: where, in discoursing of the acts by him done, hee laid the whole fault of all the rovenie and piracie at sea upon Gentius the king of the Illyrians, saying, that all the ships which had lien upon the coast of the Adriaticke sea, came out of his realme. For which he had sent embassadours to complaine, but they could never find meanes to speake with the king about it. Now there were embassadours arrived at Rome from Gentius, who avouched, that when the Romanes came for to parle with the king, he happened to be sicke in the most remote parts of his kingdom: & therefore Gentius their king and maister requested the Senate, not to give credite to those false accusations and forged slaunders which his enemies had raised and enformed against him. But Dronius alleadged moreover, that divers and sundrie persons, as well citizens of Rome as Latine allies within his dominion, had received many wrongs: yea, and by report certaine Roman citizens were staied and detained at Corcyra. Whereupon it was in counsell thought good that they should all be brought to Rome, and that C. Claudius the Pretour should have the hearing of the matter, before which time no answer would be given unto king Gentius or his embassadours.

Among many others that the plague this yeare consumed, certaine priests and prelates also died, and namely, L. Valerius Flaccus, a bishop, in whose rounne was chosen Q. Fabius Labeo. Also P. Manlius one of the three Triumvirs for the celebration of the holy feasts. In whose steed Q. Fulvius the sonne of Marcus was elected Triumvir. He was at that time very young, and not out of his embroidered Prætexta. But as touching the king of sacrificers, who was to be chosen in place of Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, there was debate between C. Servilius the Archbishop, and Cornelius Dolabella one of the Duumvirs for the navie. For when the bishop would have had him to resigne that office, that he might consecrate and inaugurate him the king sacrificer, he refused to doe. For which cause the bishop set a round fine on the Duumvir his head. Then Dolabella appealed

* Prætextatus, is a garment that hee wears under 17 years of age, and is Livie which they wear in the end of the 22. book: for Prætextatus was Publius habitus. Tacitus 2. 56. and upon this is shewd, Prætextatus en-joyed Lex Julia annalis, Prætextatus for the sake of that age order.

Appealed to the people; and before them it was to be tried, Whether the said fine should be taken off or paid? Now when most of the tribes called into the railes for to give their voices, advised the Duumvir to obey the bishop, and awarded the fine for to be pardoned and remitted, in case hee would give over that office which hee had, behold it lightened at the very instant from heaven, which is the onely ominous signe that interrupteth and breaketh the assemblies of the people. Whereupon the Colledge of the bishops made scruple of conscience to inaugurate Dolabella, but they consecrated P. Clælius Sæculus, who had beene sacred in the second place. In the end of the yeare C. Servilius Geminus likewise the Archbishop himselfe departed this world, who also was one of the ten Duumvirs deputed for the holy ceremonies. And Q. Fulvius Flaccus, was by the colledge of the bishops, elected bishop in his rounne. But M. Aemilius Lepidus was created the soveraigne pontife, notwithstanding many noble persons made suite therefore. Likewise Q. Martius Philp, a Decemvir for the holy mysteries, was chosen in his place. Moreover, there deceased Sp. Posthumus Albinus an Augur, in whose steed P. Scipio the sonne of Africanus was elected by the Augurs. The same yeare graunted it was to the inhabitants of Cumes, at their owne request and petition, that they might commonly speake Latine: as also to the publicke criers, to make portale of goods in the Latine tongue. The Senate gave thanks to the Pisanes for the offer they made of lands, wherein to plant a Colonie of Latines. And three Triumvirs or Commissioners for that businesse were created, namely, Q. Fabius Buteo, Marcus and Publius, both named Pepilius, and both surnamed Lenas. Letters were brought from M. Marcius the Pretor (who having the government allotted unto him of Sardinia, had commission also to enquire after the practise of poysoning in all places, not within ten miles of the citie of Rome) importing thus much, that he had condemned already three thousand persons, and that the informations and presentments multiplied daily, by reason of new matters discovered still; and therefore either he was to give over that inquisition, or to resigne up his province Sardinia.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus returned out of Spaine to Rome with great honour and renowne for his acts there achieved. Who remaining yet without the citie because of his triumph, was created Consull with L. Atanlius Acidinus, and within few daies after, rode triumphant into Rome, accompanied with his souldiours, whome hee had brought home with him. Hee carried in triumph a hundred and twentie golden coroners. Moreover in gold one and thirtie pound weight, besides 173200 peeces of coine in Ofane silver. He dealt to his souldiours fiftie Denarii apiece out of the boorie and pillage which hee had gotten. To every Centurion hee gave it double, and to the gentlemen of Rome that served on horsebacke, triple. The like hee did in proportion by the Latine allies, and to all in generall hee paid double wages. This year was the law first proposed by L. Iulius a Trib. of the Commons, as touching the yeer of the age requisite and meet for to sue for any publicke office, or to exercise the same. And hereupon it came, that the whole race of that familie was surnamed Annales. Many yeares after there were created foure Pretors according to the law Bebia, which provided that there should be each other yeare foure chosen. And these were they who were first elected, namely, Cn. Cornelius Scipio, L. Valerius Lævinus, Q. Mucius Sævola, and M. both named Atij, and both surnamed Sævola.

Unto the Consuls Q. Fulvius and L. Manlius the government of the same provinces was ordained, which to those of the former yeare, with like numbers of horse and foot, as well citizens as allies. In both provinces of Spaine, Tib. Sempronius and L. Posthumus continued still to have the command and conduct of the same armies which they had. And for to furnish them out, the Consuls were enjoined to enroll three thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen of Romanes, likewise five thousand foot of Latine allies and foure hundred horse. P. Mucius Sævola by lot had the civile jurisdiction within the citie of Rome, and commission to enquire into the devillish cast of poysoning both within the citie, and without for the compasse of ten miles. Cn. Cornelius Scipio was lord cheefe justice in forraine pleas and causes, Q. Mucius Sævola was lord deputie in Sicilie, & C. Valerius in Sardinia. Q. Fulvius the Consull, before that he went in hand with any affaires of State, said he would both discharge himselfe and also the citie of the dutie to Godward, in performing the vowes which hee had made. Hee declared, that on that very day wherein he fought his last battell with the Celtiberians, hee had made a vow to exhibite games to the honour of that most mightie and gracious God Iupiter, and likewise to build a temple to Fortuna equestris: and how thereto the Spaniards had contributed certaine sums of mony. So a decreee passed, that those plaies should be set forth: and two Duumvirs chosen, to give

* Which were first made to him from princes and then to his own citizens. These were called Coronæ triumphales, and hee carried with him the gold Coronarium. The law is still called Annales or Annalis.

order and bargain for the edification of the same temple. Likewise there was set downe a certaine stint of money to be disbursed for the defraying of the charges: to wit, not exceeding that summe in the solemnitie of the plaies, which was allowed unto Fulvius Nobilior, when hee exhibited the like sports after the end of the Ætolian warre. Item, that for these games he should not seeke or send for, gather and raise, receive or do any thing, contrarie to the Act of the Senate, which in the time of L. Æmilius and Cn. Babius C. off. was made as touching such pastimes. This decree the Senate ordained, by occasion of the superfluous and excessive expences employed about the plaies of T. Sempronius the Ædile; which were very chargeable not only to Italie and the Latine allies, but also to forraine provinces. The winter this yere was very sharp, by reason of snow, and all manner of tempestuous weather. The trees that were tender and subject to frost and cold, were all blasted and killed: besides the winter season continued much longer than ordinarie in other yeeres. And thereupon the festivall solemnitie of the Latine holidais were so troubled and disordered by a suddaine and insupportable storme and tempest upon the hill [Alba] that by an ordinance of the Bishops, it was celebrated againe the second time. The same tempest cast downe certaine images in the Capitol, and dishgured very many places with thunderbolts and flashes of lightning. It overthrew the temple of Jupiter in Tarracina, the white temple at Capua: Item, the gate there called Romana, & the battlements of the wals in divers places. Among these wondrous prodigies it was reported also from Reate, that a mule was foaled with three feet. For this cause the Decemvirs were commanded to go to the bookes of Sibylla: and out of that learning, they shewed to what gods sacrifice should be made, and what number of beasts was to be killed. And because many places were with lightning defaced, they ordained that a solemn supplication should be holden one whole day in the temple of Jupiter. This done, the foresaid games & plaies which Q. Fulvius the Consul had vowed, were with great magnificence exhibited for ten daies together. After this followed the election of the Censors, wherein M. Æmilius Lepidus the Arch-bishop, and M. Fulvius Nobilior, who had triumphed over the Ætolians, were created. Now betwene these two men, there had bene notorious enmitie, oftentimes testified & shewed in many sharpe & bitter debates, both in the Senate, & also before the people. When this election was ended, the two Censors according to the auncient use and custome, sat upon their yvorie chaires of estate in Mars field, neere the altar of Mars. To whom ther soon repaired thither, the principal Senators, accompanied with a troupe besides of citizens: and among the rest, Q. Cæcilius Metellus made a speech to this effect. My masters, you that are Censors, we have not forgotten that you ere-while were chosen by the universal body of the people of Rome, to be superintendents & wardens over us for our manners & behavior: and that it becommeth us to be taught, admonished, and directed by you, and not you by us. Howbeit we ought to tell and declare, what there is in you, that either is offensive to all good men, or at lestwise which they with were amended. When we behold & consider you severally apart, either you, o M. Æmilius, or you M. Fulvius, wee have not this day in the citie of Rome any men, whom if we were called to a new scrutinie for to passe our voices againe, we would prefer before you to this office and place of dignitie. But when we see you both together, we cannot chuse but much doubt and feare that ye are very badly matched and coupled as companions in government: and that the common weale shall not receive so much good by this, That yee please and like us all so well, as sustaine harme in this, that you displease and dislike one another. These many yeeres together, there hath bene great hate burning and much malice betwene you, and the same must needs be grievous & hurtful unto yourselves: but now it is to be feared, that from this day forward, that rankor will be more prejudiciall to us and the common weale, than unto you. Vpon what motives and causes wee are thus fearefull, much wee could say, but that peradventure your irreconcilable anger is such, as hath snared and possessed wholly your spirits and minds already. These quarrels, jarres, and grudges of yours, we all in generall would request you heartily to end this day, & in this very temple wherein we are assembled: & since the people of Rome by their voices have conjoynd you in one office, suffer your selves by us to bee linked and reconciled in perfect attonement. With one mind and accord, with one heart and counsel, chuse the Senate; review the Chevalrie and knighthood of Rome; number the citizens; asseesse their goods; purge & cense the citie; & finally consummate the solemnitie of the Cense with a sacrifice. And whereas in all your prayers well neere, yee shall use this ordinarie forme of words, That this thing, or that, may fall out in the end well and happilie, to my selfe and to my colleague,

See

A See that you with the same truly, sincerely & from the very hart, that whatsoever ye shall pray vnto the gods for, wee men may beleve and all the world see, that you desire the same to bee effected in deed. T. Titus and Romulus in this very citie reigned together with great untie and concord: in the midst whereof even in the very market-place, they had encountered and joyntly battailed together as mortal enemies with their cruell armies. What! not enmities onely have an end, but warres also. And many a time most venomous and spitefull foes become faithful allies, yea, & other whiles nere neighbors & fellow citizens. The Albanes after the subversion & utter ruine of their citie, were brought over to inhabite Rome. The Latines & Sabines both, were endeizend Romans. Airold said saw it is, & not so old as true, & for the truth become a common proverb, That enmities ought to be transitorie & soone die, whereas friendship should continue & last for ever. At these words, there arose a confused bruit among them these assembled, in token of their consent & approbation: & anon were heard the distinct voices of them all in generall, craving & requesting of the Censors the same, which making one entire sound, brak off the speech of Metellus. Then Æmilius among other matters complained, that M. Fulvius had twice put him besides the Consulship, which otherwise he was sure of. And Fulvius on the other side found himselfe grieved, that he evermore by Æmilius had bene provoked, & that he had waged law by stipulation against him to his dishonor and disgrace. Yet both of them made saire and shewed, that if the one were as willing as the other, they would relent and be over-ruled by so many honourable personages of the citie. So, at the instant request of all them that were present, they shooke hands and thereby assured one another to forgive and forget all matters past, and truly to make an end of malice, and bee perfect friends againe: wheretupon they were much commended by the whole assembly, and conducted by them into the Capitol. Where the Senate approved and highly praised, as well the carefull industrie of the principall citizens, in effecting this so weighue a matter, as also the good nature and debonairie of the two Censors. Who afterwards when they required to have a certaine summe of monie assigned unto them for to employ in the publick edifices and other workes of the citie, were allowed by their decree, the full rent and revenues of one whole yeere.

The same yeere L. Posthumus and Tib. Sempronius the Pro-pretours in Spaine, agreed so together, that Albinus should make an expedition against the Vasces through Lusitania, and so returne from thence into Celtiberia. But Gracchus went as farre as the utmost quarter of Celtiberia, for that in those parts there was the greater war. And first he forced the citie Munda, which he surprisid sodainly in the night at unawares. Then, after he had received hostages, & put a garrison there, he went forward assailing forts and burning the villages, untill he came to another citie of exceeding strength, which the Celtiberians call Certima: where, as he was about to approach the wals with his engines of batterie, there came unto him orators out of the citie, who like good plaine men of the old world, made a speech unto him, nothing dissimuling but that they would warre and be revenged, if their strength and forces were sufficient. For they requested leave to passe to the Celtiberian campe, there to receive aid and succour: but if they could not speed, then they would consult apart by themselves what to doe. Good leave they had of Gracchus; and some few daies after, they brought with them, tenne Oratours more. About noone-tide it was of the day, and the first thing that they craved at the Pretour his hand was this, That he would make them to drinke before they parted. When they had once quaffed and caroused round, they called againe for more: wherat, all that were present and stood about them, laughed heartily, to see them so rude and uncivile, and altogether without good manners. But afterwards, the eldest man of the companie began in this wise: Wee are sent (quoth he) unto you from our nation, to know what assured means hath induced you to levie warre against us? To this demand Gracchus answered, That he came with the confidence that he had in a brave and valiant armie; which (if they were so desirous) he would doe them the favour to see, that they might be able to make more certaine report to their countrey men upon their owne knowledge. And with that, he commanded the colonels and knight marshals, to put in armes and embattle all the bands and companies, as well foot as horse; and then armed as they were to charge one upon another in manner of a battaile. These embassadours, after they had once seen this sight, were sent away: who went directly to the Celtiberians their neighbours, and frighted them from sending any succour to the citie besieged. The townesmen within having in vaine set fire lights in the night time aloft upon their turrets (which was the signall agreed upon betwene them) and seeing themselves themselves destitute of the onely hope they had of aid, yielded by composition. So they were enjoyned to make payment of four and twentie hundred thousand Sesterces; and to deliver fortie of their noblest gentlemen and best men of armes; nor by way of hostages (for commaunded they were to serve in the warres;) and yet in truth, they stood for a pawn of assurance for their fealtie. From thence anon he marched to the citie Alce, where the Celtiberians lay encamped, and from whome of late the embassadours afore said came: whome, for certaine daies he provoked to fight, making small skirmishes, by sending out against their corps de guard his light-armed vaunt-courriers, to the end, that skuffling together every day more than other, hee might traine them all forth of their camp at length. And when he perceived once that his designe had taken effect, he commanded the captains of the auxiliarie soldiors, that after some short skirmish, they should make semblaunt as if they were overcharged with numbers, and so at once turne their backs, and flie as fast as they could to their owne campe: himselfe in the meane while put his men in battaile array within the rampier at every gate. Long it was not, but he might see his owne bands and companies retiring backe for the nones and running away, and after them the barbarous enemies following as hard as they could in chase. Now had he his armie embattailed for the purpose, and readie to receive them: and therefore he made no longer stay than onely, to suffer his friends and allies to enter at libertie into the campe, but hee set up a loud crie, and at one instant issued forth at all the gates. The enemies were not able to endure this unexpected violent charge; and so they that were come to assaile the campe of others, could not so much as defend their owne: for presently they were discomfited and put to flight; and within a while driven for verie feare into their hold, and in the end turned out of it also. That day nine thousand of the enemies left their carkases in the field, three hundred and twentie were taken prisoners, together with 112 horse, and 73 field ensignes. Of the Romane armie, there died not above an hundred and nine. Presently after this battaile, Gracchus marched with his legions, to wast and spoile the cuntry of Celtiberia: and as he made havock in all places as he went, with driving booties, with harrying and carrying all that ever he could come by; the cities and States of the cuntry, some submitted willingly of their owne accord; others for constraint and feare received the yoke of subjection; so as in few daies space he became master of an hundred and three townes that yielded unto him. A mightie rich pillage he gat in this expedition. After this, hee marched backe againe toward the citie Alce from whence hee came, and began to besiege and assaile the towne. The inhabitants endured the first assault of the enemies, but afterwards seeing their towne not only assailed by force of arms, but also shaken with engins and instruments of battery, distrustful the strength of the city, they retired all within their fortress: from whence also in the end, (having sent their Oratours before-hand) they and all that ever they had, were at the devotion of the Romanes. A great boorie there was gotten, and many noble gentlemen taken prisoners: amongst whome were two sonnes and one daughter of Turrus. This Turrus was a prince and great lord of those parts, and simply the mightiest potentate of all the Spaniards by many degrees: who beeing advertised of the hard hap and calamitie fallen upon his children, sent unto Gracchus into the campe for a safe-conduct, and thither hee came himselfe in person. And first hee demaunded, Whether hee would graunt unto him and his, their lives? The Pretour answered, That they should live. Then hee demaunded againe, If hee might beare armes and serve under the Romanes? and when Gracchus permitted that also; Then will I follow you (quoth he) against mine old friends and allies, since they disdain to respect and regard me. From this time forward he tooke part with the Romanes; and in many journeyes he bare himselfe loially and valiantly in their warres, and much advanced the Romane State. After this, Ergavica (a noble, rich, and mightie citie) affrighted at the calamities of other neighbour townes and States about them, set the gates open for to receive the Romanes. Some Authors have written, that these townes and cities yielded not bona fide and in sinceritie of heart: but that so soone as he had withdrawn the legions out of any quarter, sodainly from that part they revolted: also, that afterwards, hee fought a cruell battaile neere the mountaine Camus with the Celtiberians, from the breake of day untill noone: in which conflict there were many slaine both of the one side and the other: neither did the Romanes any other great deed (as they suppose) at Ergavica that day to testifie their victorie, but kept the field, and challenged them out of their campe to fight. Moreover, that the next morrow all the day long, they gathered up the spoiles of the dead: and on the third day strooke a second battaile, which was greater

A ter than the other: and then at length, the Celtiberians without all doubt lost the field cleere; inso much as their campe was forced and rancked. Furthermore, that there died of the enemies that day two and twentie thousand, and not so few as three hundred taken prisoners, and well-neere as many horse, besides the winning of threescore and twelve militarie ensignes: and so the warre came to a small end, the Celtiberians made peace indeed, continued fast and firme therein with all loyaltie, and were not so fickle and unconstant as before. They write moreover, that the same summer L. Posthumus smit a brave and fortunate battaile with the Vaccei in the farther province of Spaine, where hee put to the sword 35000 enemies, and forced their campe. But it foundeth more like a truth, that hee came not timely enough into that province, for to performe any such exploits during that summer season.

B The Censors made a revieu and new choise of Senators in good concord and faithfull unitie: for the president of the Senat was chosen, M. Aemilius Lepidus the Censor himselfe, who also was the high priest or Arch-bishop. Three Senators were casted and deprived of their places: but Lepidus held some in, whom his colleague over-passed and left out. Of that portion of mony, which out of the main allowance was divided between them, they caused these works following to be made. Lepidus for his part raised the great causey or wharfe at Tarracina, which was a peece of worke nothing acceptable to the people, for that he had himselfe lands and possessions there of his owne, and seemed to ease his private expenses, under colour of doing a publike work with the cities money. He built a Theatre, a fore-stage, or a vant-scaffold neere the temple of Apollo. He bargained with the Publicans or Vndertakers for the polishing, blanching & whiting C of the temple of Jupiter in the Capitoll, and likewise of the pillars about it. From these pillars he removed the Images and Statues, which seemed to have beene unhand somely set one against another, and out of all order. Likewise he tooke from thence, the targuets and field-ensignes of all sorts, that were there set up and fastened. But M. Fulvius put forth to making more workes in number, and those of better and greater use. To wit, a peece, and certaine maine piles within the river Tyberis; upon which piles, certaine yeares after P. Scipio Africanus and L. Mummius being Censors, tooke order for arches to be founded and erected. Item, A stately hall or palace behind the new shops of the banquers. Item, A fish market, with other shops round about it, which hee sold to particular persons. Item, A market place, and a porch or gallerie without the gate Termina, and another behind the arsenal, & neere the temple of Hercules. Item, neere the Tyber, and D behind the church of the goddesse Hope, he caused to be built the chappel of Apollo the Physician. Now they had besides another stocke of money in common, which they employed in taking order for water to be conveyed into the citie, & certaine vaults to be made. But this worke was empeached by M. Licinius Crassus, who would not suffer the water to passe through his ground. Over and besides, these same Censors, instituted certaine rents for portage, and pondage, and diverse other imposts. Many chappels also, and publicke places in the tenure and occupation of privat persons, they tooke order to be reduced to the use of the people in common, and to be set open for all commers. They chaunged the order of giving voices, and caused to enroll the tribes according to sundrie quarters and divisions, having regard withall of the degrees of men, of their trades, misteries and occupations. Also the one of the Censors M. Aemilius sued E unto the Senate, that allowance should be made unto him of money for the games and plaies at the dedication of the temples of queen Iuno and Diana, which in the Ligurian war he had vowed eight yeeres before, and assigned there was unto him twentie thousand Asses. So hee dedicated both those temples within the cirque or shew-place of Flaminius. Also he exhibited stage plaies three daies together after the dedication of the temple of Iuno, and two daies after the other of Diana: and every of those daies within the cirque Flaminius. The same Censor dedicated in Mars field a chappel to the sea-gods, vowed by L. Aemilius Regillus, eleven yeares before, in a navall battell at sea, against the captains of king Antiochus. Over the gates of which chappel there was fixed a table with this title. FOR THE APPEASING AND COMPOSING OF A GREAT VVAR BETWEENE TWO KINGS, * THE HEAD, * TO SUBDUE * FOR TO MAKE PRAISE * F THIS CONFLICT, * WHEN L. AEMILIUS REGILLUS THE PRETOUR, THE SON OF *M. * VNDER THE CHARGE, COMMAUND, AND GOVERNMENT, HAPPIE FORTUNE AND CONDUCT OF HIM BETWEENE EPHEBUS, SAMOS, AND CHIOS, THE FLEET OF KING ANTIOCHUS THE ELEVENTH DAIES BEFORE THE KALENDS OF FEBRUARIE WAS VANQUISHED, DISCOMFITED, SHAKEN, BATTERED, AND PUT TO FLIGHT, AND THERE*

Antiochus and Eumenes. This place is descriptive in the Latine.

THERE UPON THE SAME DAY TWO AND FORTIE GALLIES WERE TAKEN, WITHAL THE MARRINERS AND SERVITOURS WITHIN THEM. AFTER WHICH FIGHT K. AN-TIOCHUS AND HIS REALME * * * * IN CONSIDERATION HEREOF VOWED A TEM-PLE TO THE SEA GODS, ASSISTANTS UNTO HIM IN ATCHEEVING THE NAVAL VI-CTORIE. Another table likewise, with the very same inscription, was set up and fastened over the gates of the temple of Iupiter in the Capitoll. Within two daies after that the Censours had chosen a new Senate, Q. Fulvius the Confull made an expedition against the Ligurians; and after he had passed with his armie over wilds and mountaines, where no tracks led them; through streights and passes of forrests, he fought a pight battell with the enemies; and not onely won the field, but also in one and the selfsame day forced their campe. Whereupon three thousand and two hundred of the enemies, & all that quarter of Liguria yielded unto him. Then the Con-full placed these that had surrendered, in the plaines and champaine countrey, and planted garrisons upon the mountaines. Letters hereof with great speed came to Rome: whereupon there were ordained processions for three daies. During which time of processions, the Pretours celebrated sacrifices, and killed fortie greater beasts. But the other Confull A. Manlius did no exploit worth remembrance in Liguria. Three thousand Transalpine Frenchmen passed over the Alpes into Italie, in peaceable manner marching without any hostilitie or harme doing, and requested of the Confull and the Senate a territorie to inhabite, where they might remaine quietly under the siegnorie of the Romanes. But the Senate commaunded them to avoid out of Italie; and gave the Confull Q. Fulvius in charge to make search and enquire into this matter, yea, and to proceed against them who had been the cheefetaines and counsellors to perswade them to passe over the Alpes.

This very yeer died Philip king of the Macedonians, worn away to nothing partly for age, and partly with griefe of hart after the death of his son Demetrius. It fortuned that he kept his winter in Demetrias, tormented with anguish of mind for the losse and misse of his sonne, disquieted with remorse and repentance for his crueltie against him, which stung and pricked his guiltie conscience. Besides, he saw his other sonne (who now was the undoubted heire apparant of the croune, as well in his owne opinion as in the conceit of others) how all men turned their eyes and courted to him. He considered withall, how his old age was despised and forlorne; whiles some expected his death, others did not so much as looke for it; which was the greatest griefe and trouble of all other. And together with him, there was Antigonus the son of Echeatus, bearing the name of his unckle Antigonus by the fathers side, who had been guardian to Philip. This Antigonus the elder had been a man of princely port & regall majestie; renowned also for a brave conflict and noble battaile against Celomenes the Lacedaemonian. And him the Greeks for distinction sake from other KK. of that name, surnamed Tutor. His nephew or brothers sonne (I say) Antigonus, of all the honourable friends that Philip had, was the onely man that continued fast and firme unto him without all corruption. But this his loyall fidelitie and truth caused Perseus to be no friend of his, but rather the most mortall enemy that he had in the world. This said Antigonus foreseeing in his spirit, in what daungerous tearmes he should stand, when the inheritance of the kingdome were devolved upon Perseus, waiting his first time and opportunities; when he perceived that the kings mind was troubled, & that now and then he fetched deepe sighes for sorrow that his sonne was dead; one while would give eare onely to the kings words, otherwhiles also would find some talk & minister occasion to speak of the act so rashly & unadvisedly committed. Oftentimes he followed & seconded him in his mones & complaints, and would be thought to lament with him for company. And (as Truth useth alwaies to give many signs & tokens of her selfe comming to light) he would enforce and helpe forward every small thing what he could, to the end that all might the sooner be discovered and breake forth. The chiefe ministers and instruments of this vilanous fact, were Apelles and Philocles, who were the embassadours sent to Rome, and had brought those pernicious letters, under the name of Flamininus, which wrought the death of Demetrius. For commonly it was given out through all the kings court, that those were falsified letters, forged by his Secretarie, and sealed with a counterfeit signet. But the thing being rather deeply suspected, than apparently detected, it chanced that Antigonus upon a time met with Xyechus, and laying hold upon him, arrested his bodie, and brought him into the kings house; and when he had left him in the safe custodie of certaine persons, hee went himselfe directly to Philip. It should seeme to mee, and if it please your grace. (quoth hee) by many words

A which I have observed, that you would spend a great deale to know the whole truth as touching your two sonnes, and bee resolved whether of them twaine it was that laid wait to take away the life of the other. Now the onely man of all other that can undoe the knot and clear this doubt, is in your hands forth comming, and that is Xyechus. Herewith hee advised the king to call before him the said partie, since that (as it fel out) he was already brought into the court. Sent for he was and presented before the king; & being asked the question, he denied every thing at the first; but with such inconstancie, as it appeared evidently, that upon some little fear of torture offered unto him, he would be readie to bewray all: for at the very sight of the tormentour and the scourges, he relented. Then he disclosed & shewed in order the whole proceeding & maner of this wicked practise and villanie, how it was wrought as well by the embassadours, as also by his own selfe their minister. Immediately there were some of purpose sent to apprehend the said embassadours. And B Philocles who was present in the way, they surprised and took of a suddain: as for Apelles (who had ben sent to pursue one Chereas) being advertised how that Xyechus had bewraied & told all, sailed over into Italie. As concerning Philocles, there is no certaintie knowne. Some report, that at the beginning hee denied the matter stoutly: but after that Xyechus was brought to his face and confronted him, he stood no longer in it. Others say againe, that being put to torture, he endured the paines, and continued still in the deniall. Philips sorrow and griefe was by this meanes renewed and redoubled, reputing himselfe more unhappie in his sons, and his miserie the greater, in that one of them was now dead and gone. Perseus being certified that all was discovered, tooke himselfe for a greater and mightier person, than to feare and thinke it needfull for him to flie upon it. And therefore hee sought onely to keepe farre ynough out of the way, purposing to stand upon his guard all the while that his father lived, and avoid the flaming fire (as it were) of his burning choler. Philip seeing that hee could not possibly come by his person for to execute justice, thought upon that which onely remained to bee done, and studied how Per-seus besides impunitie, should not bee recompensed and rewarded also for that his wickednesse. Hee called therefore Antigonus before him, unto whom hee was bounden and beholden already, for bringing to light the unnaturall murder committed upon Demetrius his sonne; and of whom he conceived this opinion, in regard of the fresh and late glorie of his unckle Antigonus, that the Macedonians should have no cause to be ashamed or repent, if they had him for to bee their king. And in this wise hee brake with him: Since my unhappie fortune is such (quoth D he) Antigonus, that I ought (contrarie to all other fathers) to wish my selfe childlesse, I have a mind and purpose to make over unto you that kingdome, which I received at the hands of your uncle, which hee preserved and kept, yea, and augmented for my behoofe during the time of my nonage, and wherein (whiles I was under his guardianship) he bare himselfe not onely valiant, but also true and faithfull unto me. No man I have but you, whom I can esteeme worthie to wear the croune; and if I knew of none at all, yet had I rather that both it and the realme perished and were extinct for ever, than Perseus should enjoy it as the guerdon of his ungracious and divel-lish fact. I shall imagine yet that Demetrius is risen from death to life, I shall thinke that I have the fruition of him againe, if I may leave you in his place, you I say, the onely man of all others that wept for the death of the poore innocent young man, and lamented for my unhappy er-E ror and unfortunat trespass. After this speech with Antigonus, he never ceased to entertaine and grace him in the face of the world with all kind of honour that hee could devise. For seeing that Perseus was in Thrace, Philip went in progresse to every citie of Macedonie, and recommended Antigonus to all the princes and States thereof. And without all doubt, if God had given him longer life but a little, hee would have enstalled him in full possession of the kingdome. Well, to returne againe unto Demetrias, where hee wintered (as before is said) hee departed from thence, and sojourned a long time in Thessalonica. From thence after hee was come to Amphipolis, he was surprised with a grievous maladie. Howbeit certain it was and very apparant, that he was more sicke in mind than bodie; and that ever and anon the remembrance and object, the apparition and ghost of his sonne, whome he caused (innocent as he was) to be F done to death, followed and haunted him so continually with care and griefe, that hee was out of all sleep and could not lay his eyes together: yea it drove him into raving, cursing, and execration of Perseus his other son; and so he ended his daies. But although Philip died somewhat with the soonest for Antigonus, yet he would have gone very neer to have stept into his throne, if either the kings death had immediatly beene divulged abroad, or that Antigonus had then been about the court that he might have had intelligence thereof. For Calligenes the kings Phisician, who had the cure of him, staied not until the breath was fully out of the kings bodie; but so soon as he perceived that his state was desperat, upon the first deadly signes that he observed, sent messengers post to Perseus, who were set of purpose in places convenient, according as it was complotted between them twain: but he concealed the kings death from all them that were not of the house, until he was come. By which means Perseus surprised them all before they looked for him, or knew abroad that the king was departed, and thus he took the crowne upon him by policie, which he had purchased with mischiefe.

The death of Philip fell out very wel to give some delay and respite, and to gather more forces for the waging of war: for the nation of the Bastarnæ having ben a long time solicited thereto, departed out of their owne countrie, and with a great power as well of foot as horse, came on this side the river Ister*. Now there were arrived before to advertise the king hereof, Antigonus and Cotto. This Cotto was a noble man among the Bastarnians. And Antigonus was full against his will joined in embassage & sent with Cotto to raise the Bastarnians. Howbeit not far from Amphipolis they met with news (but very uncertain) of the kings death: which occurrence troubled the whole court of their designs. For thus it was complotted, that Philip should give the Bastarnæ safe passage through Thrace and find them victuals: to the effecting and performance wherof, he had entertained the peeres and principall States of those quarters with presents, and assured them upon his fidelitie, that the Bastarnians should passe through their countrie peaceably without any harme doing. Now his intent and full purpose was, to extinguish utterly the nation of the Dardaniens, and to plant the Bastarnians in their countrie. Hereby he aimed at a twofold commoditie: the one was this; that the Dardaniens (a people most malicious ever to the Macedonians, and who alwaies in time of the troubles & adversities of the kings, took their vantage to annoy them) might bee rooted out: the other, that the said Bastarnæ leaving their wives and children in Dardania, might be sent to wast and spoile Italie. Now were they to passe to the Adriaticke sea & so to Italie, by the way of the Scordiscians (for other way there was none to lead an armie) and soon would they, thought he, grant passage unto the Bastarnians: for they differed not at all, either in language, or manners & fashions: & more than that, they were like enough to joyne with them in the expedition, seeing they went to the conquest & pillage of a most rich and wealthy nation. These designements were accommodated & fitted to what events soever should happen. For in case the Bastarnians should happen to be defeated by the Romanes and put all to the sword; yet this would bee a comfort againe; that the Dardaniens were consumed from the face of the earth, that he should meet with a boorie of that which the Bastarnians left behind them; and finally, have the possession free and entire to himselfe of all Dardania. But in case their fortune were to have the upper hand, then whiles the Romans were averted from him, & amused upon the war with the Bastarnians, he should be able to recover whatsoever he had lost in Greece. These had ben the designs projected by K. Philip. So they entred peaceably, & marched without hostilitie, under the word and promise of Cotto and Antigonus. But shortly after that newes came of the death of Philip; neither were the Thracians so tractable and easie to be dealt withall in commerce and traffike: for the Bastarnians could be content with that which they bought with their money, or be kept in order as they marched, but that they would break their ranks and turne out of the direct way. Hereupon they began to do wrong & injurie on both sides one unto another: which increasing daily more & more to outrages, kindled the fire of an open war. In the end, the Thracians not able to endure the violence and multitudes of these enemies, leaving their villages in the plaines beneath, retired to an exceeding high mountaine called Donuca. To which place, when the Bastarnians would have gone: behold notwithstanding they approached to the tops and ridge of the hills, they were surprised with a storme and tempest, much like to that wherewith the Gauls (as it is reported) perished at what time as they were a spoiling and pilling the temple at Delphi. For they were not onely drenched first with shoures of raine pouring upon them, pelted afterwards with thicke stormes of hailestones, stricken with great cracks of thunder, and blasted with leames of lightning that dazzeled their eyesight: but also the lightning flashed so upon them on every side, that it seemed they were charged and shot directly against their bodies: so as not onely the common souldiers, but also the principall leaders and chieftaines themselves were smitten downe therewith and overthrowne. VVherupon when they were scattered and would have fled down the hill, from the exceeding steep rocks they tumbled downe

* Dardaniens.

A downe they knew not how with their heads forward. And albeit the Thracians pursued them thus skared and affrighted, yet they had nothing in their mouth, but That the gods forced them to run away, and that the skie fell upon them. Being thus disparted with this tempestuous storme, and returned as it were out of a shipwracke into the campe from whence they set forth, and most of them but halfe armed, they began to debate in counsell what to doe. Heereupon arose some dissension among them: whiles part were of opinion to returne backe into their own countrie; and part advised to follow the way still and pearce forward into Dardania. About thirtie thousand persons went through under the conduct of Claudius: the rest of the multitude returned the same way they came into the parts beyond Danubius*. Perseus being possessed of the kingdome, commanded Antigonus to be put to death: and whiles hee was setting the states in order, & establishing himself in his own seat, he sent embassadours to Rome, as well to renew the amitie that his father had with the Romanes, as also to request that he might be styled with the name of king by the Senate of Rome. And these were the affaires in Macedonie that yeere.

* Danubius.

Q. Fulvius the other Consull triumphed over the Ligurians: and known it was for certaine, that this triumph was graunted unto him more for favour, than for any great exploit of his that might deserve such honour. He carried in shew a mightie deale of the enemies armor: but little or no money at all. Howbeit he dealt among his souldiours thirtie Asses a peece: to everie Centurion he gave twice as much; and to each gentleman serving on horseback, the same threefold. There was nothing in this triumph more memorable and worthie the noting, than this, that as it fell out, hee triumphed now the very same day that he had the yeere before upon his Pretourship. After his triumph, he published the generall assembly for the election of Magistrates: wherein where created Consuls, M. Junius Brutus, and A. Manlius Volso. This done, when there had bene three of the Pretours elected, a suddaine tempest brake up and dissolved the assembly. The morrow after, which was *fourte daies full before the Ides of March, the other three were chosen, namely Marcus Titinius Curius, Titus Claudius Nero, and T. Fonteius Capito. The Roman games were exhibited again the second time, by the two Ædiles of the Chaire, Cn. Servilius Cæpio, and Ap. Claudius Cento, by occasion of certaine prodigies that hapned: for there was an earth-quake; and in the publike pavilions and tabernacles, where the sacred beds of the gods were solemnly spread, the heads of the gods which were laid in those beds, turned away of their owne accord, and the wooll together with the other coverlets which were

* Ante quartum Idus Martii, the 12 of March.

D laid before Jupiter fell downe. It was taken also for a prodigious wonder, that the mice and rats had gnawne and tasted before of the olives upon the table [of Jupiter]: for the satisfaction & expiation of which prodigies, nothing else was done, but the solemnizing of those games and plaies againe, as is aforesaid.

THE XLI. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the one and fortith Booke.

THe fire in the temple of Vesta went out. Tib. Sempronius Gracchus the Proconsull, vanquished the Celtiberians, and received their submission, and for a memoriall of the worthe deeds by him achieved, he built a towne in Spaine called Gracchinis. Postumius Albinus the Proconsull, subdued the Yaccans and Lusitanes: and both of them triumphed. Antiochus, the sonne of king Antiochus, whome his father had given in hostage to the Romans, after the death of his brother Seleucus, who succeeded his father late deceased, was sent from Rome into the realme of Syria. The Censors held a review and numbering of the citizens, and solemnly purged the citie. There were enrolled in their booke, of Roman citizens 273244. Q. Voconius Saxa, a Tribune of the Commons, published a law, That no man should make a woman to be his full brei. M. Cato was the man that persuaded and spoke for this law, and his Oratium is extant. Moreover this booke containeth the waives and exploits of many capitaines against the Ligurians, Istrians, Sardinians, and Celtiberians: also the occasions and causes of the Macedonian warre, which Perseus the sonne of Philip began: for he had sent an embassage to the Carthaginians, which they gave audience unto in the night season. Other states also and cities of Greece he solicited. This Perseus setting religion aside (for many stately and magnificent temples he built in divers places, and namely at Athens, to Iupiter Olympius: and at Antiochia, to Iup. Capitolinus) was otherwise a king of most base demeanour and carriage.

THe beginning of this booke, and the greater part thereof immediatly ensuing, is lost. Imprimis, As touching the disposition of the provinces by lot, as well of Consuls as Pretors; and namely, how the government of Gaule fell to A. Manlius, and of Liguria to M. Junius: and how of the Pretours, M. Titinius was assigned to the hither province of Spaine, and T. Fonteius to the farther; Nero to Etruria, T. Ebutius to Sardinia. Item, as concerning the fire of Vesta, the exploits of Tib. Gracchus and L. Albinus in * Biskai and * Portugall: the survey and taxing of the cittie of Rome holden by the Censors; the law Voconia, as touching the inheritance of women, mentioned in Cicero, in S. Angustine de civitate Dei, and others: finally, of the acts achieved by M. Junius about Genoway. And thus it sheweth a praeupt and broken front as yefsee.

To have armed the same, which in peace he had received of his father: and for that cause it is said, That hee was passing well beloved of the youth and lustie gallants, who desired nothing more than to spoile and raise booties.

Now when the Consull was in deliberation with his counsell, as touching warre in Istria, some were of opinion, to proceed thereunto incontinently, before that the enemies could assemble their forces; others advised, to consult first with the Senate: but their counsell imported, who were for speedie expedition. So the Consull dislodged from Aquileia, and encamped near the lake Timavus, which lyeth hard by the sea. Thither came Caius Furius (one of the navall Duumvirs) with ten ships: for two such Duumvirs or wardens had been chosen, to make head against the Illyrian fleet: who with twentie ships in all, keeping the upper sea, were to guard the sea-coasts

A sea-coasts so, as they had Ancona (as it were) the middle centre betwene: for L. Cornelius tooke the charge of all that lay on the right hand thereof, as farre as to Tarentum; and C. Furius of the left, unto Aquileia. These ten vessels (I say) were sent to the next port, against the marches of Istria, with other ships of burden fraughted with store of victuals and provision. The Consull followed after with his legions, and pitched his campe five miles from the sea. And within a short time, there was a good and frequent market kept in the port, from whence there was conveyed all manner of provision into the campe. And to the end that this might hold in more securitie, good guards were set about the camp on every side. Toward Istria there was one standing frontier garrison, consisting of a cohort of Placentines, levied on a sodaine, opposed and lodged betwene the sea and the campe. And to the end the same might serve for a guard to defend them that watered at the river, M. Ebutius (a colonell of the two legions) was commaunded to adjoyne two squadrons of souldiours out of the second legion. T. and C. both Aelij, (colonels likewise) had led the third legion, by the way that goeth to Aquileia, which should guard the foragers and fewellers. From which quarter about a mile distant was the camp of the French. And a certaine pettie king there was among them, one Carmelus, having the conduct of three thousand armed souldiours, or somewhat more. So soone as the Romans were approached, the lake Timavus from their campe, the Istrians set them downe secretly in a close place behind a little hill; and from thence followed the Roman armie as it marched, by crosse and crooked waies, espying and lying for all advantages that might be presented: for intelligence they had of all that was done either at sea or by land. And when they perceived upon a time the corps de guard before the campe feeble and weake, and that there was a great number of unarmed merchants betwene the campe and the sea, without any defense at all either from land or water, they ran at once upon the two foresaid guards, to wit, the Placentine cohort, and also the squadrons of the second legion. Now their enterprise at the beginning was covered and hidden by occasion of a morning mist, which at the first warmth of the sunne brake and scattered away, and then began somewhat to appeare through it: but the light was not yet cleere and come to the full; by reason whereof every thing (as commonly in such a case) shewed farre bigger than it was. And this at that time mightily deceived the Romans, causing the armie of the enemies to seeme the greater by many degrees. At which sight, the souldiours of the one guard as well as the other being affrighted, fled into the campe with a great tumult and alarme, and there caused far more feare than they brought with them: for neither were they able to tell why they fled thus as they did, nor give a readie answer to those that asked them the question. Over & besides, a great noise they heard from the campe gates, as where there was no sufficient guard to sustaine the first assault. Besides, their running thus huddle together in the darke, while one tumbled upon another, made such a confusion, that they knew not whither the enemy was within the rampier or no. No other crye was heard but this; To sea, To sea. For by occasion that one souldiour at adventure began to set up that note, all the campe presently rung againe therewith, from one end to the other. Whereupon at first, (as if they had beene commaunded so to doe) to the sea they ran, some few armed, but the most part without any armour or weapons: afterwards more, and consequently at last in manner all; yea and the Consull himselfe, seeing that he laboured in vaine to reclaim them, backe he fled, and could prevaile neither by command nor authority, ne yet with praiers in the end; onely M. Licinius Strabo (a Tribune or Colonell of the third legion, abandoned of his owne legion) remained behind with three ensignes and no more. The Istrians finding him alone, (for no man else was seene in armes to make resistance) entred joyntly into the campe, ran upon him (and as he was embattailing his souldiours and encouraging them in the quarter about the Pretour his lodging) surpris'd, and with numbers over-charged him. The skirmish and fight was more cruell, than for proportion of so few defendants; and not ended, before that the Tribune himselfe and those about him, were slaine every man. The Generall his pavilion and all about it, was overthrowne: which when the enemy had ransacked and rifled of all that was there, they went as farre as the treasurers lodging, the market place, and to the gate Quintana: where they found abundance of all things set out readie for their hands, and within the treasurers pavilion the tables spread and covered with good carres & meat upon them. Then their chiefe lord and leader (the pettie king aforesaid) made no more adoe but fate him downe, fell to his victuals and made good cheere; and anon all the rest following his example, did the semblable, and never once thought of armes or of enemies; and like to those who were not wont to fare so well and feed liberally, they greedily overcharged their bellies with wine and viands: but the Romanes all the while stood in farre other tearmes. They trembled, they went hastily to their businesse both on land and sea. Downe went the shipmen and sailors with their tilts and boothies; and looke what provision of victuals or other things were set forth to sale upon the strand and shore, they harried and hurried a shipbord: the souldiours all affrighted ran amaine to the sea side, for to be embarked. The mariners fearing least their vessels should bee overcharged, some put backe the prease and withstood them for committing in, others shove off from the wharfe, and launched into the deep. Hereupon began a braule and broile, and from that they fell together by the eares, souldiours and mariners, one with another: some went away with knockes and wounds, and others left their lives behind them; untill at length, by the Confull his commaundement, the fleet was retired farre from the land. Which done, hee began to fort the armed and unarmed apart. And hardly were there (of so great a multitude) twelve hundred found with armour about them, and very few horsemen that had brought their horses with them. All the rest were a confused and disordered companie, resembling the rascall sort of camp-followers, as victuallers, launders, skillions and lackies: who had beene a readie bootie to have followed upon, in case the enemies could have thought upon any feats of armes. Then at last came a messenger to recall the third legion, and to surprize the guard of the Gaules; and with that, from all parts they began to returne againe toward their owne campe, for to recover it, and wipe away and fardoe the shamefull blot and dishonour which they had received. The Colonels of the third legion commaunded the souldiours to throw down upon the ground their forrage and sewell, they charged the Centurions to set the elder and unweldie souldiours two and two upon the horses and labouring beasts which they had discharged of their load; & willed the horsemen to take up behind them every one a young lustie footman; shewing what an honor it would be to the third legion, for to regaine by their valor the camp, which had been lost by the cowardise and fear of thole in the second: and easily (say they) may it be won againe, if the Barbarians, whiles they are encombred with the pillage, might bee surprized at unware, and bectaken themselves, like as they overtooke others before. This exhortation was received with great alacritie and contentment of the souldiours. Aloft were the ensignes born and advanced apace, neither staid the port-ensignes one whit for the souldiours. Howbeit the Confull and those companies which were brought from the sea, came first to the rampier. L. Atilius a principall Centurion of the second legion, not onely encouraged the souldiours, but made remonstrance unto them, That if the Iltians these victors, had ever meant to guard and keepe the campe with the same force of armes by which they had won it, they would at the first have pursued the enemies to the sea, so soone as they had turned them out of their tents; and afterwards have set a good corps de guard, at leastwise before the rampier and the avenues therof: but like ynough it is (saith hee) that with guzzelling wine they were dead asleepe like beasts. And herewith he commaunded A. Baculenius his owne ensign-bearer, a man of approved valor and singular prowes, to advance his banner forward. Marry, that I shall (quoth he) full soone, if you will follow me alone that the thing may bee done more quickly. With that he forced his whole strength, and having flung the ensigne over the trench into the campe, hee was the first himselfe that entered at the campe gate. On another part likewise T. & C. both Aelii, and colonels of the third legion, were come with their Cavallerie: then presently followed those also whom they had horsed two by two upon the labouring jades and garrons for cariage, and after them the Confull with his whole armie. But of the Iltians some few there were (such as were not stark drunk) whose wits and memorie served them to run away; the rest were dead asleepe indeed, and never awoke again. So the Romanes recovered all their goods, save only the wine and victuals which was devoured and consumed. The Romanes souldiours who were crasie and sicke, and had beene left in the campe, after they perceived their owne fellows within the rampier, found their hands againe, caught up weapons, and made a great carnage and execution. But above all others C. Popilius, surnamed Sabellus, a gentleman and cavallier of Rome, bare himselfe most bravely that day, who being left in the campe (because hee was hurt and maimed in one of his feet) slew the greatest number of the enemies, by farre. Eight thousand Iltians fell upon the edge of the sword, and not one taken prisoner alive: for the choler and despiteous indignation of the souldiours was such, as they had no mind at all of prizes and booties. Howbeit, the king of the Iltians, drunke as hee was, had so good fortune as to bee taken from the very bound where hee sat, and hastily mounted on horse backe by his men, and so fled away and escaped. Of the winners there perished in all two hundred thirtie seven souldiours: and of them, more died in their morning flight than in the recovery of their campe. Now it chanced so, that Cn. and L. both named Gravili, new coloners and inhabitants of Aquileia, as they came with victuals, had like to have stumbled ignorantly upon the campe, when it was taken and possessed by the Iltians. They being retired backe in great hast to Aquileia, leaving their cariage behind them, set all on a fright and uprore, not onely at Aquileia but also at Rome within few daies after: for thither was the rumour run, That not onely the campe was forced by the enemies, and (which was true indeed) the Romans put to flight, but that all was lost, and the armie utterly defeated. Whereupon, as the manner was in all suddaine tumults and alarmes, writs went forth for musters and levies of souldiours extraordinarily, not in the cittie onely, but also throughout all Italic. Two legions of Roman citizens were enrolled, and the Latine allies were commaunded to set out ten thousand foot with three hundred horse. M. Iunius the Confull had commaundement to passe over into Gallia, and to levie of the citties & States of that province, as many as they were able to make and furnish. It was ordained withall, that T. Clandius the Pretour should make proclamation, that the souldiours of the fourth legion, and of the Latine allies five thousand foot and two hundred and fiftie horse, should meet together at Pisæ; and that in the absence of the Confull he should defend that province: also that M. Titinius the Pretour should appoint the Rendez-vous at Ariminum; that the first legion, and the like number of allies, as well foot as horse, should there assemble. Then Nero tooke his journey, clad in his rich coat of arms, toward Pisæ his province. And Titinius having to Ariminum Caius C. Caisius a Colonell, to take the conduct of the legion there, tooke musters at Rome. M. Iunius the Confull passed out of Liguria into Gaule, and arrived at Aquileia, having levied aid-soldiours as he went, of all the cities of Gaul & the Colonies, to be in readinesse out of hand. There he was certified that the armie was safe and found: whereupon hee dispatched his letters to Rome to advertise them that they should not trouble themselves any more with this false alarme, and himselfe after he had discharged the Gaules of those aids which hee had imposed upon them, went to his companion in government. Great was the joy at Rome, comming thus as it did unlooked for. The musters were laid aside, the souldiours discharged who were enrolled and had taken their militarie oath, and the armie visited with the plague at Ariminum was dismissed and sent home. The Iltians albeit they were encamped with a great strength of armed men, not farre from the Confull his campe, after they heard once that the Confull was come with a new armie, disbanded and slipt every man away on all sides to their severall cities, and the Consuls retired with their legions to Aquileia, there to winter.

When these troubles of Iltia were thus at length appeased, there went forth an act of the Senat, That the Consuls should agree betwene themselves, whether of them twaine was to return to Rome for to hold the assembly for election of magistrates. At what time as A. Licinius Nerva, and C. Papirius Turdus, two Tribunes of the Commons, in all their Orations to the people, inveighed bitterly against Manlius in his absence, and promulged a law to this effect, That after the Ides of March (for the Consuls had their governments already prorogued for one whole yeare) he should continue no longer in place, to the end, that so soone as he was out of his office, he might presently be called to his answer judicially. Quintus Aelius, one of their Colleagues, withstood this bill by them proposed, and after much debate and contention prevailed so much, that it passed not.

About the same time Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, and L. Posthumus Albinus, being returned out of Spain to Rome, had audience given them by the Pretour M. Titinius in the temple of Bellona, there to discourse of the acts by them achieved, to demand their deserved honours, to the end that praise and thanksgiving also should be rendered to the immortall gods. Moreover, at the very same time intelligence was given by letters from T. Ebutius the Pretor, which his son brought and shewed to the Senat, of great troubles in Sardinia: Namely, that the Iltians, joining unto them the strength of the Balari, had invaded the province standing in peaceable tearmes: neither was hee able to make head against them with so feeble an armie as hee had, and the same wasted and consumed much with the pestilence. The same newes related the embassadours likewise of the Sardinians, making humble suite to the Senat, to releve and succour their citties at leastwise, for that their villages & countrey townes were already past helpe. This embassage, with all other matters concerning Sardinia, put over to the new magistrates; as pittifull an embaf-fige also was presented unto them from the Lycians, who complained greivously of the Rhodians, unto whom they had bene annexed and made subjects by L. Cornelius Scipio: Indeed (say they) we lived sometime under the signorie of K. Antiochus, but that servitude of ours under the king, compared to this present state and condition wherein wee now are, seemeth unto us an excellent libertie: for not onely are we now yoked and kept under publicke authoritie in general, by taxes, levies, and impositions, but every one in particular endureth meere bondage and slavery. Our selves are abused, yea and our wives and children suffer villanies before our eyes: upon our bodies, our backs and sides they worke upon and discharge their humour of crueltie: in our good name (an indignitie unsupportable) we are defamed, depraved, and defamed: yea openly in the face of the world, they cease not to commit outrages against us, even to usurpe & extend their authoritie over us, and to trie maisteries upon us with extremities: to the end that we Lycians might bee put out of all doubt, that there is no difference betwene us and slaves bought and sold for silver in ower market. The Senate mooved with their remonstrances by the Lycians, addrested their letters to the Rhodians to this effect, that it was no part of their meaning and intent, that the Lycians should be slaves to the Rhodians: or that any other borne free, should be enthralled by any person. But their will was, that the Lycians should in such realmes live under the government and protection of the Rhodians, that both itaies, the one as well as the other, might range and frame themselves like good associates under the dominion and empire of Rome.

After this followed two triumphs over Spaine, one immediatly upon another: first, Sempronius Gracchus over the Celtiberians: & the morrow after, L. Posthumus Albinus over the Lusitanians and other Spaniards of those parts. Tib. Gracchus carried in shew 40000 pound weight of silver: and Albinus twentie thousand. Both of them divided among their souldiers twentie five Denarij a peece, to each Centurie the same duple, and triple to every horseman. Thus did they also by allies as well as by Romanes.

It fortuned about that time, that M. Iunius the Consul, came out of Istria to Rome, by occasion of the election which was to be holden: and when the two Tribunes of the commons, Pa. ppius and Licinius, had in the presence of the Senate baited and wearied him with interrogatories, as touching the affaires passed in Istria, they brought him forth also before the bodie of the people. To which questions, after that the Consull had answered, how hee had not bene above 11 daies in the Province: & as for the things that hapned in his absence, he knew no otherwise than they did, only by the common bruit & report: then, they went on urging him still, asking how it came to passe, that A. Manlius rather came not to Rome, to give account unto the State, why he passed out of Gaule (which was his allotted province) into Istria: & to shew, when it was that either the Senat decreed, or the people of Rome granted by their voices to enterprise that war? But haply it may be said (qud. he) that albeit the war was undertaken onely upon his own head alone: yet no doubt, executed it was right worthily with policie and valour. Nay ywis, but farre contrariwise: & hard it is to say, whether it were begun more lewdly, than managed incon siderately. Two entier corps de guards were on a sodaine at unawares surprisid by the Istrians: the Romane camp was forced and taken, with all the strength of horse and foot that was therein: the rest scattered without armes, and the Consull himselfe was the formost man that ran away to the sea side unto the ships: and surely hee should render an account of all these matters, when he is a private person againe, since that he would not do it being Consull. This storme past, the generall assembly for the magistrates election was holden: wherein were created Consuls, C. Claudius Pulcher, and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus. The next day following were the Pretors chosen: to wit, P. Aelius Tubero the second time, C. Quintius Flaminius, C. Numisius, C. Mummius, Cn. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Valerius Levinus. The civile jurisdiction of the cittie fell to Tubero, the forreine to Quintius. The government of Sicilie was allotted to Numisius: of Sardinia to Mummius. Howbeit this province by reason of the great warre therein became the charge of a Consull. And by lot it fell to Gracchus: but Istria to Claudius his colleague. Gaule was divided into two provinces; wherof Scipio by lot obtained one, and Levinus the other.

Vpon the Ides of March, on which day Sempronius and Claudius entred their Consulship, mooved it was onely in the Senate, as touching Sardinia and Istria, and the enemies to both those provinces, who there had levied warre. But the morrow after, the embassadours of the Sardinians being referred over to the new magistrates, & L. Minutius Thermus who had bene Lieute.

A lieutenant to the Consull Manlius in Istria, entred into the Senat-houfe. By them the Senate was informed how daungerous the warres were in those provinces. Mooved likewise were the Senatours by the embassies of the Latine allies, who in the end were admitted into the Senate, after they had importuned the Censors and Consuls of the former yeere: the summe of their complaints was this, That their owne cittizens being once enrolled at Rome, were most of them departed and remooved thither to dwell: which if it might be suffred, within few re views and lessings it would come to passe, that their citties should be dispeopled and desolat, their villages and fields desart and wast, and able to set out no souldiours for the warres. Sem blably the Samnites and Pelignians complained, that foure thousand households were gone from them, and retired to Fregellæ; and yet neither the one nation or the other, were set at a lesse proportion of souldiours in all their levies. Two cauteious meanes and devises there were brought up, whereby men chaunged thus their cities at pleasure. The law graunted this indul gence to the allies of the Latine nation, as many as left yssue of their rase behind them in their house, That they should be reputed cittizens of Rome. By abusing this law, some did injurie to their allies, other wronged the people of Rome: for, both they that were to leave such yssue at home, gave their children as it were in villenage to some Romane citizen or other whom they liked, with condition to manumise and make them free, that they might be tribes or enfran chised cittizens. And they also who wanted yssue to leave behind them, were held as citizens of Rome. But in proceffe of time without any of these colorable pretenes of right, without regard of law and respect of yssue, they crept in and had the benefit of the Burgeoisie and freedome of Rome, by their transmigration thither to inhabite, by enrolment in the reviews. To meet with these practises, the embassadours craved a remedie for the time to come: as also that they would peremptorily commaund all their allies to repaire againe to their own citties: with an expresse inhibition, that no man should receive any other to be his vassalle and villaine, and so to alienate him, with intention by that meanes to chaunge the cittie wherein he lived: and that who soever became cittizens of Rome after that maner, should not be counted for a citizen. These petitions were graunted by the Senate. Then were decrees passed for those provinces of Istria and Sardinia which were in armes, to wit, for the enrolling of two legions into Sardinia, having either of them five thousand and two hundred foot, and three hundred horse, besides twelve thousand footmen, and 600 horsemen of the Latine allies; and ten quinquiremes or galea- D ces, with five banks of oares, in case the Generall would warpe them out of the arcanall. The like number as well of the Infanterie as Cavallerie, was assigned for Istria. The Consuls also were enjoyned to send to M. Titinius in Spaine, one legion with 300 horse, besides 5000 footmen of allies, and 250 horsemen.

Before that the Coss cast lots for their provinces, certaine prodigies were reported. Name ly, that in the territorie of Crustumium, there fell from heaven a stone into the lake of Mars: That in the territorie of Rome, there was an infant born like a very stumpe, without head, feet, or hands: and a snake or serpent scene four footed. That in the market-place of Capua, many houses were smitten with thunderbolts and lightning. Also at Putcoli two ships were set on fire by lightning, and burnt. Whiles these prodigious wonders were by others related, there was E scene a wolfe also in the day time at Rome, which having entred at the gate Collina, after much coursing and hunting, with much adoe and noise of them that followed the chase, escaped away from them all, and passed through the Esquiline gate. In regard of these strange tokens, the Consuls killed greater beasts for sacrifice: and for one whole day, a solemne supplication and praiers were made at all the shrines and altars of the gods. These sacrifices done and past, accordingly as it appertained, the Consuls cast lots for their provinces: and to Claudius be fell Istria, to Sempronius Sardinia.

After this, C. Claudius published a law by vertue of an ordinance of the Senate, in favour of allies, and proclaimed, That those allies, & namely of the Latine nation, who either themselves or their ancestors, had ben enrolled among the Latine allies, during the Censorship of Marcus F. Claudius, and Titus Quintius, or any time afterwards, should make returne every man into his owne cittie, before the first day of November next ensuing. And Lucius Mummius the Pretour had in commiission to enquire and search for those that returned not accordingly. To this law and edict above said of the Consull, an Act also of the Senate was adjoy ned, That the Dictatour, Consull, Interregent, Censor, and lord cheefe justice in the common pleas for the time being, should endeavour and take order, that whosoever were manumifed and made free, should take an oth, That he who manumifed or enfranchifed him, did it not with any intent, for to exchange the citie wherein he was : and looke who would not thus sweare, him they thought not worthe to be manumifed. But his charge and iurisdiction was afterwards committed to C. Claudius the Confull.

Whiles these affaires passed at Rome, M. Junius and A. Manlius, who had been Consuls the yeere before, having wintered in Aquileia, in the beginning of the Spring entered with an armie into the frontiers of Istria. Where, as they made waite and spoile farre and neere as they went, the Istrians entered into a commotion and tooke armes, rather upon greefe of heart and indignation to see their goods thus pilled and ransacked, than for any assured hope they had of their sufficiency to make head against two armies. Having therefore raised a concourse of their able youth from all their cities and States, they assembled in hast a suddaine and tumultuarie armie, which at the first gave battell, and fought more in heat of courage, than with persistence of resolution. In conflict there were slaine of them to the number of foure thousand; the rest abandoned all warre, and fled here and there into their cities. From thence they sent embassadors first into the Roman campe to crave peace, and then the hostages which were demanded. After intelligence given at Rome of these newes by the letters of the Proconsuls, C. Claudius the Confull fearing least this occurrence might put him by the government of his province and the conduct of the armie, without solemne praiers and vowes made, without his Lictors clad in their coats of armes, departed sodainly in great hast (all of the head) by night toward his province, and made no man privie thereto, but onely his colleague. His voyage thither was not so rash and inconsiderate, but his carriage there, was more foolish and undiscreeit: for beeing thither come, he assembled a generall audience; where, after hee had very unseasonably reproached Manlius for his running away out of the campe, (to the great discontentment of the soldiours, who were the first that fled;) and with opprobrious tearmes shaken up M. Junius also for taking part in this dishonour with his companion: in the end hee commaunded them both to avoid out of the province. Whereupon the soldiours made answer againe, and said, That they would then obey the Consuls commaundement, when (according to the aunient custome of their fore-fathers) he had made his solemne vowes within the Capitoll; and then taken his leave and departed out of the citie, accompanied with his Huishers in their rich cotes of armes, warlike. Hereat he was so farre enraged with anger, that he called upon the treasurers deputie belonging to Manlius, for chaines and gyves, and menaced to send Junius and Manlius both bound to Rome. But the deputie likewise made as little reckoning of the Consuls commaundement: and the more animated hee was to disobey the Confull, by reason that he was backed by the whole hoast round about him; who as they supported the cause of their captaines and leaders, so they hated the Confull at the heart. In conclusion, the Confull beeing loden and wearied with the contumelious and railing behaviour of every one in particular, and with the frumps and taunts of the multitude in generall (for they stuck not over and besides to mocke him and make a laughing stocke of him) he went his waies againe to Aquileia, in the same ship wherein he came. From thence he wrote unto his colleague by an edict, to charge those new soldiours who were enrolled for Istria, to meet at Aquileia: to the end, that no business should keepe him at Rome, but that with all speed he might depart from the citie in his coat of armes, and after he had conceived and pronounced his vowes accordingly. His companion in office was well content, and did all these things requisite full willingly: and a short day was assigned for the assembling of the soldiours at the Rendezvous above-named. But Claudius was at Rome well-neere as soone as his letters; where, at his first comming, he made an oration in the publicke audience of the people, as touching the demeanor of Manlius and Junius; and having staied no longer than three daies at Rome, he set out with his Lictors formally in their cote-armour, when he had made his vowes solemnly in the Capitoll, and so departed into his province again with as much celeritie and hast (if not more) as he came from thence.

Some few daies before, Junius and Manlius began to assault by all forcible means the town Nesatium, into which the principall persons of the Istrians, and Depulo their king, were retired. Claudius, with his two new legions, presented himselfe before the towne; and after hee had discharged the old armies and their commanders, laid siege unto it, and intended to force it with maneriles and engins of batterie. The course also of the river which ran along besideth the walles,

A and not onely empeached the assailants but yeilded water unto the besieged, hee diverted into another new channell, and bestowed many daies worke thereabout. This mightily affrighted the barbarous people, to see how they were cut off from water. Howbeit, they never thought of peace for all this, but fell in hand to kill their wives and children; and when they had so done (because they would present to the view of their enemies, so horrible a fact and fearefull spectacle) they massacred them upon the walles openly in their sight, and then threw them headlong downe. Whiles the sillie women and poore infants (amid their piteous and lamentable cries) were thus cruelly murdered, the Romans souldiours mounted over their walles and entered into the citie. Their king when he once perceived (by the fearefull outcries of those who fled) that the towne was lost; for feare he should be taken alive, stabbed himselfe with his dagger to the heart. All the rest were either taken prisoners or killed. After this, two other townes, Mutila and Faveria, were woen by assault and rased. The pillage was greater than a man would have looked for in so poor a nation: which was bestowed every whit upon the soldiours. Five thousand sixe hundred and two and thirtie persons were sold out-right in port-sale under the guirland. The chieftains of this war were first scourged with rods, and then beheaded. Thus Istria, by the ruine of three townes and the death of their king, was appeased: and all the cities and states therof from every quarter, came in with their hostages, made submission, and did fealtie and homage to the Romanes.

The Istrians war was no sooner ended, but the Ligurians began to complor for to take armes and enter into rebellion. T. Claudius the Proconsull (who the former yeere had been Pretor) was governour and commaunder at that time of Pisa, with a garrison of one legion. The Senat being advertised thereof by his letters, thought good to send the very same letters to C. Claudius (for the other Confull was alreadye passed over into Sardinia;) and withall, a decree was graunted out to this effect, That considering he had performed his commission in Istria, so as there remained no more for him to do there, he should (if he thought so good) transport his armie into Liguria. Moreover, upon the Confull his letters, wherein he wrote what exploits hee had achieved in Istria, there was ordained a solemne proceffion for two daies together. Semblably, the other Confull Tib. Sempronius, managed his affaires as happily in Sardinia: he entered with an armie into the countrey of the Sardinian Ilans. Great aids were come from the Balarans to relieve and succour those Ilans: with both these nations hee fought a battaile in pitched field. The enemies were discomfited and put to flight, turned out of their campe, and twelve thousand armed men slaine. The morrow after, the Confull commaunded all their armour and weapons to be gathered together and laid on an heape; and this he burned as a sacrifice to the honour of Vulcan. Which done, he retired with his victorious armie into the associate cities, there to passe the winter.

C. Claudius likewise, upon receipt of the letters of T. Claudius, and the commission directed from the Senate, marched with his legions out of Istria into Liguria: where, the enemies were come downe into the plaines, and lay encamped neere the river Scultenna. In which place there was a battaile fought: fifteene thousand of them were put to the sword, and not so few as seven hundred taken prisoners, either in the conflict or within the campe; for that also was forced & woen: besides, one and fiftie ensignes they lost. The Ligurians, as many as escaped the execution, fled on all sides to the mountains for refuge; and notwithstanding that the Confull spoiled and wasted their champain country, there was not one man made shew of arms. Thus Claudius having in one yeere vanquished and subdued two nations, and in one Consulship (a rare felicitie in any other man) reduced other two provinces into quietnesse and peace, returned to Rome.

Certaine prodigious and monstrous sights were that yeere reported, to wit, in the territorie of Crustumium, a certeine foule called Sangualis, with her bill pierced into a sacred stone. In Campanie a boeuf spake: at Syracusa a bull that strated out of the fields from the heard, leapt the braken cower there in the city & did his kind. In the territory of Crustumium, there was a supplication & proceffion holden one day long in the very place of the foresaid prodigious sign. In Campanie, the boeuf or cow aforesaid, was put out to be kept & fed at the charges of the citie. Last of all, the prodigie of Syracusa was expiat by a purgatory sacrifice, by direction from the soothsaiers to what gods, supplications and sacrifice should be made. That yeere died M. Claudius Marcellus the bishop, who had been Confull and Censor. In his stead M. Marcellus his sonne was consecrated bishop. Likewise in the same yeere, there was a colonie of two thousand citizens of Rome, planted at Luca. The Triumvirs or the commissioners who had the conduct and placing of them, them, were P. Aelius, L. Egilius, and Cn. Sicinius: one and fiftie acres of land and an halfe was set out for them apeece to occupie, out of the territorie late conquered from the Ligurians, and which had been sometime the possession of the Tuscans, before it was holden by the Ligurians.

Then came the Consull C. Claudius to the citie of Rome, where after he had discoursed before the Senate, as touching the prosperous execution of his affaires, as well in Istria as Liguria, and thereupon demanded a triumph, hee soone obtained that honour; and during his magistracie triumphed at once over those two nations. In which solemnitie of his triumph, hee carried in shew 307000 Deniers, and *85702 Victoriates. He gave to every common [Romane] souldiour fifteen Denarij apeece, a double proportion to the centurions, & thrice as much to every horseman. But upon the allies he bestowed lesse by the one moiety than to naturall citizens: and therefore as they followed his chariot, they were silent & said never a word: a man that had seene them would have said they were malecontent.

*Victoriatius, the same that Quinarius, is the Denarius. It had the image of Victorius stamped upon it.

During the time of this triumph, the Ligurians perceiving that not only the Consull his armie was brought home to Rome, but the legion also at Pisæ discharged by T. Claudius: thinking now all feare past and overblowne, secretly levied a power; and having passed over the crosse frontiers, by traversing the wayes through the mountaines, descended into the downes, and wasted the domaines of Modenna, and by sodaine assault surpris'd the verie colonie. The newes hereof was no sooner arrived at Rome, but the Senate commaunded C. Claudius the Consull to hold the high court for the solemn election, with all convenient speed: that so soon as new annual magistrats were created, hee might returne into his province, and perforce recover this colonie out of their hands. So according to the advise and ordinance of the Senate the said assembly was holden: wherein were elected Consuls Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispanus, and Q. Petilius Spathinus. Then were the Pretors afterwards chosen, to wit, M. Popilius Lenas, P. Licinius Crassus, M. Cornelius Scipio, L. Papyrius Mafso, M. Alburius, and L. Aquilius Gallus. The Consull C. Claudius had his patent sealed againe for one yeere longer, to continue in command of the armie, and government of the province Gallia. And for feare least the Istrians likewise should follow the example of the Ligurians, he had commission to send those allies of the Latine nation, whom he had brought out of his province for to solemnise his triumph.

Vpon that very day, on which the Consuls, Cneus Cornelius and Quintus Petilius entered their magistracie, and sacrificed each of them an ox as the manner was, in the honor of Jupiter: In that beast which Q. Petilius caused to be slaine, the liver was found head-lesse. When hee had reported this accident unto the Senat, he was enjoined to sacrifice another boeuf, for to appease the wrath of the gods. Moved then it was in the Senate house as concerning the provinces, and a decree passed, that both Consuls should bee sent to Pisæ, and against the Ligurians: but order was given, that whether of them had the charge of Pisæ allotted unto him, he should (when the time came) repaire to Rome against the election of yeerely magistrats. Moreover, there was another braunch of this decree, that either of them should enroll two new legions, and three hundred horsemen, and levie of the Latine allies ten thousand foot apeece, and sixe hundred horse. And T. Claudius continued still in full command, untill such time as the Consull was arrived in his province. Whiles these matters were thus debated and passed in the Counsel house, Cn. Cornelius was called forth by a bailife or huiſher. And within a while after hee was gone out of the temple, he returned thither againe with an heave and dismaied countenance, and declared unto the LL. of the Senate, that the liver of that ox which he also had killed for sacrifice, a beast of sixe yeeres old and well liking, was consumed and come to nothing; and when he hardly beleived the minister attending upon the sacrifice, who told him hereof, that himselfe caused the water to be poured forth of the pot wherein the tripes and inwards were sodden, where he saw the rest of the tripes and entrals full and whole, but all the liver wasted away, after a wonderfull and miraculous manner, not to be spoken. The LL. were much terrified and amazed at this prodigious object: and the more perplexed were they, for that the other Consull likewise related unto them, how in regard that in his sacrifice the liver wanted an head, hee had killed three oxen more, one after another, and yet could not procure the favour and grace of the gods. Hereupon the Senate commaunded him still to sacrifice these greater beasts, untill such time as he had his desire and the gods were pleased againe. Now it is said, that all the other gods were well ynnough contented, and their ire mitigated and appeased, onely the goddesse Salus*, Petilius could not be reconciled

*Health.

A reconciled unto, for all that ever he might doe. Then the Consuls and Pretours committed the disposition of their provinces to the arbitrement of the lots. Pisæ fell to Cornelius; and Liguria to Petilius. As for the Pretours, L. Papyrius Mafso was lord cheefe justice by lot appointed, within the citie of all citizens pleas, and M. Alburius had the jurisdiction over strangers: M. Cornelius Scipio Maluginensis had the charge to govern the lower Spain, & L. Aquilius Gallus, Sicilie. The two Pretors behind, requested earnestly that they might not be sent into their provinces, & namely M. Popilius into Sardinia: alledging, that Gracchus was able to quiet that Island; and the rather, for that T. Ebutius the Pretour was by the Senate adjoined to him for assistance: neither was it good to interrupt courses begun, the continuitie whereof is the most effectuall meanes to exploit any great important affaires. For what with delivering up of the sword by the old L. Deputatus, and receiving it by the new successeur (whome it were more meet first to bee trained up in knowledge of the State, than to bee put to the managing of State-matters) oftentimes the good opportunities of atcheiving brave enterprises passe by and are lost. This excuse of Popilius was held for good, & so approved. Then comes P. Licinius Crassus, and he for his part made allegations why he might not go into his province: namely, by occasion of the solemn sacrifice, that he was to give his attendance upon. Now the higher part of Spaine was allotted unto him. But commaunded was hee either to goe into his province, or els to take oth in a frequent and full assembly of the people, that the solemn sacrifice (as he pretended) was the thing that hindered him, and nothing els. This order being set downe and thus passed in the belialte of P. Licinius; then steps me up M. Cornelius, and required them to take an oth of him likewise, that hee might not goe into the nether province of Spaine. So both these Pretours were sworne according to one and the same forme of oth. Whereupon M. Titinius and T. Fonteus were commaunded to remaine in qualitie and place of Proconsuls within Spain, and retaine still the same authoritie and power of command: and order was graunted, that for to supplie their forces, there should bee sent unto them three thousand citizens of Rome with two hundred horse, and also five thousand Latine allies, and three hundred horsemen.

The solemnitie of the Latine holydaies began the *third day before the Nones of May: wherein, because at the sacrificing of one beast the magistrate of Lanuvium in his praier left out these words [Populi Romani Quiritium] and praied not for the good estate of the people of Rome, and the Quirites, it bred a scruple. The matter was mooved in the Senate, and the Senate referred it D over to the Colledge of the bishops and prelates of the church. And they pronounced this award, That forasmuch as those Latine feasts were not solemnized as they ought, they should begin againe anew: and that the citizens of Lanuvium, by whose default they were thus to be renewed, should bee at the charges of all the beasts for sacrifice. Moreover, to breed more fearefull scrupulositie in mens minds, it fortuned that Cneus Cornelius the Consull as hee returned from that solemnitie out of the Albane mountaine, fell downe in a fit of Apoplexie: which turned into an Hemiplegia or dead palsey all the one side of his bodie, and so hee was conveyed to the bath and hore waters at Cumes: where, by occasion that his disease grew upon him still, hee departed this life: from whence hee was brought to Rome, and there carried forth in all magnificence of funerall obsequies, and right honourably enterred. Hee had E bene Bishop also as well as Consull, Q. Petilius the other Consull, being commaunded to hold an assembly for the surrogation of a colleague unto him, (so soone as possibly hee might bee warranted by the auspices and approbation of the sacred birds) and withall, to proclaim and publish the Latine feasts and holydaies aforesaid; summoned the election against the *third day before the Nones of Sextilis: and the Latine solemnitie, the third day likewise before the *Ides of the same month.

*Fifth of May.

*3 of August.

*11 of August.

Whiles mens minds were much possessed already with religion and set upon their devotions, word was brought moreover of certaine fearefull prodigies: to wit, that at Tusculum there was scene a burning flame in the skie: that at Gabes, the temple of Apollo, and many private mens houses: likewise at Graviscæ the towne wall and one of the gates were smitten with thunderbolts. For the procuracion whereof, the LL. of the Senate ordained that the Bishops should give order according to their discretion.

Whiles the Consuls were thus staied, first both, by their owne scrupulous holinesse; then one of them by the death of the other; & afterwards by occasion of the new election & the renewing of the Latine festivall solemnitie: C. Claudius in the meane time approached with his armie armie to Modenna, which the Ligurians the yeere before had woon. Hee had not continued the siege full three daies, but he forced the colonie: and having thus recovered it from the enemies, he rettored it againe to the former inhabitants. Eight thousand Ligurians died therewithin the wals upon the sword: and immediately he dispatched his letters to Rome, wherein hee not only declared the simple newes, but glorified himselfe and made his boast, That through his fortune and fortune, both the Romans had not an enimie that durst thew his head on this side the Alpes; and that he had conquered so much land as might serve for to be divided by the poll, among many thousands. Tib. Sempronius likewise at the same time, fought many fortunate battailes in Sardinia, and utterly tamed and subdued the Ilanders: fiftene thousand enemies he there slew: all the States of that nation which had revolted, were reduced to obedience under the people of Rome: the old tributaries had an imposition and exaction laid upon them of a duple tribute, which they surely paid: the rest were put to a contribution of corne. After hee had let the province in quietnesse, and received out of the whole Iland two hundred and thirtie hostages, hee sent certain lieutenants as messengers to make report at Rome of all his proceedings: who also in his behalfe should make suite unto the Senat, That in regard of the happie successe in those exploits, under the charge, conduct and fortune of Tib. Sempronius, first, due honour praise and thanksgiving might be rendered to the immortal gods; and then, that himselfe might be allowed at his departure out of the province, to bring away his armie with him. The Senate gave audience to the messengers abovesaid within the temple of Apollo: and upon their relation ordained a general procession for two daies: commaunding the Coss. to sacrifice 40 head of greater beasts: & withal, enjoined Tib. Sempronius the pro-Consull to continue that yeere with his armie in that province. Then the election which had bin published against the * third day before the Nones of Sextilis for the substitution of one of the Coss. was the same day accomplished. And Q. Petilius the Cof. created for his colleague, M. Valerius Levinus, for to enter immediately into his magistracie. This Levinus had bin a long time desirous to be employed in some province or other: and fity it fell out for his longing desire, that letters came, importing how the Ligurians rebelled and were gone out againe in armes. So after hee once heard the contents of these letters, he made no longer stay, but upon the very * Nones of Sextilis all goodly to besene in his warriors coat of armes, he commaunded the third legion (by occasion of this alarme) to go into France, to C. Claudius the Pro-consull: also the Duumvirs or two wardens for the ports and navie, to goe to sea, and with a fleet to make saile for Pise, and from thence to coast about all Liguria, and thus by hovering upon the seas, to terrifie the enemies that way also. Q. Petilius likewise the Cof. had appointed a day for his armie to meet in the same place. Moreover C. Claudius the Pro-consull, advertised of the Ligurians revolt, over and besides those forces which he had about him at Parma, levied in hast a strength of more souldiours; and so with his compleat armie approached the borders of the Ligurians. The enemies upon the arrivall of C. Claudius, by whose conduct they well remembred how late they had bene discomfited and put to flight neere the river Scultenna, minding to seeke for defence rather by the strength of advantageous places than force of armes, against that power of his which to their cost they had before tried, seized the two hills, * Letus and Balista, about which they raised a mure also for their better safetie. But such as lagged behind and quit the champaine plaines and lower grounds with the latest, were surprised and cut thort, to the number of fiftene hundred. The rest kept within the mountaines: who albeit they were in feare and danger of their owne parts, yet forgot not their inbred crueltie; but ran upon the booties and prizes which they had taken at Modenna, their poore prisoners whom they held captive, they pitiously mangled and killed most villanously: as for the beasts in the temples every where, they rather hacked hewed and cut in peeces butcherlike, than sacrificed in decent seemely and religious manner. Thus being satisfied with the blood and massacre of living creatures, they tooke all their breathlesse things they had, and reared and stucke them upon the wals; and namely, implements of all sorts, made rather for use and necessitie than ornament and shew. Q. Petilius the Consull, for feare least the warre would be ended in his absence, dispatched his letters to M. Claudius, to hast away with his armie to him into France, for he would attend his comming upon the plaines called Macri. Upon the receipt of which letters, Claudius dislodged out of Liguria, & delivered unto the Consull his armie at the said plaines called Macri. Fewe daies after came Caius Valerius the other Consull thither also. There they divided their forces, and before they departed one from the other, they both together made a survey

The third of August.

A survey & review of their severall armies. This done, they cast lots into what quarters they should either of them goe, for that they held it not good policie to charge the enemy both of them jointly in one part. Now certaine it is, that Valerius received his lot according to the auspices, in that hee was within the precinct of the temple or prospect by the Augur assigned. But Petilius that hee was within the precinct of the temple or prospect by the Augur assigned. But Petilius that hee made default (as the Augurs pronounced afterwards) and namely the error was herein, because he being himselfe without the compasse aforesaid, had put the lot into the casket, which was carried afterwards within the circuite of the said temple. This done, they went into divers quarters: Petilius encamped affront that banke & rising of the hill between Balista & Letus, which by a continuall ridge uniteth and joyneth the one mountaine to the other. There, as he was exhorting his souldiours in open audience, he let fall (by report) an ominous word, presaging his owne death, never thinking of the ambiguitie & duple construction thereof; saying that he would that very day * capere Letum. In two severall places at once he began to mount up the hills. That regiment wherein he was himselfe, avanced forward courageously: but the other was repulsed and beaten backe by the enemies: whereupon the Consull todo full gallop to helpe that side which went downe: and in very truth reclaime his men hee did from running away; but whiles without good regard of his own person he kept before the ensignes in the forefront, he chanced to be shot through with a dart, and so fell downe dead in the place. The enemies were not ware of the Generals death: but some few of his owne men who saw him fall, made hast (as knowing well that in it consisted now the main victorie) to cover his bodie. So the rest of the multitude, as well cavallerie as infanterie, captaines as they were, disseazed the enemies and were maisters of the mountaines. Of Ligurians there were slaine 3000: of the Romane armie not above two and fiftie. Now besides this evident yssue and event which fell out upon so heave and deadly a presage by the * oise aforesaid, the pulletier also was heard to say, that all was not well in the auspices of the birds; neither was the Consull himselfe ignorant thereof.

Capere Letum, thus written with a critical signification, To game the hill Letus: but with the title, (which he care cannot distinguish) importeth, To take his death. Valerius Maximus reporting the same story, calls this Ome of his (which I commonly interpret Offe) fortuitum vox casus: then againe casteth forth a word at a venture, and speakes more truly than he is aware. For want of a proper term to expresse the Latine word, I have translated it into English, and have ben put to their Offe, and helpe themselves with Presage. Which in mine opinion is not [Once] all translators have done, French, Italian, and English, have ben put to their Offe, and helpe themselves with Presage. Which in mine opinion is not appropriate to the thing, but common: as comprising other tokens of birds, whether they be auguria or auspices of beasts inwardly, of lightning and the rest: rather implying augurium, i. the fore-deeming by those signes, yea, and extending to the fore-giving of the mind. Whereas that other word Offe is very significant, and in analogie equivalent to Omen. I marvel much therefore, why it is thought either strange and new (seeing it is English, used so commonly in times past, and at this day current in the North-parts, where the people happily are more observant of such presages) rather than many other words, brought into our language, and ranged with the English: why it should be condemned as abstruse and not pleasing to the ear, more than in Greek, which commonly betokeneth (a voice) and more properly in Plato (as Budaeus hath well observed) is taken for Omen like as consona for omens: and augurium (i. divinare) is Euthymus noeth upon Horatius, lib. 2. l. 2. From whence, we seech not that Offe, and Offing both, are derived: The word Offe being not lastly borne, but descended from the mother of all learning, the Greeke tongue, and enfranchised in this Iland time out of mind (howsoever it hath ben confined into the North) would not bee exiled chane, but rather reduced and received for a free denizen, equal postliminio.

C. Valerius having heard and deepe divines, those also that were profoundly scene in the common law, gave it forth, That seeing the two ordinarie Consuls (Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispanus, and Q. Petilius Spurius) of that yeere, were both dead, the one by sicknes, the other by the sword, it was not lawfull for the other Consull (C. Valerius Levinus) subroged in the place of the deceased, to hold the assembly general for the election of new Magistrates.]

conducted. On this side the Apennine were the Garules, Lapirines, and Hercatians: beyond the Apennine were the Briniates. Against them that had pilld and ransacked Pise and Luna, Q. Mutius made war within the compasse of the river Audena: & when hee had brought them in subjection, he tooke from them their armes. For which exploits atcheevd in France and Liguria, under the conduct and happie fortune of the two Consuls, the Senate ordained that there should be publick procession for three daies, and commaunded to sacrifice fortie greater beasts. And thus verily the tumultuous warres of the French and the Ligurians, which arose in the beginning of the yeere, were in short time and without any great maiestie dashed and appeased.

But now in lieu thereof, great care was taken for the Macedonian warre, by occasion that Perseus sowed the seeds of debate and quarrell betwene the Dardanians & the Bastarnians. Besides the Roman enbassadors who were sent into Macedonia, to see in what tearms things there stood, were now returned to Rome, and had brought word, That in Dardania they were up in armes. With them there came also from King Perseus certaine Oratours to make excuse in his behalfe, and to cleere him in the action, namely, that the Bastarnians neither were by him sent for, nor entered into any execution by his motive. The Senate would neither acquit the king as unguiltie, unguiltie, nor yet directly accuse him as culpable in that point. Onely they required, that hee should bee advertised and admonished, to bee very well adviced and carefull to keepe that league and accord inviolable, which he would seeme to entertaine with the Romanes.

The Dardanians seeing that the Bastarnæ were so farre off from departing out of their countrey (as they well hoped they would) that they endammaged and endangered them still everie day more than other, as bearing themselves bold upon the succors of the Thracians neer neighbours, and the Scordisci; thought it their best course in pollicie, to adventure upon some hardie enterprife, although it were rash and inconsiderate: whereupon they assembled all in arms, and from every quarter of their countrey shewed and advanced before the next towne, to the campe of the Bastarnians. Winter time it was, a season of the yeere which they made choise of, that the Thracians and the Scordisci might be retired home into their owne countries: which when they were advertised of, and that there remained none but the Bastarnæ alone, they divided their forces in two parts: with the one, to march directly forward and openly to make head against them affront; with the other, to fetch a compass through by-waies and blind Forrests, and so to charge upon their backs. But before they could wheele about the enemies campe, the battaile was begun: wherein the Dardanians had the overthrow, and were driven to put themselves within their citie, which was almost twelve miles distant from the campe of the Bastarnæ. The conquerors followed the traine of victorie, and incontinently invested the towne, making full account, that the next day either the enemies would yeeld, or else they should be able to win the place by fine force. In the meane time, the other regiment above said of the Dardanians, which cast about, knowing nothing at all of their fellowes disfigure, began to assaile the campe of the Bastarnians, left without a sufficient guard for defence.

As the manner of kings was, he sate in a stately throne of Ivorie, to heare pleas and decide controversies of the smallest and most trifling matters. So transported was he and caried away with an humor of levitie and spirit of inconstancie, so distracted and wandering in all the course of his life, that he was never settled and well contented in any condition or state whatsoever: in such sort, as neither he knew his owne selfe, nor any man else wist well what to make of him. He would not seeme to speake unto his friends, and hardly was seene to laugh familiarly among those of his neere acquaintance. Hee made a foole of himselfe, and mocked others likewise; such was his unordinate and irregular munificence. To men of honour standing highly upon their worth and reputation, his manner was to bestow childish trifles, as sugar-plums to eat or to play with: all, toys and gewgaws instead of great and pretious presents: others againe that looked for nothing, those he enriched. And therefore some deemed, that he knew not what hee did: others gave it out, that hee did all in plaine mockage: and there were againe that let not to say, how he was out of his right wits, and cleane besides himselfe. Yet in two things, which were both great and laudable, hee carried with him a princely and royall mind indeed; to wit, in adorning cities with stately gifts, and honouring the gods with divine worship. He promised the Megapolitans in Arcadia, to raise a wall about their citie; and in truth the better part of the money to defray the charges thereof, hee sent unto them. He went in hand to build a magnificent Theatre of marble at Tegæa: at Cizicum, he gave freely to the Prytaneum (a faire hall by it selfe in the heart of the citie, where, at the common charges, certaine had their diet of free-cost) by way of honorable reward, a cupbord of golden plate sufficient for the furniture and service of one table. As for the Rhodians, I cannot say, what one speciall gift singular above the rest, hee bestowed upon them; so liberally minded was hee to them-ward, and his hand ever open to give them of all sorts whatsoever they needed or required. Now, his magnificence in honouring the gods, what it was (if there were nothing else) the temple of Iupiter Olympius begun by him in Athens (so answerable every way to the majesty of that great god, that the like to it is not to be found again in the whole world) may testifie sufficiently. Moreover, hee beautified Delos with goodly sea-ensigns, and with a great number of statues and images. Likewise he promised to edifie at Antiochia, a stately temple in the honour of Iupiter Capitolinus; not onely arched above-head with a golden embowed rouse, but seled all over the wall sides with plates of gold: besides many other things in divers places, which by reason that hee reigned but a very short time, hee could not finish and performe. In magnificence also of playes, publicke shewes, and pageants of every sort, hee over-went all the kings his progenitors before him, as well in regard of Grecian actors and gamesters, whereof hee had many about him, as of the rest who were acquainted with the fashions of his owne countrey. He represented the fight of sword-players at the sharpe with untruncated swords, after the custome of the Romanes; with greater terror and feare at first, than pleasure and delight of men, who were not used to behold such fights: but afterwards by often exhibiting the same, in such manner, as sometime they drew blood one of another, yea and otherwhiles gave not over so, but fought to the utterance, even to death, hee made it a familiar exercise and a pleasant spectacle to the eye; and thereby set an edge upon the courage of many yong gallants, and emboldened them to embrace chivalrie and follow feats of armes. So as in procelle of time, hee that was wont at the beginning to send as farre as Rome for these fencers, and to hire them for great wages and reward, now with his owne

L. Cornelius Scipio (had the jurisdiction) over forreiners. To M. Atilius the Pretour, the government of Sardinia by lot was fallen, but he was enjoyned to passe over into Corsica with the new legion which the Consuls had enrolled, consisting of five thousand foot and three hundred horse. And during the time that he should be employed there in the warres, Cornelius had commission to continue in his charge and place of commaund, within Sardinia. Unto Cn. Servilius Capio for low Spaine, and P. Furius Philus for the higher, were assigned three thousand Romane footmen and an hundred and fiftie horse; but of Latine allies, five thousand of the one and three hundred of the other. As for L. Claudius he was appointed to Sicilie without any supply at all. Moreover, the Consuls had commaundement to enroll two legions besides, with the full number as well of foot as horse, and to charge the [Latine] allies, with the setting out and maintenance of a thousand footmen and six hundred horse. This levie and taking of musters, the Consuls went through with, in more difficultie, by reason of a great mortallitie, which beginning the yeere before with a morrefn of kine and oxen, turned this yeere into pestilent epidemiall diseases of men. Looke who fell sicke once, lightly they died before the seventh day: and those that overlived and escaped that crisis, lay long sicke by it, and commonly of the quartane ague. The most that went of this maladie were slaves, whose breathlesse carcases lay ordinarily along everie street unburied: and more than that, men were not able to enterre so much as the dead bodies of free persons, they died so thicke; in such sort, as they putrified and rotted above ground: for neither hungrie dog nor greedie gripe, would once touch them. And for certaine it was knowne and noted, that neither all that yeere nor in the former, during the mortallitie of man and beast, there was not a vultur or grype any where to bee seene. Divers prelates and priests of

D State dropt away of this plague, and namely, Cn. Servilius Capio a bishop, the father of the Pretour: Tib. Sempronius Longus the sonne of Titus, one of the Decemvirs for sacred rites and divine service: P. Aelius Petus the Augur: Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, C. Atellus Aemylus the chiefe superintendent of all the parish-priests, and M. Sempronius Tuditanus a bishop. These were substituted bishops in place of the dead, to wit, C. Sulpitius Galba in stead of Tuditanus. For Augures were subordained, T. Veturius Crassus Sempronianus in the roume of Gracchus; Q. Aelius Petus for P. Aelius. Decemvirs over holy rites was elected, Carus Sempronius Longus; and C. Scribonius, surnamed Curio, supplied the want of the grand superintendent aforesaid. Still continued the pestilence; whereupon the Senate ordeined, That the Decemvirs should have recourse to the bookes of Sibylla: by whose order and direction, publicke supplications held for one day long: and after a devout manner, the people conceived and made a solemne vow in the

E common-place, according to that forme of words which Q. Martius Philippus endited & promised unto them, to this effect: That if this maladie and pestilent disease, were remooved out of the territorie of Rome, they would for two daies space solemnize a feast, goe in procession and poure out their prayers with all devotion. In the Vejentian countrey a man child was borne with two heads; and another at Sinuessæ but with one hand. At Oximum a maid child came into the world with teeth in the head: and over the temple of Saturne (standing in the market place of Rome) there was seene in the skie a bow full bent all the day long, if the aire were cleere and the weather faire: and at one time there shone out three funnes. Also in one night, there evidently appeared many flaming lights and fire-drakes shooting along in the aire. The men of Lanuvium and Cære affirmed plainly, That within their towne they saw a serpent with a creft and mane, yea and the same marked all over with yellow spots like gold: and it was held for certain, that in the territorie of Capua an oxe spake.

Now were the embassadours returned out of Affricke by the *Nones of Iune, those I meane, *7 of Iune. who went to Carthage, after they had been with king Masaniſſa, and spoken with him. But better and more certaine intelligence they had by this king, than from the Carthaginians themselves, as touching the affaires that had passed in Carthage. Howbeit, thus much they reported upon their assured knowledge, that embassadours came from king Perseus, and had audience in the Senate secretly by night within the temple of Æsculapius. Also both the king affirmed flatly, and the Carthaginians themselves but faintly denied, that embassadours likewise had been sent from Carthage into Macedonie. Whereupon the Senate was of advice and resolved to dispatch their embassadours also into Macedonie. And these three were sent, to wit, C. Lalius, M. Papius Maffala, and Sext. Digittus.

During this time, Perseus, by occasion that certaine Dolopians obeyed him not, and of some matters in controversie and difference referred the audience and decision to the Romanes, and refused the arbitrement of the king, led forth an armie against them, and reduced the whole nation under his obedience and jurisdiction. From thence hee passed over the Oetæan mountaines, and upon certaine religions motions arising in his mind, he went up to Delphos, for to visite the Oracle. Being thus on a suddaine scene in the very heart and midst of Greece, he strucke a terror not onely into the cities next adjoining, but also the bruite of this tumultuous alarme was blowne as farre as to king Eumenes. After hee had staid at Delphi not above three daies, hee returned into his owne realme, by the way of Phthiotis, Achaia and Theffalie, without any damage done or wrong offered to the territories through which he passed. Neither thought hee it sufficient thus onely to win the love and favour of those cities and states through which he was to journey, but hee addressed either embassadours or wrote his letters, praying them to beare no longer in mind the enmities which had bene betweene them and his father, for as much as they were not so bitter and deadly but they might well ynough, yea, and ought to end and die with him: as for himselfe, he saw no let or hinderance in the world to empeach them for entertaining a faithfull amitie with him. But above all others hee sought meanes to be reconciled to the Achæans, and to reenter into grace and favour with them. This nation alone of all Greece, together with the citie of Athens, were growne into those rearmes of despight and malice against the Macedonians, that they debarred them from once setting foot within their confines. And hereupon it came, that when certaine slaves fled out of Achæa, they retired into Macedonie for refuge, and there remained: and because the Achæans had forbidden the Macedonians to come within their liberties, they durst not likewise for their parts enter into the marches & frontiers of his kingdom to recover their bondmen. Which when Perseus perceived, he caused al those fugitive slaves to be apprehended, and he dispatched his letters unto the Achæans, wherein he wrote That he would right courteously send backe their slaves home againe, although they were runne away from them unto him; advertising and advising them to beware and looke well unto it, that there were no more any such escapes and runnings away of their bond-servants hereafter. When these letters were read by Xenarchus their Pretour, who sought to currey some favour and to wind himselfe into grace with the king, most of them that were present judged the letters to have been written right graciously and with great government and moderation, but principally those persons, who beyond their hope were to recover and receive their slaves whom they had lost. But Callistrates one of them who were fully persuaded, that the safetie of their whole estate depended upon the loiall observance and inviolable maintenance of the accord contracted with the Romanes, spake thus or to this effect following, It may seeme to some here (quoth he) my maisters of Achæa, that wee are in question at this present of a small matter and of meane importance: but I for my part am of opinion, that we are not now in hand to treat, but have already debated, and after a sort concluded, one of the greatestt affaires and of most consequence that wee know. For we who have interdicted the KK. of Macedonie and the Macedonians to come within our borders, and have decreed that this edict may stand firme and irrevocable, and that for this intent especially, Because wee would admit neither embassadours nor messengers from the KK. for feare lest by entercourse of them, the hearts of some among us might bee solicited and tempted to noveltie and alteration: wee now are content to heare the king, although absent in person, preaching in some sort to us, yea, and more than that (God send us good lucke) approve and applaude his Oration. And whereas the very wild beasts refuse (for the most part) the meat which is laid for a bait to deceive and hurt them, yea, and have the wit to shun and avoid the same; wee, blind beetles that we are, suffer our selves to bee caught and fed with the vaine appearance and colourable shew of a lide kindnesse, and for hope to recover some poore slaves (a mar-ter of small worth and reckoning) suffer our owne freedome to be undermined, and in daunger of subversion. For who seeth not, that the ouerture is made, and the way laid open for entrance into confederacie with the king, onely to violate and breake our association with the Romanes, wherein standeth all our weale and welfare? Vnlesse some man peradventure will make a question, whether the Romanes must levie warre against Perseus? and doubt thereof now after Philip is dead, which in his life time was expected, and by his death onely interrupted? Two sonnes, ye know full well, king Philip had, Demetrius and Perseus. For noblenesse of parentage by the mothers side, for vertue, for wit, for the love and affection of the Macedonians, Demetrius farre surpassed his brother. But for that the father intended ever and meant, that whether of his two sonnes hated the Romanes, he should have the crowne after him for recompence, he caused Demetrius to bee murdered; for no other crime in the world that could be laid to his charge, save onely that he was entered into amitie with the Romanes: but Perseus he made the king, whom he knew that the people of Rome judged more worthie to suffer punishment than to inherit a kingdom. And this Perseus, what other thing hath hee done els after his fathers decease, but made preparation for warre? First and formost he procured the Bastarnians, to the terror of all the world, for to invade Dardania: who if they had ferted there, Greece should have had more troublesome neighbors of them than Asia hath of the Galatians. And albeit hee was disappointed of this hope, yet hee gave not over to desigine and plot for warre; nay, if we will speake a truth, he hath already begun the war. Dolopia he hath subdued by force of armes, and could not abide to heare that the determination of certaine provinces which were debatable & litigious, should be referred to the award of the people of Rome. From thence having passed over the mountaine Oeta, that all upon a suddaine he might shew himselfe in the very centre of Greece, hee ascended up to Delphi. And to what end, thinke ye, hath he taken this diswonted voiage and unaccustomed expedition? After this he made his progresse all over Theffalie: And what if he annoied and hurt none of them, whom he hated in his heart? I feare me so much the more this manner of dealing, and that it is a bait to catch them withall. Then, forsooth, he sendeth his letters unto us, with a goodly shew of a bon-present, and willet us to thinke eftsoones how to prevent from henceforth, that we never had need againe of the like bountie of his. What is that, but to annull and repeale that edict of ours, wherein the Macedonians are debarred from setting foot within Peloponnesus? and to bring about, that we may have againe the kings embassadours to come unto us, that we may entertaine mutuall hospitalitie betweene their princes and ours? and anon after, (see the Macedonian armies, yea, and the king also in person to crosse from Delphi (for a small arme of the sea lieth betweene) streight over into Peloponnesus: and finally, that we band and combine with the Macedonians, when they shall take armes against the Romanes? As for mee, this is mine advice, to make no new ordinance, but to let all alone in their entier, as they now stand, untill such time as wee are come to some certaine tearmes, Whether we have cause to be afraid, or feare onely our owne shaddowes? If the league shall continue firme and sure betweene the Romanes and the Macedonians, then may we have entercourse of friendship, of commerce and traffick with them. But for this present to thinke and consider hereof, in my simple judgment, is a nice and ticklish point, and besides, out of season, untimely, and somewhat with the soonest. When hee had thus said, Arco brother to Xenarchus the Pretour discoursed in this manner following. Callistrates (quoth he) hath caused both me and all of us besides, who are of contrarie opinion to him, for to find the more difficultie in speaking our minds to the cause in question. For whiles in maintenance of the association which we have with the Romanes, he saith that it is disturbed and troubled, (albeit there bee no man about either to disturbe or trouble it) he hath wrought cunningly and contrived, that whosoever seemeth to gainsay him, may be thought to oppole & set himselfe against the Romanes. In the first place, as if he had ben a man, not conversing here among us, but one come from the Senat of Rome, or some inward secretarie & of the privie counsell to the KK. he knoweth forsooth, and uttereth all that in great secrecie hath bene done. Nay, hee foretelleth like a wife man, what would have ensued, in case Philip had lived longer: & namely how it came about, that Perseus thus inherited the crowne: what the Macedonian designs are: and what the Romanes intend to doe. But we, who know neither for what cause, nor in what manner Demetrius came by his death, ne yet what Philip meant to have done if hee had lived still, must accommodate and frame our counsell to those occurrents which have openly passed in the view of the world. Wee take knowledge, that Perseus after hee was invested in his throne and crowned king, repaired to the Romane embassadours; and we know likewise that hee was intituled by the people of Rome with the style of (King Perseus.) We heare besides, that Romane embassadours came to the king, and were by him well received and graciously entertained. If I have any judgement these bee all signes of peace and not of warre, neither can the Romanes take offence, if as wee followed them when they bare armes, so we follow them now likewise, as the authours of peace. And verily I see no reason why we alone of all other Greekes, should make so mortall and inextinguishable warre against the realme of Macedonie. What is it because we are so neere unto the Macedonians, and by that vicinitie exposed to all dangers from thence? or that wee are the weakest of all the rest, and like to the Dolopians, whom Perseus of late hath subdued? Nay ywis, it is farre otherwise & cleane contrarie. Sure enough we are for any harme they can do us, in regard either of our owne forces (which the gods of their goodnesse have vouchsafed us) or of the distance of place so far remote. But for case wee be as much subject as the Thessalians & Etolians: Say, we are of no more credite and authoritie among the Romans (albeit we have bene alwaies their associates & friends) than the Etolians be, who were their open enemies but the other day: Then, what right, what privilege and commerce, the Etolians, the Thessalians, the Epitiores, and in one word, all Greece besides, have and use with the Macedonians, we also may have and hold the same. How is it then, that we alone like cursed and damned creatures, should thus practise to abandon the common law of men, (and as it were) renounce all humane societie. Be it, that Philip (when time was) did somewhat, and gave us just cause, armed as he was and ever warning upon us, to passe this decree and edict against him: what hath Perseus deserved? Perseus (I say) the new king, a harmlesse prince that never did us injurie; nay, who is willing and seeketh by courtesies and good turnes to cancell and rase out all former quarrels and enmities of his father: why are we the onely enemies that he hath in the world? And yet I might full well and truly say, that from the former kings of Macedonie we have received so great favours and benefits, that in regard thereof, we should put up and forget the wrongs of Philip alone (if haply he have done us any) at leastwise now after he is dead and his head laid. Indeed, at what time as the Romane fleet rid in the harbor of Cenchreæ, and the Consull lay encamped with his armie before Elæia, wee sat in counsell three daies together, debating & dividing, Whether we should band with the Romanes or side to Philip? And albeit the present feare of the Romanes before our eyes, might have made us in our opinions to incline somewhat and leane toward them: yet there was something in it I doubtlesse, that it was so long ere wee could resolve: and to say a trueth, it was the ancient acquaintance and amitie that we had with the Macedonians, and the great benefits which in old time we had received from their kings. Why then, me thinkes, those selfe same regards should be of some force and efficacy, to moove us, if not to be their speciall & best friends, yet at leastwise not to bee their principall and greatest enemies. Let us not, Callistates, make semblance and shew of that, which we are not in hand withall, and is no point of this present question. There is no motive made of a newe societie; there is no person about to draw any capitulations of a new alliance, wherein we should rashly enwrap and entangle our selves, and betie to any inconvenience. Onely, let there be a mutuall commerce between us, and an alternative intercourse of yeelding and demanding right to and fro, as appertaineth; let us not by interdicting and forbidding them to enter and traffike within our countie, debarre our selves likewise from all negotiation and dealing with them in their kingdome; that by this meanes our slaves may have no place of retreat and refuge to flee unto. And what prejudice is this to the Roman confederacie? Wherefore make we thus of a small thing & evident, so great a matter and suspicious? Wherefore raise we such troubles of nothing? Wherefore seeke we to draw others into jealousy & hatred with the Romans, and all this, to find means of courting and flatterring them? If there will be warre, Perseus (yea may be sure) maketh no doubt, but that we altogether will follow the Romans: yets so long as the peace holdeth, surcease & suspend we in some sort our malice and hatred for the while; it ended for ever it may not bee. When the same men who had consented to the kings letters before, gave their accord now also to this propose, the chiefe and principall persons among them tooke great indignation and disdain, that Perseus should seeme to demand and obtaine that by a few lines in writing, which he deemed was not worth the sending an embassage. Whereupon the time was deferred and no decree passed at this Session. Afterwards were embassadours addrest unto them from the king, at what time as a Diet was holden in Megalopolis: but the side which was for the Romanes, and feared to give them occasion of displeasure and offence, did what they could to debarre them of access and entrance into the Counsell. And much about this time, by reason of these jarres, the Etolians grew enraged among themselves, and by discharging their mutuall furie in killing one another, had like to have brought the state to a small ruine and desolation. But being wearie thereof, they in the end as well of the one side as the other, sent their Embassadours to Rome, and also laboured at home to have the quarrell taken up, and to be made friends and reconciled together. Howbeit this was crossed by a new mischiefe that came betwene, which also rubbed the former gauls and fretted the old sores. For whereas certaine Hypæreans, exiled persons, & being of the faction of Proxenus, were promised libertie to returne home againe into their countie, with safe conduct also granted by Enpolemus one of the chiefe & principall men of the cite: so it was, that fourscore of them, men of marke and qualitie (whome to meet upon the way as they returned, Enpolemus himselfe went out with the multitude) after they had bin friendly received with courteous greetings, salutations, and shaking of hands, had no sooner entred within the gate of the citie but they were massacred, notwithstanding they pleaded the faithfull promise of protection, and called the gods to witnesse, but all in vaine. By this occasion the civill war betwene them waxed much hotter than before, and turned in the end to a light fire. Now there arrived C. Valerius Leuinus, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, C. Memmius, M. Popilius, and L. Canutius, as sent from the Senate of Rome. Before these commissioners, the embassadours from both factions appeared at Delphi, and debated the matter with great earnestnes and vehemencie, where Proxenus seemed to have the better hand as well in right of the cause, as through his eloquent tongue: Proxenus (I say) who within few daies after, dranke a cup of poison of his wives tempering, whereof he died: and she condemned therefore, departed into exile. The like madnesse haunted the Candiotis also and distracted them with intestine dissention. But upon the coming of Q. Mutius the lieutenant generall, who was sent accompanied with a fleet of ten saile, to appease their debates, they fell to some tearmes of peace and attonement. There had bene a truce also before of fixe monthes, but afterwards the warre flamed out much more terrible. The Lycians likewise at the same time, were infested and plagued with warre by the Rhodians. But my meaning is not, neither is it any part of my purpose, to describe the warres of forreine nations, nor to discourse of the circumstances how they proceeded: for enough I have to do, and more than I can well discharge, to write the acts onely of the people of Rome.

The Celtiberians in Spaine, who being subdued and tamed by force of armes, had submitted to Tib. Gracchus, remained quiet all the time that M. Titinius the Pretour continued there in government. But immediately upon the arrivall of Appius Claudius they revolted: and began to shew themselves in open action of rebellion, by giving a suddaine assault upon the Romane campe. It was about the breake of day, when the sentinels upon the rampier and Corps de guard about the gates, might discover enemies comming a farre off, and so they gave the alarme. Appius Claudius having put out the signall of battaile, and in fewe words exhorted his souldiours to fight and play the men, led them forth at three gates at once. The Celtiberians made head and opposed their forces as they issued forth. At the first the skirmish was equall on both parts: for that by reason of the streights of the passage, all the Romanes could not fight: but after that one had put forward another, and followed still apace, they were all at length gotten without the trench, so as they were able now to display their battaillons, & to confront their enemies from one point of their battaile to the other, wherewith before they were environned: and then they made so forcible a sallie upon them, that the Celtiberians were not able to endure their violence. For before the second houre of the day, they were discomfited and put backe: and fifteen thousand of them either died in the place, or yeelded their bodies prisoners: two and thirtie militarie ensignes they lost, and were turned out of the campe the same day: and here an end of that warre. For as many as escaped the medley gat them home to their owne townes, and quietly afterwards bare the yoke of subjection.

That yeere were created Censors, Q. Fulvius Flaccus & A. Posthumius Albinus: who made a review of Senatours and chose new. For president of the Senat they elected M. Aemilius Lepidus the Archbishop. Nine they put out of the Senate-house. The principall persons noted and disgraced, were these, M. Cornelius Maluginensis, who two yeeres before had ben Pretor in Spaine; L. Cornelius Scipio, Pretor for the time being, and L. chiefe Iustice of the common pleas, as well among citizens as aliens; and L. Fulvius, who was whole brother to the Censor himselfe, and as Valerius Antias reporteth, equall in degree of calling, and his fellow every way. The Consuls also after they had made their vowes within the Capitoll, went forth to their provinces. The one of them, (to wit, M. Aemilius) had in charge given him by the Senat, to appease the sedition of the Padoans in Venice, who as their embassadours made report, by factious siding and part-taking, were all on a fire with civill warre.

The embassadours who were gone into Ætolia for to pacifie the like troubles, brought word backe, That it was not possible to bridle and reſtaine the furious rage of that nation. But the comming of the Conſull made all whole among the Padoans and cured the maladie: who having nothing else to doe in the province, returned to Rome.

These Censurs were the first that caused the streets of Rome to be paved with hard flint and pebble stone within the citie; and the high waies and causeys without to be raised with gravell, and the sides thereof to be well banked and kept in reparations: also bridges to be made in divers places: a scaffold besides for the Ediles and Pretors to behold the games & plaies. Moreover, the barriers in the race, from whence the horses begin to run, & the Ouales to marke and skore up the number of courses. * * * Over and besides the goles, beyond * * * the yron grates and cages * * * and at the feasts in the mount Albane for the Consuls. They took order besides all this, for the paving with flint of the cliffe or descent from the Capitoll, and from the gallerie or porch before the temple of Saturne looking toward the Capitoll, unto the place called Senaculum, and the court Hostilia above it. Also the merchants hall or burse without the gate Tergemina they paved with stone, and fenced it about with strong stakes and posts of wood. The gallerie also Aemilia they caused to be repaired; and made an ascent by staires from the Tyber to the burse or merchants hall aforesaid. Without the same gate also, they paved with pebble stone the gallerie or walking place into the Aventine * * * from the temple of Venus. The same Censurs bargained for the making of walls about Calatia and Oxyrum: and having made sale of some publicke edifices there, they employed the money raised thereof, in making of shops and stalles round about both the market places. The one of them, that is to say, M. Fulvius, (for Posthumius said plainly, that unlesse it were by vertue either of an act of the Senate, or graunt of the people of Rome, hee would put forth no workes to be made with dispenſe of their money) agreed upon a price for the building of a temple to Iupiter at Pisaurum and at Fundi: also to make a conduit, for water to be conveyed to Pollentia; and at Pisaurum for a way to be paved, and Sinuessa * * *. In these colonies, hee caused also a sinke or vault to be made about them, to carry away all filthinesse into the river: also the market place to be enclosed with porches, galleries, and shops; and three stately halls called lani, with quarrefours or foure throughfares, and as many fronts. For these workes, one of the Consuls disbursed the money, and bargained with the Publicanes and undertakers. In which regard, the inhabitants of those colonies above-named, gave him great thanks. These Censurs were likewise severe and precise in exercising their office, for the redressing and reformation of mens manners: for many gentlemen had their horses of service taken from them, which were allowed them by the citie.

A little before the yceres end, there was a solemne procession holden one whole day for the happie achievement of the affaires in Spaine, under the conduct and good fortune of Appius Claudius the Proconsull; and twentie head of great beasts were killed in sacrifice. And the morrow after they went in another procession with supplications, at the temples of Ceres, Liber, and Libera: for that there was reported from the Sabines countrey, a mightie earthquake, which over-turned many houses.

After that Appius Claudius was returned out of Spaine to Rome, the Senat ordeined, that hee should enter the citie with the pompe of an Ovation. And now approached the time for the election of new Consuls. Much adoe there was and hard hold at this assembly, by reason of the multitude of competitors: but in the end, L. Posthumius Albinus and M. Popilius Lanus, were elected Consuls: which done, the Pretours also were created, to wit, Cn. Fabius Buteo, M. Metienus, C. Cicercius, M. Furius Crassipes, A. Attilius Serranus, and C. Cluvius Saxula, these three last rehearsed, the second time.

This businesse and solemnitie finished, Ap. Claudius Cento entring with Ovant pompe into the citie for his victorie of the Celtiberians, brought into the common treasure 10000 pound weight of silver, and five thousand of gold. Cn. Cornelius was consecrated the Flamine of Iupiter. The

A The same yeere there was set up a painted table in the temple of the goddesse Matuta with this inscription, VNDER THE CONDUCT AND HAPPIE GOVERNEMENT OF TIE SEMPRONIUS GRACCHUS, CONSULL, THE LEGION AND ARMIE OF THE PEOPLE OF ROME, SUEDED SARDINIA. IN WHICH PROVINCE, THERE WERE SLAINE AND TAKEN PRISONERS EIGHTIE THOUSAND ENEMIES. WHICH GRACCHUS (AFTER HE HAD MANAGED THE AFFAIRES OF STATE MOST FORTUNATELY, DELIVERED MANY CAPTIVES OUT OF BONDAGE, AND RECOVERED THE TRIBUTES AND CUSTOMES TO THE COMMON-VWEALE) BROUGHT HOME WITH HIM, HIS ARMIE SAFE AND SOUND, CHARGED WITH AN EXCEEDING RICH ECOTIE, AND REENTERED THE CITTIE OF ROME, IN A SECOND TRIUMPH. IN MEMORIAL OF WHICH EXPLOIT, HEE CAUSED THIS TABLE TO BE SET UP AS A PRESENT IN THE HONOUR OF IUPITER.

Now this table contained the portraiture of the Iland Sardinia, and the picture also and resemblance of sundrie battailes. Moreover, in this yeere were represented to the people certaine pastimes and shewes of sword-players, whereof some were small and of no account: but one above the rest, exhibited by T. Flaminius, surpassed. And this hee did in honour of his father deceased; with a dole of flesh among the people, a great publicke feast besides, and stage-plays for foure dayes together. But the principall matter in this festivall solemnitie, was this, That in three daies space there fought at utterance with unrebatad swords, threescore and foureteene champions.

THE XLII. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIVS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the two and fortieth Booke.

E Flavius Flaccus the Censor uncovered the rooffe of the church of Imo Lacinia, which was slated with marble, and all to cover a temple which he had dedicated. But by an act of the Senate he was forced to beslow the selates there againe. Eumenes the king of Asia complained in the Senat, of Perseus king of Macedonie. His injuries done to the people of Rome are here reported: for the which, defiance was sent, and warre proclaimed against him. P. Licinius Crassus the Consull, unto whom the province of Macedonie was assigned, passed over thither, and in certaine light expeditions fought sundry battels with Perseus in Thessalie, all by horse-service, but with bad successe. The Senate appointed a day of bearing betwene M. Janissa and the Carthaginians, touching the territorie in question. Embassadours were sent to the associate citties and States, and to the confederate kings, to request them to continue loiall and fast in friendship, by reason that the Rhodians stood in doubtfull tearmes. The Censours tooke a review and numbred the citizens of Rome, wherein were enrolled in the subsidie bookes 257231. Moreover, this booke containeth the fortunate exploits against the Islanders of Corfica and the Ligurians.

After

After that L. Posthumius Albinus and M. Popilius Lanus the Consuls, had before all other things proposed unto the Senate as touching the government of the provinces and conduct of the armies, ordained it was, that Liguria should be the charge as well of the one of them as the other. Also that both of them should levie new legions, (and two apeece they were allowed to have) therewith to defend the said province & keep it in obedience, besides ten thousand footmen and six hundred horse of Latine allies. Moreover, to enrol three thousand foot, and two hundred horsemen of Romans for a supplie in Spaine. Last of all, commaunded they were to prest fiftene hundred footmen and a hundred horse of Romane citizens: with which strength, that Pretour unto whom Sardinia fell, should passe over into Corsica, there to warre, and M. Attilius the old Pretour, in meane time to see unto the government of Sardinia. This done, the Pretours went to cast lots for their provinces. M. Attilius Serranus had the place of lord cheefe justice within the cite, and C. Claudius Saxul: the jurisdiction betwene citizens and forrainers. Unto Cn. Fabius Buteo fell the higher Spaine, to M. Marius the lower. M. Furius Crasipes was to governe Sicilie, and C. Cicerius Sardinia.

Before that these magistrates tooke their journey, the Senate was of advise, that L. Posthumius the Consul should goe into Campaine, for to limit out the cite-lands apart from the grounds of private persons: for that it was scene and knowne, that particular men setting out their bounds & encroching by little & little upon the Commons, in proceesse of time held a great part of it in their own possession. This Cos. was angrie & offended with the Praenestines, for that upon a time when he went thither amongst them (in qualitie then of a private person) to offer sacrifice in the temple of Fortune, they did him no honour neither in publike nor private. Whereupon, before hee departed now from Rome, hee addressed his letters before him to Praeneste, that the cheefe magistrate should come and meet him upon the way, provide him a lodging at their cities charges, and at his departure from thence, to see that there were sumpter horses and beasts of carriage readie for him. Now before this mans Consulship, the magistrates of Rome had never beene chargeable to their allies nor put them to cost for any thing whatsoever: and therefore allowed they were from the cite their mules, set out they were with tents and pavillions, and all other furniture and provision for the warres, to the end that they should not lay upon the allies any such burden. Privat lodging they had in friends houses, which they entertained courteously and liberally with reciprocal hospitalitie. For at Rome likewise their houses were open to receive those hosts of theirs, with whom they were wont before to have kind usage, and who had bidden them welcome. In like manner, embassadours (if they were sent by chaunce to any place of a foudaine) imposed upon the towns and cities through which they were to passe, one sumpter horse onely; to farther expence were no allies put for any Romane magistrates. This revenge of the Consul for a discourtesie offered, (due and just though it were, yet not to have beene exercised during his magistracie) and the silence of the Praenestines (proceeding either of too much modestie or over-great feare) gave occasion to the magistrates ever since to take it for a privilege and custome to dog the semblable, yea and to charge their allies with more grievous impositions everie day than other in the same kind, as if the precedent example had beene approved.

In the beginning of this yeere, the embassadours who had beene sent into Aetolia and Macedonie, made report, That they might not come to the speech of K. Perseus, for that some said he was absent; others, that he was sicke; and the one as false, as the other was untrue: howbeit, they might evidently perceive and see, that preparation was made for warre, and that hee would delay no longer, but enter into armes. In like sort they related, that in Aetolia the civill dissension and sedition grew daily more and more, neither could the chieftaines of these factious discords be repressed and held in awe by their countenance and authority.

As the cite of Rome was amused upon the continual expectancie of the Macedonian warre, M before any enterprize thereof begun, thought good it was and requisite, that order first should be taken for the expiation of prodigies, and the pacification of the gods, by way of humble prayers, such as were represented and delivered unto them out of the fatal bookes of Sibylla. For at Lanuvium were scene, as the common voice went, certaine shewes and resemblances of a mightie

A mightie great navie. Item, At Priverum there grew blacke wooll out of the earth. Also in the Venetian territorie, neere a towne called Remens, it rained stones. Moreover, all the countrey Pomptinum was overcast (as it were) with clouds of Locusts, and within the land of Gallia, there were seen certain fishes to leap from under the clots of earth, that were turned with the plow as it took flitch and made furrow. For these straunge and fearfull sights, the foresaid bookes were looked into and perused, and out of them the Decemvirs declared & pronounced, both unto what gods sacrifice should be offered, and what beasts were to be slain therfore: moreover, that the one supplication should bee holden, as propitiatorie for those prodigious tokens, as also the other, which the yeare before had been vowed for the health of the people, should now bee performed, and holydaies kept therfore. So the sacrifices were accomplished according to the order and forme set downe in writing by the Decemvirs.

B The very same yeere was the church of Iuno Lacinia uncovered, upon this occasion: Q. Fulvius Flaccus the Censor was building of a temple to Fortuna equestris, which hee had vowed during the warre against the Celtiberians, when he was lord pretour in Spaine. His desire and earnest endeavor was to straine himselfe, that there might not be in Rome a temple of more state and magnificence than this. And supposing that it would be a great beautie and ornament unto it, in case the rooffe were covered with tiles of marble, hee went into the Brutians countrey, and there he was so bold with the church above said of Iuno Lacinia, as to untile the one halfe thereof, making full account, that so much would serve for to cover that temple which hee was a building. Boates and barges hee had readie for to receive and carrie away the said tiles or sclates, without being impeached or controlled for this sacriledge by the allies, whom he held in awe and frightened by his Censorian authoritie. Now after the Censor was returned to Rome, those marble sclates were disbarked out of the foresaid vessels, and conveyed to the temple. And albeit no words were made from whence they came, yet concealed it could not bee. And hereupon arose much muttering in the Senate, and from all parts thereof they called hard upon the Consuls, to have the matter put to question and debated of. The Censor was sent for, who was no sooner entered into the Senate, but both all in generally, and also every one in particular had a sting at him, and much more sharply reproched him to his face in these termes, That hee could not bee content to abuse and violate the most holy and stately church in those parts, which neither Pyrrhus nor Anniball ever offered violence unto, unlesse he uncovered it also in foule sort, and in manner laid it ruinate. The lanterne thereof was taken away and gone, the rouse left bare and naked, exposed and open to raine and foule weather, and thereby subject to rot: that hee being chosen Censor for to reforme the manners of other; to whome it appertained by his office (after the auncient maner and custome) to see that the temples were close and covert; to call upon, that all publicke places be kept wind-tight and water-tight, and in sufficient repaire: that he (I say) of all others should raunge over the cities of allies and confederate States, pulling downe their temples as hee goeth, and uncovering the routes of the sacred edifices, and in demolishing the churches of the immortall gods, commit that, which if he did but practise upon the privat houses of allies, might seem an unworthie act and a great indignitie: and finally, by rearing one temple with the ruine of another, oblique the people of Rome with the verie guilt of his owne crime: as if (ywis) the immortall gods were not the same in all places, but that we must honour and adorne some of them with the spoile of others. Now as it was apparent (before the matter was put to the censure of the Senate) which way the LL. enclined in opinion: so immediately upon the proposing thereof, they all opined and gave one sentence, That order should bee taken with the publicanes of the cite workes, for the carrying backe againe of the same sclates to the former temple, and that certaine propitiatorie sacrifices should bee offered for the pacification of Iuno. As for all ceremonies requisite toward the divine service aforesaid, they were with all complements performed accordingly: but the farmers who had undertaken at a price to recarie those tiles, brought word that they had landed them in the churchyard, and there left them, because they might not meet with any workeman, who could devise with all the skill & cunning he had, how to bestow them as they were laid and couched before.

Of those Pretours who were gone into their provinces, M. Fabius as he was in his journey toward high Spaine, died at Massilia by the way: and therefore upon intelligence given thereof by the Massilian embassadours, the Senate ordained that P. Furius and Cn. Servilius, whome to succeed succeed others were to be sent, should cast lots betwene themselves, whether of them should continue still in government, and have the charge of high Spaine. And the lot fell out very well and fit, that the said P. Furius who had ruled the said province before, should thereremaine.

The same yere, by occasion that a good part of the Ligurians and Gaules territorie woon by conquest, lay void and was not as yet in the tenor and occupation of any man, there passed an Act of the Senat, that it should be divided by the poll. So, A. Attilius the L. chiefe Iustice of the citty of Rome, by vertue of a decree graunted out of the Senat, created ten Decemvirs or commissioners for that purpose, to wit, M. Aemilius Lepidus, C. Cassius, T. Ebutius Parrus, C. Tremellius, P. Cornelius Cethegus, and L. both named Apuleius, M. Cæcilius, C. Saloni, and C. Munatius. To every Romane citizen they set out ten acres apeece: and to the Latine allies three.

About the same time that these affaires passed at Rome, there arrived thither embassadours H out of Ætolia, about their owne civill discords and seditions. Likewise there came others from Thessalie, reporting what was a doing in Macedonie. For Perseus (casting now in his mind how to compass that war, which during his fathers life he devised and thought upon) endeavoured to draw and win unto him not onely all the nations but the citties of Greece, by sending his embassages among them, and promising liberally more than he performed. Howbeit the hearts of the most part were inclined to him and favoured his designes, yea and much more affectionate than to king Eumenes: notwithstanding that all the Sates of Greece, and most of the principall personages were obliged unto Eumenes, & in fee as it were with him, in regard of many courtesies and gracious favours received at his hands: and that hee carried himselfe so in his owne realme, that the citties which were subject unto him, were not willing to change their condition I with any of the free States whatsoever. Whereas contrariwise, the brute went, that Perseus after his fathers decease, killed his wife with his owne hands: and likewise secretly murdered Ajeller, whose ministrie and service in former time he had used in taking away the life of his brother Demetrius: for which cause he lived in exile, because Philip made search after him for to have him punished accordingly; him (I say) he murdered, after he had sent for him upon his fathers death, and procured him to come unto him, with great promises to recompence him highly for the execution of the foresaid fact. Yet as infamous & spotted as he was with these domesticall murders (besides many other massacres of straungers abroad) and for no good part and worthe desert otherwise commendable; he was commonly more esteemed & better regarded of the States K of the cuntry than king Eumenes, a prince so kind and good to his kinsfolke, so just and righte-ous to his subjects, so bounteous and respective to all men; whether it were that they, possessed aforehand with the fame and majestie of the Macedonian kings, despised the rising of this new kingdom: or that they were desirous of novelties and alterations; or lastly, that they wished and had a desire that he should make head against the Rumanes.

Now were not the Ætolians onely together by the eares among themselves, by reason they were dived so deepe in debt, but the Thessalians also: and this pestilent maladie as it were by catching and infection, was spread as farre as Perthœbia. But after that the Senat was advertised that the Thessalians had taken armes, they sent App. Claudius as embassadour to see and appease those troubles: who having rebuked and chastised the chieftaines of both sides, eased and stricken off a great part of the debt, which grew burdensome and grievous by excessive usurie, and L that with consent of the most of the creditours, who had thus overcharged their debtours, hee parted the payment of the due debt and principall, by even portions for certaine yeeres. The troublefom state of Perthœbia likewise was reduced into good terms of quietnes, by the self-same Appius, and after the same order. And at the very same instant Marcellus visited the Ætolians, and tooke knowledge at Delphi of their troubles and garboiles which proceeded from very hostile hearts and minds, enemiellike, and were pursued with civill war. And when hee saw that they contended and strove avie to surpasse one another in rash courses and audacious; hee would by his decree neither charge nor discharge the one partie more than the other: but he requested them indifferently on both sides, to abstaine from warre, to make an end of discord and disention, and M burie all that was past in perpetuall oblivion. Whereupon they were reconciled: & this their agreement was ratified with the assurance of pledges interchangeably given: and accorded it was, they should meete at Corinth, there to bestow their hostages. From Delphi and that generall diet of Ætolia, Marcellus crossed the seas into Peloponnesus, where he had appointed and published a solemne assembly and counsell of the Achæans. Wherein hee highly praised and com- mended

A mended the whole nation, for observing so stedfastly their old decree, wherby they debarred and excluded the Macedonian kings out of their confines, he declared evidently & presented to the view of all the world, what malice & hatred the Romans bare to Perseus. And that it might break out the sooner into open warres, king Eumenes came to Rome, and brought with him a note or abstract of all the preparations for the warre, which with diligent search and enquire into particulars, he had gathered.

Much about the same time, the five Embassadours sent unto king Perseus for to see into the affaires of Macedonie, were commaunded to take a voyage as farre as Alexandria, for to renew the old amitie with king Ptolomeus. The names of them were these, C. Valerius, Gn. Lutatius Cere, Q. Bibius Sulca, M. Cornelius Mammula, and M. Cæcilius Dent. And even then or not much B after, there came embassadours from king Antiochus: and the chiefe & principall person among them, one Apollonius, was admitted to come into the Senat, where he excused the K. his maister for many good & just reasons, in that he had not sent his tribute and made payment so soon as he ought by the day appointed: but now (he said) that he had brought it all, to the end that the king should be to them beholden for nothing but the respite of time only. And besides, that they were come with a present of certaine plate of gold, weighing three hundred pound. That the king his petition was, That the societie and friendship which had bene contracted between his father and them, might be renewed also with him: promising, that if the people of Rome would impose any thing upon him to be done, which were meet to be laid upon a good and faithfull allie, hee would not faile in his devoire to performe all offices whatsoever. For why, the Senate had so well C deserved of him, at what time as he sojourned in Rome, and such courtesie he found among the floure of the Romane young gentlemen, that of all degrees and sorts of men, he was reputed and used more like a king indeed, than an hostage for the time. These embassadours received a gracious answer: and withall, A. Attilius the Pretour of the citty was enjoined to renew the league with Antiochus, which had bene concluded with his father. As for the tribute, the treasurers of the citty received it: and the Censors tooke all the golden vessels aforesaid, who had the charge to bestow the same in what temples they thought good. Vnto the chiefe embassadour was sent a present in money, amounting to the summe of one hundred thousand Asces: who also was allowed an house to lodge in at his pleasure of free-cost: and all his charges were defraied by the citty, during the time that he made abode in Italie. The embassadours who had bene in Syria, gave D this report of him, That he was a man in great favour and highly honoured with the king: and besides, singularly well affected to the people of Rome. Now concerning the affaires of the provinces for that yeere, thus much as followeth.

C. Cicereius the Pretour fought in raunged battail with the enemies in Corsica, wherein seven thousand of the Ilanders were slaine: and 1700 and better taken prisoners. In that conflict the Pretour had vowed to build the chappell of Iuno Moneta. After this, was peace granted to the Corsians at their owne suit and seeking: but they were compelled to pay two hundred thousand pound weight of waxe. Cicereius having thus subdued Corsica, passed from thence over into Sardinia. A field also was fought in Liguria, within the territorie of the Statellates, neere the towne Caristus: for thither assembled a great armie of the Ligurians. At first upon the ar- E rival of M. Popilius the Confull, they kept close within the walles: but afterwards seeing the Romanes at the point to give assault and to lay batterie to the wals, they issued forth of the gates and embattailed themselves. The Confull for his part forflowed not to come to hand-fight, the onely thing he sought for in threatning to give assault. The medley continued above 3 houres, and the hope of victorie hung in equall ballance: which when the Cos. perceived, namely, how the Ligurian ensignes removed not and gave no ground; hee commaunded his Cavallerie to mount on horsebacke, and to charge with all their force and violence upon their enemies in three severall places: many of these horsemen pierced quite through the middest of the bat- tle, and passed so farre, that they charged the enemies upon the backe as they fought. Whereupon the Ligurians were much terrified, and began to flie from all parts: very few reti- F red back into the citty, by reason that the horsemen made head against them that way most: be- sides, many of the Ligurians wer left dead in the places, such was their resolute persistence in fight: killed also they were every where as they fled. Ten thousand (by report) fell upon the edge of the sword, above seven hundred taken prisoners in one place or other, and 82 militarie ensignes were carried away. And yet was not this victorie without effusion of Romane blood: for there died of them

them not so few as three thousand souldiours, by reason that the foremost of both sides fought so manfully in the forefront, and while they would not give ground one to the other, were stricken downe and slaine without mercie. After this battaile, the Ligurians rallied themselves into one place, out of all parts where they were scattered in the rout; and seeing that more of their men were lost than left behind (for in all they were not above ten thousand) they yielded simply without any composition: howbeit in good hope they were, that the Consull would not deale worse by them nor in more rigorous manner than other Generals before him. But he disciplined them all, raised their towne, sold their bodies and all that they had, and sent letters to the Senat of these exploits of his. Which when A. Attilius the Pretour had read in the Senat, (for the other Consull Posthumus was absent, by occasion that he was employed in the survey and visiting of the lands in Campania) they thought it a verie hard and cruell course, that the Statellates, who onely of all the Ligurians had not borne armes against the Romanes, who were then assailed first when as they began not of their owne accord to make war, who also put themselves into the protection of the Romanes, should be thus rigorously intreated, thus torne, dismembred and consumed in most cruell manner: that so many thousands of franke condition, innocent persons, and imploring the mercie of the Romanes, should be thus sold out-right, (a most dangerous example, that never hereafter any one will venture to submit himselfe againe:) and finally, that they should be distracted and carried away into all parts, to live in slavery under them, who having been sometimes professed enemies of the Romans, now enjoy peace and repose. In regard hereof, there passed an arrest or act of the Senat, that M. Popilius the Consull should pay backe the price unto the buyers, and restore the Ligurians to their former libertie; to take order also that their goods (as much as possibly might be recovered) should be rendered unto them: also that armour should be made in that nation with all speed possible, and that the Consull so soone as he had reestablished the Ligurians (upon their submission) in their former estate, should depart out of the province; forasmuch as the honour of victorie consisted not in exercising crueltie upon the poore and afflicted, but in vanquishing the obstinate. But the Consull, as he bare himselfe proud and cruell against the Ligurians, so he shewed as great forwardnesse and disobedience to the Senat. And having sent away the legions to winter in Pisa, he returned to Rome, carrying a fell and angrie stomacke against the LL. and as spitefull and malicious a mind to the Pretour: where immediately he assembled the Senat in the temple of Bellona, and rattled up the Pretour in broad and grosse tearmes. For that he, whose part it had been to have mooved the Senat for thanksgiving to the immortall gods, in regard of the happy achievement of the wars, in stead thereof passed an act of the Senat against him and in favor of the enemies, for to put him by his victorie and to give it away from him to the Ligurians; and finally being no better than a Pretour, would have had the Consull yielded in manner up into their hands. Whereupon he said that he would be so bold as set a fine on his head: and withall, he required the LL. of the Senat to command and ordeine, That the arrest devised against him might be reversed; and to give order, that the processions which in his absence they ought to have decreed (upon his letters sent of his good successe) might now be holden; in consideration first of the honour due to the immortall gods, and then respectively in some measure for his owne desert. But after hee was checked by some of the Senatours to his face, and that in no milder tearmes than he had been rebuked in his absence, he went his waies into his province again, and obtained neither the one suit nor the other.

The other Consull Posthumus having spent the whole summer in surveying the lands onely, and never so much as seene his owne province, returned to Rome against the generall assembly for election, and created Consuls C. Popilius Lanus. Consequently were Pretors elected, to wit, C. Licinius Crassus, M. Iunius Pannus, Sp. Lucretius, Sp. Cluvius, Cn. Sicinius, and C. Memmius, the second time. In that yeere was holden a review of the citie and the number taken of citizens, (when as Q. Fulvius Flaccus and L. Posthumus Albinus were Censors:) wherein were found and enrolled of Romane citizens 269015. The number was somewhat the lesse, by reason that L. Posthumus the Consull had proclaimed in a publick audience, That no person of those Latin allies who were to returne into their own citties (by vertue of an edict made when C. Claudius was Consull) should be enrolled into the subsidie booke at Rome, but every man in his severall citie. This Censorship was administred with concord and unities, yea and to the good and profit of the common-weale. What Senatours soever they deposed from their place and dignitie, and so many gentlemen of Rome as they tooke their horses from, they made them all no better than contributaries to pay all skot and lot, yea and displaced them out of their tribes. And looke whomsoever the one of them noted with disgrace and ignominie, he was not relieved nor allowed againe by the other. This Fulvius dedicated the temple of  Fortuna equestris*, now six yeeres after he had vowed the same in a battaile which he fought with the Celtiberians, at what time as he was Proconsull in Spaine: likewise he exhibited the stage-plays for foure daies together, and one day in the cirque or show-place, Corn. Lentulus (a Decemvir for the holy rites and sacrifices) that yeer died; in whole rounne was substituted A. Posthumus Albinus. There were such mightie drifts and clouds as it were of locusts, brought sodainly at once by a wind from the sea into Apulia, that with their swarmes they overspread all the fields farre and neere. For the riddance of which noisome vermine consuming the fruits of the earth, Cn. Sicinius, Pretour elect, was sent with his full commission of commaund into Apulia, who assembled a mightie number of people for to gather them up, and employed a great time thereabout.

In the beginning of the yeere ensuing, wherein C. Popilius and P. Aelius were Consuls, the remnant of the debates which arose the yeere before, was set on foot againe. The LL. of the Senat would have had the matter proposed & debated againe as touching the Ligurians, and the ordinance of the Senat in that behalfe renewed. But, as Aelius the one Consull put up a bill thereof, so Popilius the other was an earnest suiter, and besought both his colleague and also the Senat in the behalfe of his brother; nay he proceeded so far, that he gave the house to understand, in case they went about any such decree prejudiciall unto him, he would crosse & revcke the same: by which countenance of his he affrighted his colleague; but the LL. were offended so much the more and stormed against both the Consuls, yea and persisted still in their enterprise. And therefore when it was debated in counsell as concerning the provinces, albeit the Consull made meanes to be sent into Macedonie (because the war of Perseus was so neere at hand) yet Liguria was assigned to both of them: for the LL. protested and said, That they would not passe a decree for the government of Macedonie, unless the case of Popilius were propounded, and an act thereof entered. Afterwards, when they demanded a warrant to enroll new armies, or at least-wise to leveie a supply for making up the old, both the one motion and the other was denied. The Pretors also, who required to have a supplement with them into Spain, had a nay: and namely, M. Iunius into the higher province, and P. Lucretius into the fatter. As for C. Licinius Crassus, to him there fell by lot the jurisdiction within the citie over citizens, and to Cn. Sicinius that other over foreigners. C. Memmius was allotted to Sicilie, and Sp. Cluvius to Sardinia. The Consuls for these causes being highly offended and angrie with the Senat, caused the Latine feasts and holidays to be published against the very first day that possibly they might, with an intimation that they would goe straight into their province, and not attend the managing of any affaires touching the State, but onely that which directly pertained to their government.

Valerius Antias writeth, that in these Consuls yeere, Attalus the brother of K. Eumenes came in embassage to Rome, to enforce criminous matter against Perseus, and to give the particulars of the preparation that he made for warre. But the Annales of many other writers (more worthie of credit than he) deliver unto us, that K. Eumenes presented himselfe in proper person: where he was received with such honour, as the people of Rome thought not onely meet and agreeable for his deserts, but also fit and suitable to their owne favours and benefites, which they had in ample manner conferred and in great number heaped upon him. And then he had audience given him in the Senat, where he shewed the cause of his coming to Rome what it was; namely, (besides a fervent desire that he had to see those gods and men, by whose grace and favour he enjoyed so good estate, as better hee durst not wish:) because hee gladly would advertise the Senat by word of mouth, to prevent and withstand the designs of Perseus. And beginning his speech with the platformes and enterprises of Philip, hee recounted withall, how it cost him some Demetrius his life, for that he stood against the warre with the Romanes: moreover, how he had caused the whole nation of the Bastarnians to quit their owne countrey where they were born and bred, to the end, that by their aid he might passe over into Italie: but whiles (quoth he) these matters he projected and cast in his head, his time was come, and arrested he was by death: but he left his kingdom to him, whom he knew to be the most despitous enemy that the Romanes had. And therefore Perseus having received this war (as a man would say) by way of inheritance left him by his father even together with the crown & scepter, from the very first day of his raigne, doth nought els but entertaine, foster, and promote the same, by all the meanes and devices that possibly he can. Mightie and puissant he is besides in number of young, lustie, and able men for service, who during the time of long peace have sprung up and multiplied exceedingly.

In wealth and riches a great potentate he is, and besides in his flourishing years and the best time of his age, which as it is accompanied with the very strength and vigor of his bodie, so his spirit and mind is insured and hardened with skilfull experience and long practise of martiall feats. For from his very infancie nuzzled hath he been in the field and campe, conversing ordinarily with in the roiall tent and pavillion of his father, acquainted with the warres, not onely waged against neighbour nations, but also against the Romans; and that which more is, employed by his father in many and sundrie expeditions and executions of service. But since that himselfe entered upon the kingdome, and swaied the regall scepter in his owne hand, hee hath exploited and accomplished many things with mervellous felicitie and successe, which his father Philip before him could never compass and effect, notwithstanding hee tried and assayed all means, as well of open force as secret fraud. To augment this greatnesse of his, he hath purchased alreadie that authoritie and reputation in the world, which others hardly in continuance of long time, and by many favors and ample benefits attaine unto; and namely, throughout the States of Greece and Asia, all men revere his majestie. For what good turns, for what pleasures done, for what bountie of his they should thus doe and honour him so much, neither see I, neither can I say for certaintie; whether it happen by a speciall gift and fortune that hee hath of his owne, or that (which I am my selfe afraid to speake) it be the deepe malice and hatred which he hath conceived against the Romans, which is the cause that he is of that countenance and so gracious among them. Nay, with the very kings and princes of other nations he is highly esteemed & of passing authoritie. The daughter of Seleucus he hath taken to wife, without any suit of his owne, but being earnestly wooed and requested thereunto. And to Prusias he hath given his owne sister in marriage, after much seeking and instant intreatie. These two weddings were solemnized with the exceeding joy and innumerable presents of infinite embassages: and who should bee present to celebrate the Auspices and complements, yea, and give those spouses in marriage, but the noblest and most renowned States that were? The Bæotian nation had been much solicited by Philip, yet could never bee induced to draw or pen any covenants of accord and amitie with him: but now there is to be seene a league engrossed, yea, and engraven in three severall conspicuous places, the one in Thebes, a second at Sidenum, within a most holy, sacred and renowned temple, and the third at Delphi.
What should I speake of the generall counsell of the Achæans? wherein, had not the designe beene dashed by some there in place, who intimated and alleadged hard the seignorie and empire of the Romans, it would have gone very hard, but that he should have set foot even within Achæa. But contrariwise, I assure you, my due and deserved honors (unto whom it is hard to say, whether they bee more bounden and obligued for private pleasures or publicke benefites) are either forlet through rechelesse disuse and negligence, or els annulled and abolished of wilfull malice and hostile hatred. As for the Ætolians, who knoweth not, that in their civile broiles and seditions, they sought to Perseus for releefe and succour, and not to the Romans? Being thus upheld with societies and amities, he hath provided such furniture of his owne, and made that preparation for war at home, as he needs none from abroad. Of himselfe he is thirtie thousand strong in foot, and five thousand in horse. For ten yeares he is stored with corne aforehand, so as for that kind of purveiance he may spare his owne territories, and also forbear his enemies. As for money in readie coine, he hath such abundance, that over and above the forces of naturall Macedonians, hee waighten thousand mercenarie souldiours, and hath wherewith to make due pay for as many yeeres, besides the yearely customes and profits that arise out of the kings mines. Now for armour, he hath gathered together into his arcenals and armories, sufficient to furnish three such armies. What should I speake of the youth and serviceable men for warre? Set the case that Macedonie failed him and were not able to find ynough; all Thrace is subject unto him, from whence he may serve his turne as out of an ever-running fountaine and lively spring. The rest of his speech he knit up with an exhortation in this manner. I relate not these things (quoth he) my selfe, as blowne abroad and vented by headlesse hearefay and doubtful rumors; neither have I ben so readie to beleeve them, as a man desirous that such criminous imputations should be verified upon my enemies; but as undoubted and certaine reports upon mine own knowledge, as if I had been sent by you of speciall purpose to be a spie: and declared that and no more, which I had

I had seene with mine eyes and not otherwise. Neither would I have left mine owne realme, wherein (by your means & goodnes) in glorious and magnificent State I sit warme ynough, for to saile over so large a sea as I have done, & to carrie vain tales and untruths to you, thereby to crack my credite with you for ever hereafter. But I tell you, these eyes of mine have seene the most renou-med and noblest cities of Asia and Greece, discovering more and more from day to day, what they intend and what their meaning is: who, if they bee let alone and permitted to run on as they begin, would be engaged so far, as they might not possibly returne againe and save themselves by any repentance. Beheld I have Perseus (I say) how hee containeth not within the realme of Macedonie, but one while seizeth upon this by force of armes, another while gaineth and getteth that by favour and good will, which with violence hee could never have conquered. I perceived and considered well how unequal the match and condition is, whiles hee upon you pre-pareth warre, and you againe performe to him securitie of peace. Although in my conceit, and so farre as I could see into it, hee made no more any preparation thereof, but was alreadie upon action and execution. For he chased Abropolis, a confederate prince and friend of yours, forth of his kingdome. And Artetarus the Illyrian, another of your associates and allies, he killed outright, because hee found that he had written some letters unto you. As for Everus and Callicrates, both of the Bæotians, they had spoken their mind against him too franckely, and avowed that they would repeat unto you what things had passed, hee caused to be made away and murdered. The Bizantines hee succoured against the order taken in the accord: upon Dolopia hee levied warre:
The Thessalians and Doris both hee invaded and overran with his armie, to the end, that in some intestine and civile war, by the help of the worse part he might afflict and plague the better. He shut-ted all together, and made a very confusion of the State in Thessalie and Perthæbia, upon the hope of cancelling all bonds and crossing out all debt bookes; that thus by a power and multitude of bankrupts, such as were over-deeply engaged, and whom he had obligued and bound to himselfe, hee might depreffe and oppresse the great men and principall personages. Having wrought these practises uncontrolled, whiles you sit still looking on and suffering all, hee seeing you to let him doe with Greece what he list, maketh full account, that no man will put on armes and make head against him, before hee be passed over into Italie. How safe this may bee for you, nay how this can stand with credite and honestie, see you to that and bee advised. For my selfe, I assure you, I thought it a meere shame and very villanie, that Perseus your enemy should enter into Italie to makewar upon you, before that I, your friend and allie, came to give you warning for to take heed and stand upon your guard. Now since I have in this manner performed my devoure, done that office which I was bound unto of necessitie, and in some measure acquit my selfe and discharged my bounden dutie and obligation of fidelitie; what remaineth more behind for mee to doe, but to be your beadsman to all the gods and goddeses, to vouchsafe you that grace, that you may provide both for your own Commonweale; and also for us your friends and allies, who depend wholly and only upon you? In this last speech he came neere unto the L.L. of the Senat, and touched them to the quick. But for the present no man might know any thing, but only that the king had been in the Senat, so silent were they all, and kept the counsel-house close shut with secrecie. But after the warre was brought to an end, then came abroad, both what the king spake, and what answere was returned to him againe.

Some few daies after, the Senate sat to give audience unto the embassadours of king Per-seus: but having their minds and cares both, possessed aforehand by king Eumenes, all the defence that the embassadours made, and all the entreatie they used, was rejected. Besides, the stoutnes used by Harpalus (the principall person of the embassie) moved their patience and exasperated their stomacks. For he said, that indeed the kings desire and endeavour was, to bee credited and beleeved in his Apologie and defence, That he neither had said nor done any thing founding to hostilitie: many, in case he perceived and saw, that they came upon him thus, and would needs picke quarrels and give occasions of warre, he would stand upon his guard, and defend himselfe with a resolute and valiant courage. For the hazard of the field was common, and the issue of warre uncertaine. Now, all the cities of Greece and Asia both, would rather than their lives have knowne what the embassadours of Perseus, and what Eumenes had done in the Senate: for in regard of his comming, most of the states (supposing verily that hee would stirre coales and make some worke) had sent their embassadours to Rome, pretending colourably other matters in semblance, but indeed to listen after news: and among the rest, was the embassage of the Rhodians, G and the chiefe thereof was one Sisyus, who made no question nor doubt, but that Eumenes had done their errand, and put their cittie and Perseus together in all the criminall matters laid to his charge. And therefore hee made all the meanes that possibly hee could by the mediation of patrons, friends, and acquaintance, to debate the matter with king Eumenes before the bodie of the Senate: which when he had obtained, his tongue walked at large, and overbold hee was and too round with the king, in broad invectives and intemperate tearms: namely, that he had solicited and stirred up the nation of the Lycians against the Rhodians, & was a heavier friend unto Asia than Antiochus had bene. Which speech of his as it was plausible enough & pleasing to the States of Asia (for they likewise by this time inclined to affect and favour Perseus) so it was unfaverie altogether and odious to the Senate, and nothing profitable to themselves and their H cittie. But contrariwise, this banding and conspiracie against Eumenes, wan him the more grace and favor among the Romanes; so as they did him all the honor they could, gave him most rich and costly presents, and endowed him with a curule chaire of estate, and a staffe or scepter, both of yvorie.

After these embassages had their dispatch and were dismissed, Harpalus returned into Macedonia in all speed and hast possible, relating unto the king, how hee had left the Romanes not preparing as yet for warre; but so farre out with him & so highly offended, that it appeared evidently it would not be long ere they began. And Perseus againe for his part, besides that he looked for no other, was well enough pleased therewith, presuming upon the floure & strength of his forces. But above all other he maliced Eumenes most: with whose bloud hee laid the first foundation of the warre: for he suborned one Evander a Candiot and captain under him of certaine auxiliarie souldiours, and three Macedonians besides (whose service and ministrie he had used in the like feats) to murder the king. Hee gave them letters addrested to one Praxo an hostesse of his, a jollie dame in Delphi, and of greatest credite and wealth among them. For assured hee was, that Eumenes minded to go up to Delphi, there to sacrifice unto Apollo. These traitors together with Evander set forward; & to execute this their designed enterprise, they looked all about and sought for nothing but the opportunitie of some place or other. Now, as men ascend from Cirrha to the temple, before they come to any place much peopled and frequented with houses, there stood a mound or mud-wal on the left hand of the path or way, rising somewhat higher than the foundation and ground-work; along which wall there was passage for one by one & no more: for on the right hand the earth was broken downe and fallen, and a breach made of some good depth. Behind that mound aforesaid, these traitors had hidden themselves, & raised some steps like staires to the end that from above, as from the top of a wal, they might discharge their shot upon king Eumenes as he passed by. Before him their marched from the sea, at the first a sort of his friends and followers, together with his guard intermingled one with another; but afterwards as the way grew more streight and narrow, the traine waxed thinner. But when they were once come to the place wher they could not goe but by one at once, Pantaleon one of the States and princes of Aetolia, with whom the king had begun some communication, entred first into the narrow path aforesaid: with that, the knaves that lay in waite behind, rose up and rolled downe two huge stones, whereof the one smote the king upon the head, the other also L nished his shoulder. And verily all the rest of his friends and followers, seeing him fall with the blow, fled some one way, some another: only Pantaleon staid behind all, fearelesse, to protect and guard the king. The murderous villaines might have fetched a short compassse about the wall, and soone runne to the king to make sure worke and dispatch him quier: but they supposing they had done the deed already, fled to the pitch of the mount Pernassus, and made such hast, that when one of their companie hindered and staid their running, because hee dragged behind and could not keepe pace and follow them hard at heeles through those steepe and blind waies, they made no more adoe but killed him outright, for feare least if he were taken, hee should betray and disclose the whole treason. The body of the king lay along on the ground: & first his friends came running about him, then his guard & household servants. When they reared him up, they M found him stonied with the stroke and altogether senselesse in a trance: howbeit by some heat remaining, and the beating of his heart, they perceiued there was some life, but little or no hope they had that he could escape and live. Some there were of his guard and pensioners about him, that made pursuite after these murderers by their tracks: and when they had held on their chase

A chase as farre as to the crest of Pernassus, wearying themselves to no purpose, they gave over and returned as wise as they went. The Macedonians as they had begun an audacious enterprise inconsiderately, so they left it undone as fearfully and without advise. Now by this time was the king come agin to himself. And the morrow after, his friends conveyed him to his ship; from thence to Corinth; and from Corinth along the streights of Isthmus they brought their vessels, & crossed over to Aegina: where his cure was caried so close and secret, without admitting any person to come unto him, that the rumor ran into Asia how he was dead. And Attalus his brother (by your leave) gave good care thereto, & beleevied the news sooner than was becoming brotherly love and unitie. For he entred into such talke both with his brothers wife, and also with the captaine of the castle, as if he had bene the undoubted heire and assured inheritor of the crowne. All this Eumenes B knew full well afterwards: who albeit he purposed to dissimule the matter, and to put it up, at leastwise with silence; yet at their first encounter and meeting together, he could not hold, but reproved and reproached his brother, for being so forward and over-hastie to court and wooe his wife. The brute also was blowne to Rome, and a blunder there was of the death of king Eumenes.

About the same time C. Valerius was returned out of Greece, who had bene sent thither as embassadour to looke into the state of the countrie; to marke also and observe the plots and proceedings of king Perseus. He reported all things futable and agreeable to the intelligences given by king Eumenes, and withall, brought with him from Delphi dame Praxo, in whose house those villanous traitours were lodged and harboured: also one L. Ramnius a Brundusian, who enforced C med moreover and gave evidence as followeth. This Ramnius was one of the principall citizens of Brundisium, & used to lodge and entertaine in his house, not onely all the Romane captains when they came to towne, but also the embassadours of forreine nations, such as were of greatest maike, & principally those that were sent from any kings. By this means, acquainted he grew with Perseus, albeit they never had seene one anothers face. And being invited by the king his letters, wherein he was promised great hope of some nere and inward friendship above others, and consequently of great preferments therby, he made a journie unto him. Within a short time he was wound into very familiar acquaintance with the king, and drawne into private conference & discourse of secrets, farther ywis, than himselfe was willing or well liked of. For the king dealt with him, yea and importuned him with instant prayers and large benefits of rich rewards, that for as D much as all the Romane captaines and embassadours used to take his house for their inne, he would cause as many of them as he writ for, to be poisoned. Now for that hee knew it was a right difficult and dangerous matter to come by such a poison and compassse this project, especially if many were partie & privie to him: and besides, the event uncertaine, either in the effect of the drug it selfe to be strong, quicke, and forcible enough to doe the feat: or in the secret working thereof, lest it should be found and spied; he would therefore put into his hands such a poison, as neither in the giving, nor after it was giuen, might be knowne by any signe whatsoever. Ramnius fearing least if hee refused and denied, hee should bee the first man to take assay & make experiment of the poison, promised so to doe, and then departed. But returne to Brundisium hee would not, before he had spoken with C. Valerius the Embassadour, who then sojourned (as hee heard say) about Chalcis. First unto him he revealed this plot, & by his commandement came F along with him to Rome: where being brought into the Senate, after audience given, hee laid abroad in every point all that had passed. This new matter, over and besides those which Eumenes had reported, was the cause that Perseus was the sooner taken for an enemie, and so declared: the rather because they saw him not onely about to make open warre of a princely and royall mind, but also to practise and execute privlie all kind of mischief, by way of covert brigandage, theevish stealth, and secret poison. The manning of this warre was put off and referred to the new Consuls: howbeit for the present ordained it was, that Cn. Scipio the Pretour, who had the jurisdiction betwene citizens and strangers, should levie and enroll souldiours, who being conducted to Brundisium, should with all convenient speed commit to sea, and F saile over to Apollonia in Epirus, for to seize upon the maritime cities: to the end that the Consul unto whom the province of Macedonia should be allotted, might arrive there with his vessels in safetie, and set his forces on land with ease.

Eumenes, after he had bene kept a long while at Aegina, during the time of his hard and dangerous cure, so soone as ever he might goe safely abroad, went to Pergamus; where, over and besides besides the old hatred settled in his breast, being pricked also with this fresh and bleeding villanie practised by Perseus, he prepared warre with all his power to the utterance: and thither repaired unto him embassadours from Rome, to testifie their joy for his evasion and escape out of so neere and great a daunger.

When the Macedonian warre was delaied and put off for one yeere, and the rest of the Pretours gone alreadie into their provinces, M. Junius and Sp. Lucretius (unto whome befell the government of Spaine) after that they had importuned and wearied the Senate, in suing so long for one thing, obtained at the length a commission for a supply of souldiours to make up the armie; by vertue whereof they enrolled 3000 foot, and 150 horse for the Romane legions; and levied five thousand foot and three hundred horse for the armie of the allies. These forces were transported into Spaine with the new Pretours.

The same yeere, after that a great part of the Campaine territorie, which privat persons here and there held in occupation without regard of lawfull title and tenur, was (upon diligent survey made by Posthumius the Consull) recovered againe for the publicke use of the citie of Rome; M. Lucretius a Tribune of the Commons preferred a law, That the Censors should let out to ferme, the said Campaine lands to tenants for yeerely rent. A thing that had not been done for many yeeres after the winning of Capua, namely, that particular men should be so greedie as to encroch thus beyond their bounds upon the common wast.

The Macedonian war being now concluded, but not as yet published and proclaimed, whiles the Senat was in doubtfull expectation what kings would friend them, and who would side with Perseus; there came to Rome embassadours from Ariarates, bringing with them the kings sonne, a verie child. The speech they made was to this purpose, That the king their master had sent his sonne to Rome, there to have his education; to the end that being there brought up, hee might from his first infancie be acquainted with their fashions, and converse with the people of Rome. His suit and request to them was, that they would vouchsafe unto him not onely the ordinarie entertainment and protection that private persons affourd to their guests, but also to take the charge of publicke tuition, and as it were the guardianship of him. This embassage of the king was well taken of the Senat and pleased them highly. Whereupon they ordained, that Cn. Scipio the Pretour, should set out a mansion house with all the furniture, wherein the young prince and his traine might keepe their residence.

The Thracian embassadours likewise presented themselves before the Senat, to debate their owne controversies in their hearing, and withall desired their friendship and amitie. They obtained their suite, and besides there was sent unto them by way of present, the summe of 2000 Aspes apeece. Glad were the LL. of the Senate that these States were received into their societie, by reason that Thracia lyeth hard on the backe-side of Macedonie: but to the end that they might have perfitt intelligence and notice, how all things went in Asia and the Ilands, they sent thither T. Claudius Nero, and M. Decimius in embassage: whome they commaunded also to visit Creete and Rhodes; and withall, both to renew the amitie, and also to spie and observe, whether the hearts of those allies had been solicited and tempted by K. Perseus.

As the citie was thus in doubtfull suspence and expectation of the event of this new warre, behold, in a tempest that arose in the night, a certaine columnne or pillar, garnished and set out with the beake-heads of warre ships, (which had been erected in the Capitoll during the first Punicke warre by M. Aemilius the Consull, who had for his companion in government Serg. Fulvius) was by a clap of thunder and lightning, rent and cloven from the very base to the chapter. This was taken for a prodigious token, and report thereof was made to the Senat. The LL. gave order, that the Aruspices should be conferred with about it, and their advice taken: likewise they commaunded the Decemvirs to looke into their bookes of Sibylla. The Decemvirs for their part pronounced and declared, that the citie should be purged and hallowed, publicke supplications and prayers made unto the gods, and greater beasts killed for sacrifice, as well at Rome in the Capitoll, as in Campaine neere the promontorie of Minerva. Also that with all convenient speed, there should be plaies solemnly exhibited for ten daies together, in the honor of most mightie and most gracious Jupiter. All this was done with diligence accordingly: but the soothsayers and Aruspices aforesaid, made answer out of their learnings, That this prodigie portended good, and signified the advancement and enlarging of their owne territories: together with the ruine and destruction of their enemies; for that those beak-heads which the storme

overthrew and cast downe, had been the spoiles of ships woon from the enemies. There happened other occurrents besides to encrease the scrupulous religion and devotion of men: for reported it was, how at Saturnia within the towne it rained bloud three daies together. Item, At Calatia an asse was soled with three feet; and a bull together with five kine were stricken stauke dead with one thunderbolt and flash of lightning: last of all, at Oximum there was a shoure of very earth and nothing else. In regard of these wondrous also, sacrifices were celebrated, supplications made, and one day kept holiday and all shop-windowes shut.

Yet were not the Consuls departed into their provinces, because they neither would obey and condescend unto the Senate in proposing the matter as touching Popilius at the councill table; and the LL. were as resolute for their parts to let no decree passe, before that were done. The spight and heart-burning they bare against M. Popilius, grew the more by occasion of his owne letters, wherein hee wrote and gave them to understand, That being Proconsull, hee had now a second time fought with the Statellates in Liguria, and put ten thousand of them to the sword: by reason of which hard courses and extremities of warre, the other nations likewise of the Ligurians were entred into armes. At which newes not onely Popilius was blamed behind his backe, for making warre against all law and equitie upon them that had yielded, and thereby provoking those who before were quiet, to goe out and put themselves in action of rebellion; but the Consuls also were checked to their faces in the Senate, because they set not forward to their charge and government. M. Martius Sermo and Quintius Martius Scylla, two Tribunes of the Commons, seeing the LL. of the Senat thus drawing all in a line, tooke heart unto them, and both menaced the Consuls to fine them, unlesse they made more hast unto their province; and also recited in the Senat a law which they had drawne and framed, and were upon the point to promulge, as touching the foresaid Ligurians who had submitted. The tenure whereof ran in this forme, THAT WHAT PERSON SOEVER OF STATELLAE HAD YELDED HIMSELFE, AND WAS NOT RESTORED TO LIBERTIE AND FREEDOME BEFORE THE CALENDIS OF *SEXILIS NEXT ENSUING, THE SENAT UPON THEIR OTH SHOULD ORDAINE ONE SPECIAL COMMISSIONER TO MAKE INQUISITIONEY WHOSE FRAUD, COVIN, AND NOTICE HEE WAS IN VILLENAGE, AND PUNISH THE PARTIE ACCORDINGLY. Then by authoritie and approbation of the Senate, they published this for a law. Now before that the Consuls tooke their journey, the Senat assembled in the temple of Bellona in regard and favour of C. Cicereius the Pretor of the former yeere. Where audience was given him: and after he had declared what exploits he had performed in Corsica, thereupon demanded triumph: which when hee could not obtaine, he made no more adoe, but rode triumphant in the Albane hill; for now it was taken up and grown for a custome so to doe, and aske the authoritie and the State no leave.

The foresaid law proposed by the Martij, the Commons with a generall consent by their voices graunted and enacted. By vertue of which act of the Commons, C. Licinius the Pretour put to question in the Senat, Whom they would have to sit upon the inquisition according to the forme of the said law. And the LL. ordained himselte to be the inquisitor. Then at length and not afore, the Consuls put themselves in their way toward their province, & received the charge of the armie from M. Popilius. This Popilius durst not yet returne to Rome, for feare hee should be called in question and put to his answer before that Pretour and supreme judge, who had required the advice of the Senate as touching that enquest framed and drawne of purpose against him: knowing full well (as he did) how the Senate was not well affected to him, and the people much more maliciously bent and set against him. But the Tribunes of the Commons thought they would prevent and meet with this finching of his and absenting himselte, by intimation of another act and law provided in that behalfe, namely, That if he entred not into the citie of Rome before the *Ides of November immediately following, it should be lawfull for C. Licinius to proceed in judgement, and give sentence against him in his absence. This cord towed and halled him to Rome with a winesse: and when he was returned and entred into the Senat, they were upon his top, and gave him such a welcome thither, as testified their displeasure and hard conceit of him. After hee had been well baited and shaken up among them, an act of Senate was entred in this wise, That so many of the Ligurians as had not bene enemies, after the time that L. Fulvius and L. Manlius were Consuls, those the Pretours, C. Licinius and Cn. Scipius, should restore and establish in their former state of freedom; and that the Consull C. Popilius should set them them out lands to occupie and possesse beyond the Po. By vertue of this arrest, many a thousand were set free and enfranchised, who being transported over the river Po, had land assigned unto them accordingly. Now M. Popilius upon the law Martia (promulged by the two Marii, Tribunes of the Commons) answered for himselfe judicially twise before C. Licinius. At the third time, the Pretour, overcome with a respective grace and favour to the Consull absent, & the earnest prayers of the whole name & house of the Popilij, adjourned. the defendant to make appearance in the court upon the *Ides of March; on which day the new magistrates were to enter into their offices: and this hee did, because himselfe by that time should be a private person againe, and therefore not to sit upon the bench as judge to heare pleas and to determine. Thus the foresaid act as touching the Ligurians, finely shifted and cunningly avoided, came to just nothing.

*15 of March.

At that time the Carthaginian embassadours were at Rome, with Gulussa the sonne of Masaniissa; betweene whome hard hold and much debating there was in the Senate. The Carthaginians complained, that over and besides the lands (about which there had been sent commissioners from Rome before-time, to view the place and to enquire into the cause) Masaniissa within the last two yeeres had by force and armes possessed himselfe of more than threecore and ten townes and castles within the Carthaginian domaine and territorie. And an easie matter was it for him so to doe, who made reckoning of nothing, nor had regard of any person; whereas the Carthaginians were so tryed and obliged by their capitulations to the good-abearing, that they held their peace: for, inhibited they were to beare armes without their owne country. And albeit they knew assuredly, that they should war within their owne confines, if they disheized the Numidians of those peeces, yet feared they that one expresse article of the accord, wherein they were debarred in plaine termes, to wage warre against the associates of the people of Rome. Howbeit, the Carthaginians could no longer endure his pride, crueltie, and avarice. Sent therefore they were unto the Senate as humble oratours, that it might please them to graunt one of these three requests; to wit, That either they might debate with indifferent audience before them (being allies to both alike) as touching the right of the one & the other: or that they would permit the Carthaginians to defend themselves by just and lawfull armes, against unjust and ungodly force: or else finally (if partiall favour swayed more with them than the truth of the cause) to set downe at once, what their pleasure was should be given away out of their owne, to Masaniissa. For they yet, would have some gage of their hand, and know what they gave; whereas he himselfe had no stay, nor would ever see to make an end; so unsatiabable was his lust and appetite. But in case they might obtaine none of these points, and that there could be found any fault or trespasse of theirs, committed since the peace graunted unto them by Scipio; then, that they rather than any other would chastise them. For leifer they had to live in servitude under the siegnorie of Romanes with safetie, than enjoy such a libertie as should bee exposed to the injuries of Masaniissa. And better were it for them to perish and die once for all, than to live and languish under the yoke of a most cruell and bloudie butcher. At which words the tears trickled downe their cheekes, and downe they fell at their feet. Lying thus prostrate upon the ground, as they moved pitie and compassion to themselves, so they procured despight and malice against the king. Then thought good it was to demand of Gulussa, what hee had to answer as touching these matters? or els (if he had so rather himselfe) to declare before, for what cause & upon what occasion he was come to Rome. Gulussa made answer, That neither it was easie for him to deale in those points, whereof he had no commission from his father: nor for his father to give him any such charge, considering that the Carthaginians, shewed not unto him of what businesse they would treat, ne yet made him so much as privie of their coming to Rome. This only was known, that there was a close counsell holden for certaine nights, by the principall States of Carthage within the temple of Aesculapius, from whence embassadours were dispatched to Rome with hidden and secret messages. And this was the cause that his father had sent him to Rome, to beseech the Senat not to give credite to the slanderous accusations that should be preferred against him by those that were common enemies as well to them as him; who hated him for no other cause, but for that he had continued so constant in his fealtie & allegiance to the people of Rome. The Senat thus having heard what they could say of both sides, sat in counsell as touching the demands of the Carthaginians: and at length commaunded this answer to bee returned, How their advise and pleasure was, that Gulussa should presently depart and goe into Numidia, and give his father

A father to understand from them, that with all speed hee send his embassadours to the Senate, as concerning those complaints which the Carthaginians had made of him: also to give intimation and knowledge unto the Carthaginians, that they repaire likewise thither to debate their controversies and differences betweene them. And if it lay in their power to effect ought for the honour of Masaniissa, they would be as willing to doe it hereafter, as they had been readie heretofore. Marie, to minister justice for favour and affection, that they would not doe in any wise. Willing they were that every man should know and hold his owne, and keepe him within compass; neither minded they to set out new limits, but to observe the old bounds. Indeed they had granted to the Carthaginians, after they were conquered, both townes to inhabite, and territories to possesse: not to this end, that in time of peace they should plucke that away by wrong and outrage, which during the warre they could not take from them by martiall law and force of armes. Thus was the young prince together with the Carthaginians, dismissed. Presents were given both to the one and the other, according to the order, and other courtesies of hospitalitie were friendly observed.

Much about the same time Cn. Servilius Capio, App. Claudius Cento, and T. Annius Luscus, embassadours sent into Macedonie for to demaund amends and restitution, and withall to disclaim and renounce the kings amitie, returned to Rome. Vho having related in order what they had seene and heard, enflamed the Senate more against Perseus, who were already of themselves enkindled ynough. They made report, That through all the cities of Macedonie they saw preparation for warre in all forcible manner; that when they came to the court, for many daies they could find no meanes of access to the speech of the king; and in the end, after they were departed from thence homeward (as being past all hope of parley with him) then and not afore, they were called backe againe out of their way, and so brought unto his presence: that the sum of their embassage and speech unto him was this, namely, to put him in mind of the league first contracted with Philip, and afterwards renewed with himselfe since the death of his father; wherein by expresse words he was inhibited to beare armes without his own frontiers, and likewise debarred to levie warre upon any confederate allies of the people of Rome: after this, that they had recounted and laid abroad from point to point those specialities, which they themselves had lately heard king Eumenes to declare and discourse, which were all apparent truths, upon his owne assured knowledge. Moreover, that the king held a secret counsell for many daies together, with the embassages of the cities & States of Asia: in regard of which injuries, that the Senat thought it reason and equitie that he should make satisfaction, yea, and restore back both to them and also to their associates, whatsoever hee held contrarie to right, contained in the accord. That the king hereupon at the first fell into a fit of choler and indignation, and gave them hard tearmes, reproching at every other word the Romanes for their covetousnesse and insolencie. And as for their embassadours that came unto him one after another, he said they were but spies, to listen and see what he did or said; & no marvel, for they thought it meet that he should conforme and frame himselfe in all his words and deeds, according to their becke and commandment. At the last, when hee had in this wise discharged his choler with high words and broad speeches for a long time, that he commaunded them to repaire againe unto him the next morrow, for that hee would give them their answer in writing; and then he delivered unto them a script to this effect as followeth. First, as touching the accord & covenant concluded with my father, that is nothing to me at all: if I sufficed it to be renewed, it was not for any liking or approbation thereof; but because I being new come to the crown, and lately possessed of the kingdome, I was to beare and endure all things whatsoever. But in case they will enter into a new league with me, requisit it is that a treatie and agreement passe first of the conditions. And if they could bee content that a covenant were drawne with equall and indifferent capitulations, yet I will sleepe upon it and bee well advised what to doe for the best, as I doubt not but they likewise will have a good regard to the profit of their Commonweale. And herewith, that he suddainly flung away from them, and wee all began to void out of the pallace. Whereupon wee proceeded according to our commission to abandon and disavow his amitie and societie. At which words of ours, hee staied in great wroth and furie, and with a lowd and shrill voice, warned us upon our owne perill and hazard, to bee gone out of the marches of his realme within three daies: finally, in this manner wee departed and put our selves in our journey, and found neither friendly welcome at our first coming, nor any courteous entertainment while we were there, nor yet a kind farewell at our departure.

departure. When they had once done, the Thessalian and Ætolian embassadours had audience.

The Senate, to the end that they might know out of hand, what captaines and commanders the commonweale was to employ, thought good to write unto the Coss. that the one or other of them (who first might) should repaire to Rome for the creation of new magistrates. And no great matter to speake of, as concerning the state, was that yeere done by the Consuls. But more expedient it was thought for the commonweale, to suppress and appease the Ligurians, whose bloud was up and chafed against them, considering that the Macedonian warre was in daily expectation.

Moreover the embassadours of Illyria gave occasion, that Gentius also king of Illyricum was had in jealousy: who at one time both complained of him, that now twice he had given the waite to their countrie: and also made report, how the Macedonian and Illyrian kings were all one, & so great together, that with one consent & common counsell they prepared to warre upon the Romans: finally, that the Illyrians were now at Rome, in shew and semblance of embassage, but indeed and very truth, no better than spies, addressed of purpose by the motive and advice of Perseus, to hearken & learne whereabout they went at Rome. These Illyrians were sent for into the Senat-house, and when they had said, that they were employed in embassage from their king Gentius, to answer unto those accusations which it might be the Illyrians framed against him: it was againe demanded of them, How it hapned that they went not directly nor shewed themselves in such sort to the magistrate, that according to the manner & custome, they might have had their lodging provided and presents given them, with the ordinarie allowance of the cittie, meet for them during their abode; that thereby knowledge might have bene taken as well of their coming, as also of their businesse and errand: But being taken in a trip & found fumbling in their answer, they were commaunded to void out of the Counsel-chamber. For thought it was not meete, to give them their dispatch as embassadours, since they made no meanes to present themselves unto the Senate: but rather they were of advise, to dispatch embassadours of their owne to the king, to signifie unto him, which of his associates had complained unto the Senate, how hee had burnt their villages within their territorie: yea, and to tell him of it plainly, that it was not well done of him, that he could not forbear but do wrong to his owne allies. In this embassage were sent, A. Terentius Varro, C. Pletorius, and C. Cicereius.

Likewise those embassadours, whose commission was to visit the associate kings, returned out of Asia, and reported, that in the said Asia they had communication with Eumenes; in Syria with Antiochus, and in Alexandria with Ptolomeus: who all of them had bene solicited by sundrie embassies of Perseus, howbeit they persisted firme and fast in their professed fealtie, and promised to performe whatsoever the people of Rome would command them. Also that they went to the confederate states, whome they found true and loiall enough, excepting the Rhodians onely, whom they perceived to bee floting and wavering, as altogether infected and poisoned with the counsell of Perseus.

Now were the Rhodian embassadours come to answer those things which they knew were commonly bruited abroad touching their cittie: howbeit the Senat was not of mind to give them audience, before the new Consuls entred into their office. But they were all of advise to delay no longer the preparation of warre. C. Licinius the Pretor had in charge, out of the old Quinquereines which were laid up in the dockes and harbours, to repaire as many as might serve at sea; to rig also & prepare a fleet of 50 saile. But if he could not come to make up that full number, then to write unto his colleague C. Aemilius in Sicilie, for to repaire, calke and trim those ships which were in Sicilie, that with all speed possible they might be sent to Brundisium. The said Pretour C. Licinius was commaunded to enroll of Roman citizens (& those Libertines, such as of bond-men borne had bene enfranchised) for mariners and sailers, as many as might serve five and twenty ships: & Cn. Licinius had commission to levie as many of Latine allies for the like number of ships: also the same Pretour was enjoyned to charge the Latine allies with eight thousand foot, and foure hundred horse. A. Attilius Serranus, who had bene Pretour the yeere before, was chosen to receive these forces at Brundisium, and to conduct them over into Macedonie: and Cn. Scipio the Pretour was appointed to have the armie in readinesse for to be transported. As for C. Licinius the Pretour, he by authoritie from the Senat, wrote to C. Popilius the Consull, that he should commaund the second legion, which had bene longest employed in Liguria, and

A consisted of most experienced souldiours, together with foure thousand footmen and two hundred horse of the Latine allies, to be readie at Brundisium upon the *Ides of Februarie. With this fleet of ships and forces of souldiours, Cn. Scipio was commaunded to keepe Macedonie, untill one were appointed to succede him; and for this purpose his charge of command was continued for a yeere longer. All these directions of the Senate were put in execution with great diligence and expedition. Eight and fortie Quinquereines were set afloat out of their docks: and L. Porcius Licinius was ordained to conduct them to Brundisium: the other twelve were sent out of Sicilie. Three embassadours were dispatched into Apulia and Calabria, to wit, Sex Digittus, T. Iuventius, and M. Caelius, for to buy corne to serve the fleet and the armie. Now when all things were provided and in readinesse, C. Scipio the Pretor departed from the cittie in his warlike coate of armes, and arrived at Brundisium. About the end of the yeere C. Popilius the Consull returned to Rome, somewhat later than the Senate had ordained; who was commanded to take the first time, and with all speed to create new magistrates, considering that so great a warre approached so neere. And therefore when the Consull discoursed in the temple of Bellona, astouching his exploits in Liguria, the LL. of the Senate were nothing well pleased to heare him; but in stead therof, they muttered every where, and asked him estoones, Why he had not restored to libertie those Ligurians, who were oppressed through the wicked proceedings of his father: The election of the Consuls was holden upon the twelvth day before the Calends of March, according to the writs that went out: wherein were created Consuls, Pub. Licinius Crassus and Caius Cassius Longinus. The morrow following, the Pretours were elected, to wit, Caius Sulpicius Galba, L. Furius Philus, L. Caninius Dives, C. Lucretius Gallus, C. Caninius Rebutius, and L. Villius Annalis. To these Pretours the provinces were assigned in this manner: that two of them should sit as LL. chiefe justices in Rome for civill jurisdiction: three other to have the government of Spaine, Sicilie, and Sardinia: so as the sixt onely should remaine not allotted to any place, for to be employed wheresoever the Senate would think good and ordeine. The Consuls elect were commaunded by the Senate, upon the solemne day when they were to enter into their magistracie, after they had sacrificed greater beasts, as it appertained, to pray in this forme, That the gods would vouchsafe the warre which the people of Rome intended now to enterprise, to speed well and come to happy issue. The same day the Senate decreed, that C. Popilius the Consull should set out plaies for ten daies together in the honour of Iup. Opt. Max. & that offerings should be made at all the shrines and altars, if so be the commonweale continued for ten yeeres, in the same good estate as now it stood. And as the Senat ordained, the Consull vowed in the capitoll, that the said plaies should bee exhibited, and offerings presented of as great valour as it pleased them to set downe. This vow was pronounced by the Consull in the presence of no fewer than 150 Senators, and according to that form of words which Lepidus the high-priest or soveraigne bishop indited. That yeere died certaine Prelates of State, to wit, L. Aemilius Pappus one of the Decemvirs or superintendents over the holy rites, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus a bishop, who the yeere before had bene Censor. This man had a foule end. It fortuned that news came unto him of his two sonnes, who then served in the wars of Illyricum, how the one was departed out of this life, and the other lay sicke of a greivous and dangerous maladie. The sorrow for the one, and the fear for the other, happening so just at one time, brake his heart and oppressed his spirits: in so much as the next morning, when his servants entered betimes into his bed-chamber, they found him hanged by a cord, and strangled. It was thought abroad, that he had never bene his owne man, since hee was Censor, and commonly it was spoken, That Iuno Lacinia in wrathfull displeasure against him for spoiling her temple, bereft him of his right wits. In the roume of Aemilius, M. Valerius Messala was substituted Decemvir: and in stead of Fulvius there was elected Archbishop, Cneus Domitius Aenobarbus, who to say a truth was very young to bee made a priest.

In that yeere wherein P. Licinius and C. Cassius were Consuls, not onely the cittie of Rome, and the whole land of Italie, but all the princes and States of Europe and Asia, were amited respectively upon the warre betwene the Macedonians and the Romans. Eumenes (king of Asia) not onely carried an old cankered malice against Philip, but also was pricked forward with new despite and anger upon a fresh occasion, in that by the wicked practise of Perseus, hee had like to have bene sacrificed at Delphi. Prusias king of Bithynia, was resolved not to enter into armes, but to attend the issue of the warre. For hee thought it not reason and seemely seemely for him to take armes in the defence of the Romanes against his wives brother; and this account hee made, that if Perseus happened to have the better he might soone obtaine pardon at his hands by the mediation of his sister. Ariarates king of the Cappadocians, over and besides that hee had promised aid to the Romanes in his owne name, ever since that hee was linked in affinitie to Eumenes, drew the same way which hee went, and joyned with him in all his counsels both of warre and peace. As for Antiochus [king of Syria] his teeth watered verily at the kingdome of Egypt, as he, who despised as well the childhood of the young king in his nonage, as the weakenesse and negligence of his guardians: and considering there was some controversie about the title of Coelesyria, he supposed that he should have good occasion to levie war, to manage also and exploit the same without impeachment, whiles the Romanes were busied in the Macedonian warre; howbeit as well by his owne embassadours sent unto the Senat, as also unto theirs addressed unto him, he promised stoutly to be for them. Ptolemæus [the young king of Egypt] being yet under age, was at the dispositions of others: his tutors and protectours, as they prepared to wage warre against Antiochus for the recovery of Coelesyria, so they promised the Romanes withall to doe their devoir in the Macedonian warre. Masani[s] [K. of the Numidians] was altogether for the Romans; he furnished them with coine, and intended to send his sonne Misagenes with aides both of men and elephants in that service. Howbeit hee so disposed of his designs, as might serve his turne which way soever the world went: for if the victorie fell to the Romanes, he ordered that his affaires should remaine still in the same state; and better hee was not to looke for, because the Romanes would not suffer any violence to be offered unto the Carthaginians: but in case the Romanes went downe and had the overthrow, (who then protected the Carthaginians) then hee made full reckoning of Asia to be his owne. Gentius [king of Illyricum] had so demeaned himselfe, that he was suspected of the Romanes; yet was hee not fully resolved which side to take unto: and it seemed hee would joyne to one or the other, more upon a fit as it tooke him in the head, than with any discretion or advise. Cotys the Thracian, king of the Odrysians, tooke part evidently with the Macedonians. In these tearmes (I say) stood the KK. as touching this present warre. As for the freecities and States besides, the common people every where (as alwaies lightly it is scene) enclined to the worse part, and ran with the K. and the Macedonians: but the principall persons and men of qualitie, a man might perceive affected diversly. Some went with the Romans all upon the head, inasmuch as they greatly empaiied their authoritie in excessive favour to them: few of them were induced by the just and upright government of the Romanes, but the most part were carried away with this strong conceit, That the more they employed themselves for them, the greater men they should be at home in their owne cities. Another sort there were of the kings flattering favorites, who being deeply drenched in debt, and in despaire of bettering their fortune (if the present state held still) abandoned and gave themselves over to entertain all changes and innovations. And some there were besides, possessed with a vaine humour of their owne, because Perseus seemed to have more favor of the common people. A third sort there were (and those of the best and wisest of all other) who if it had lyen in their hands to determine whome they would have to be the greater lord, wished to have been under the Romans rather than the K. Marie if they might have had their liberty to be chusers simply of their fortune, by their good will they would not have had the one part advanced by the depression and subversion of the other: but that the forces and puissance of them both remaining entire and unfoiled, peace thereby might be entertained: and so betweene them both, the state of cities should continue in the best case, when as the one part might ever protect the weaker side from the injuries of the mightier. And those that stood affected thus, held them quiet and said not a word; but being safe themselves, beheld the behaviour and deportments of those that were the partakers and favourers of either side.

The Consuls that day wherein they entred their government, when they sacrificed (according to the ordinance of the Senat) with greater beasts in all the temples and chappels, wherein (for most part of the yeere) the sacred beds and couches for the gods were prepared; and there by had presaged by good tokens, that their prayers were acceptable to the immortall gods, made report unto the Senat, That their sacrifices were as they ought to be, as also their prayers, which they conceived as touching the warre. The Bowell-priests likewise by their learning declared, That if they went about any new enterprise, they should make speed; for why? all did prognosticate

A nosticate victorie, triumph, and enlargement of their seignorie. Whereupon the LL. of the Senat commaunded the Consuls to propose unto the people the first day of the generall assembly of the Centuries in this manner: IN THE NAME OF GOD, AND TO THE WELFARE AND HAPPINES OF THE COMMONWEALTH: WHEREAS PERSEUS THE SONNE OF PHILIP K. OF MACEDONIE, (AGAINST THE ACCORD AND COVENANT CONCLUDED WITH HIS FATHER FIRST, AND AFTER HIS DEATH RENEVED WITH HIM) HATH LEVIED WARRE UPON THE ALLIES OF THE PEOPLE OF ROME, WVASTED THEIR TERRITORIES, SEIZED THEIR CITIES, COMPTOTTED TO ENTER INTO ARMES AGAINST THE PEOPLE OF ROME, AND TO THAT END HATH PROVIDED ARMOUR, SOULDIOES, AND A FLEET: UNLESSE HE MAKE SATISFACTION, PLEASETH IT YOU THAT VWARRE BE ENTERPRISED AND WVAGED AGAINST HIM. This bill passed by all the suffrages of the people. Then was there an act of the Senat likewise entred, That the Consuls should either agree together, or else cast lots for the provinces of Italy and Macedonie: and looke whose lot fell to Macedonie, he should persecute with fire and sword K. Perseus, and all that sect and bend which tooke his part, unlesse they made amends to the people of Rome. It was concluded also, that four legions should be newly enrolled, for either Consull twaine: with this preheminance & vantage to the province of Macedonie, that whereas to the legions of the other Consull (according to the aunient custome) there went but five thousand foot and two hundred horse apeece, there should be enrolled for Macedonie six thousand foot and three hundred horse equally to a legion. Also for the one of the Consuls in the armie of the allies, the number C was augmented, so as besides those six hundred horsemen which Cn. Scinius had conducted already, he should of those allies transport over into Macedonie, sixteen thousand footmen and eight hundred horse. As for Italie, twelve thousand footmen of allies and six hundred horse were thought sufficient. Moreover, this prerogative had the province of Macedonie, that for Centurions and souldiours the Consull might enroll of the elder sort whome he thought good, as many as were not above fiftie yeeres of age. In choosing of Tribunes militarie and colonels, the old manner was this yeere chaunged, in regard of the Macedonian warre; to wit, that the Consuls (by advise and authoritie of the Senate) should moove unto the people, that the said Tribunes might not that yeer be elected by voices of the people, but that their elections should be referred to the judgement and discretion of the Consuls and Pretours. The charge of command was thus divided among the Pretors as followeth. That Pretour whose lot fell to go whither it pleased the Senat to send, was assigned to take his journey to the flect at Brundisium, and there to survey and revise the sea-servitours, and looke how many he thought not meet for service, them to discharge, and to make up the number with chosen Libertines; and in any wise to order it so, that two third parts consisted of Romane naturall citizens, and the other third of allies. Item, That provision of victuals for the navie and the armie, should be brought out of Sicilie and Sardinia. And the Pretours of those two provinces had in charge to exact a double tenth of the Sicilians and Sardinians, and this graine to be conveyed into Macedonie for the armie. Now Sicilie fell to C. Caninius Rebulus, Sardinia to L. Furius Philus, and Spaine to L. Canuleius. C. Sulpitius Galba was L. chiefe Iustice for the citizens of Rome, and L. Junius Annalis for the strangers: but C. Lucretius Gallus his lot was to goe where the Senate would employ him. Betweene the two Consuls there was some jarre and wrangling, rather than any great debate about there province. Cassius for his part said, That he was by right to warre in Macedonie without any casting of lots for the matter, forasmuch as his colleague might not enter in to lot with him, and save his oath. For hee being Pretour, had sworn solemnly in a frequent assembly of the people (because he would shift off and not goe into his province) that he had occasion to celebrate sacrifices in a certaine place and upon set daies, which could not be performed (as they ought) if hee were at sea. And the same (as I take it) cannot be well done during his absence now that hee is Consull no more than whiles hee was Pretour. Howbeit, if the Senate be of opinion and judge, that more consideration is to be had to satisfie Caius Licinius his will now in his Consulship, then regard of the oth he tooke before in his Pretorship, yet will I notwithstanding accommodate my selfe to the pleasure of the Senate. The LL. were consulted with hereabout, who judging that it were a proud part to denie him the government of a province, unto whom the people of Rome had graunted the dignitie of a Consulship, commanded the Consuls to cast lots. Thus Macedonie fell to P. Licinius, and Italie to C. Cassius. Then

Then they put to lotterie also the conduct and employment of the legions: whereby the first and third were to be transported into Macedonie, the second and fourth to remaine in Italie. In the mustering and choise of souldiours, the Consuls went more neerely and strictly to worke by farre, than customably they used at other times. As for Licinius, he enrolled the elder fort also, as well for souldiours as centurions; and many there were who voluntarily entred their names, because they saw how those thrived well and grew rich, who had served either in the former Macedonian warre, or against Antiochus in Asia. Now when as the marshal-Colonels called forth the centurions by name one after another, and the principall first, there happened to bee three and twentie centurions of them, who before time had been Primipilares, and led in the cheefest and best place, & when they were cited, they called unto the Trib. of the Com. for to be relieved by their lawfull assistance. But two of that fellowship and societie of Tribunes, namely, M. Fulvius Nobilior, & M. Claudius Marcellus, referred them over to the Consuls, alledging, that by right, the knowledge of these matters pertained to those who had plenarie commission to take musters, and to manage the war-affaires. But all the rest of the Tribunes avowed that they would assume it into their owne hands, and determine of that for which they were called unto as competent judges; yea, and if injurie were offered to their fellow-citizens, they would not faile but helpe and succour them. All this was debated in the Tribunes-court. Thither was M. Popilius, a Consular man, called to the hearing of this matter, and thither repaired the centurions and the Consull also. And when the Consull required that the case should bee heard and decided in a generall assemblie, thereupon the people was summoned to meet in publicke together. In which solemn congregation M. Popilius, who had bene Consull two yeeres before, spake in the behalfe of the centurions to this effect. These martiall men (quoth he) have accomplished their full time of service required by law; they carie about them bodies as wel spent & crafe for age, as broken by continuall travels: howbeit refuse they will nothing, but are readie to doe their devoir unto the Commonweale. This onely they humbly crave and request, that they may not be assigned to baser places of command, than wherein they have bene employed already when they bare armes. Then P. Licinius the Consull commaunded the act of the Senat to be openly read: wherein it was ordained first, To levie warre upon Perseus; then, to enroll as many as they could of the old experienced Centurions for that warre; and last of all, to exempt none from soulderie, but such onely as were above fiftie yeeres of age. After this hee earnestly befought them in this new warre so neere to Italie and against a prince so puissant, neither to hinder the Colonels in levying souldiours, nor forbid the Consull but that hee might appoint to each man what place and degree was thought to stand most with the good of the Commonweale. And in case there arose any doubt and difficultie in this businesse, to submit the decision thereof to the Senat. After that the Consull had delivered his mind, Sp. Ligustinus one of them who had appealed to the Tribunes of the Commons, requested both the Consull and the Tribunes to give him leave for to speake a few words unto the people: who having libertie graunted with all their good wils made a speech unto them in this wise. My maisters, you Quirites, I Spurius Ligustinus of the tribe Crutumina, am descended from the Sabines. My father left mee an acre of land, and a little cottage to it, wherein I was borne, bred, and brought up, and whereupon at this day I dwell. So soone as I was come to mans estate, my father gave me to wife my cousin germane, his neece by the brother, who brought nothing with her for marriage-good, but freedome of birth, honestie of life, and therewith fruitfulnessse of wombe, as much (I may say to you) as a rich man of some wealthie house may well maintaine. Sixe sons God hath sent betwene us, and two daughters to them, both maidens marriageable. Four of our sonnies are men grown, and have put on their mans robe; two are boies full in their pretexta, under seventene yeeres old. I myselfe was prest to the warres, the yeere when P. Sulpitius and C. Aurelius were Consuls. In that arme which passed over sea into Macedonie, I served in qualitie of a common souldiour for the space of two yeeres against king Philip. In the third yeere T. Quintus Flaminius, in regard of my forwardnesse assigned me the tenth place of leading among the Hastati in the vaward. After that Philip and the Macedonians were vanquished, and wee brought over againe into Italie and discharged, I went immediately as a volunarie servitour into Spaine with M. Porcius the Consul. And there is not a commaunder alive at this day, who saw farther into a souldiour, and could judge better of vertue and valour than hee: as they all knowfull well, who by long warfare have had experience both of him and also of other leaders. Hee being my capitaine, reputed me wor-

A thic to have the first place and leading of the forme century of the Hastati. A third time I became a voluntarie againe in the expedition against the Aetolians and king Antiochus; and M. Caelus advanced mee to the captainship of the Principes, in the very first place of the for-most century. When king Antiochus was chased, and the Aetolians subdued, we were brought backe again into Italic, and two yeers together I was in pay with the legions that received yeerely wages and allowance. Twife after this, I bare armes and served in Spaine, once under Q. Ful- cius Flaccus, a second time under Tib. Sempronius Gracchus the Pretor. By Flaccus I was brought home among others, whom for their valiancie and prowess he thought good to have in traine for the honour of his triumph: and at the request and entreatie of Tib. Gracchus I accompanied him into his province. Where, within few yeeres space I had the leading of the first companie of the Pilani or Triarii in the reward. Four and thirtie times have I been rewarded with presents at my Generals hands, in token of vertue and prowess. Sixe civicke coronets have I received: two and twentie yeeres full have I followed the warres, and more than fiftie yeeres old I am. Now if neither I had served out all the yeeres required by law, nor might plead exemption and immunity by mine age, yet seeing I am able to shew foure fouldiours for one, my foure sonnes [I say, for my selfe alone] me thinks it were reason, & P. Licinius, that I were now freed and discharged.
And all this I pray you take, as spoken for the behoofe of my cause. Now as touching my person thus much. So long as any man who hath authoritie to enroll fouldiours, shall judge mee sufficient and able to beare armes, I will not goe about to make excuse and shift it off. And looke what place the Colonels and marshalls shall suppose me worthe of, it lieth in their good and pleasure to assigne me unto it: but to performe that no one person in the whole armie summount me in valour, that shall be my owne endeavour; like as not only my captaines, but those also who have served with me are able to testifie, That I ever have so caried my selfe and performed as much. And ye likewise my fellow fouldiours, albeit you practise and keepe in ure the privilege and benefit of appealing to the Tribunes, yet meer and reason it is, since in your youthfull daies ye never did ought in any place against the authoritie of the Senat and the Consuls; yea, now also in your declining age bee at the disposition of the Senate and the Consuls; yea, and to esteeme all places worshipfull, wherein you shall defend and maintaine the Commonweale. When hee had thus said, the Consull highly commended him, and from before the people brought him into the Senate. And there also by the advise and authoritie of that honourable house, thanked hee was;
and the marshall Colonels, in regard of his vertue, appointed him to be the principall centurion of the Pilani in the first legion. So, the rest of the centuries renouncing their appeale to the Tribunes, yielded obedience in the muster and levie abovesaid.

To the end that the magistrates and great commaunders might goe more timely into their governments, the Latin feasts and hollydaies were published to be holden upon the * Calends of June. Which solemnitie being finished, C. Lucretius the Pretour tooke his journey to Brundisium, having sent before all necessarie furniture and provision for the fleet. Besides those armies which the Consuls levied, a commissiion was directed out to C. Sulpitius Galus the Pretour, to enroll foure legions of Romane citizens with the ordinarie full proportion of infanterie and caval-lerie, and to chuse out of the bodie of the Senate foure Colonels for to commaund them. Also to levie of Latin allies fifteen thousand footmen and twelve hundred horse, and to take order that this armie should bee readie to goe whether soever the Senate thought good. P. Licinius the Consull at his owne instant request (that over and above the armies of citizens and allies, hee might have an addition of auxiliaries) obtained of Ligurians two thousand, of Candiot archers an uncerteine number, namely, as many as the *Candiot*s upon request would send. Moreover, certain Numidian horsemen and elephants: for which purpose L. Posthumius Albinus, Q. Te- rentius Culleo and C. Aburius were sent in embassage to *Masani*sa and the Carthaginians. Sembla-bly it was thought good to send three embassadours into Crete, to wit, A. Posthumius Albinus, C. Decimus, and A. Licinius Nerva.

At the very same time there arrived embassadours from king Perseus. But suffred they were not to enter into the cittie; considering that both the Senate had ordained, and the people assented alreadie, to make warre upon their king and the Macedonians. So, admitted they were into the temple of Bellona before the Senate, where they delivered their message in this manner: That king Perseus marvelled why there were armies transported over in Macedonie? And if the Senat might bee intreated so much, as to recall them home, the king would make satisfaction for the

wrongs done unto their allies, in such sort as the Senate in their discretion would appoint. Now there was in the Senat-house at that time Sp. Carvilius, sent backe for that very purpose out of Greece from Cn. Sicinius. Hee made report and remonstrance, how Perrhoebia was forced by armes, and certaine cities of Thessalie woon; with other exploits that king Perseus had either performed, or els was in hand to enterprise. To which challenges the embassadours were commanded to make answer. But after they were scene once to falter in their speech, saying, they had no farther commision than that they had delivered already; they were willed to relate unto the king their maister, That P. Licinius the Consull would shortly bee in Macedonie with an army, unto whom the king might adresse his embassadours, if he minded to do as he said & to make amends. As for sending any more to Rome, there was no need nor cause, for as much as they would not suffer any of them to passe through Italie. When they were dismissed with this short dispatch, P. Licinius the Consull had in charge, to command them to depart out of Italie within eleven daies, and to send Spurius Carvilius for to guard them all the way to the sea-side untill they were shipped. These occurrents passed in Rome before the Consuls were gone into their provinces.

Now by this time Cn. Sicinius (who ere that hee left his magistracie, was sent before as farre as to Brundisium to the fleet and the armie) having put over into Epirus five thousand foot and three hundred horse, was encamped before Nymphæum in the territorie of the Apolloniates. From thence he sent certaine colonels with two thousand souldiours, to seize the forts & castles of the Dassaretians and Illyrians, by occasion that they of their owne accord made meanes and sent for garrisons, so the end they might bee better guarded and secured from the violence and invasion of the Macedonians bordering upon their confines.

Some fewe daies after, Q. Martius, A. Atilius, P. and Ser. both Cornelij and Lentuli, together with L. Decimius, who all had bin sent in embassie into Greece, brought with them to Corcira one thousand footmen; where they both parted between themselves their severall quarters whither they would go, and also their souldiours. Decimius was sent to Gentius king of the Illyrians, with commaundement, If he saw him any waies comming on and enclined to entertaine amitie with the Romanes, to found him and give the assay, yea and to draw him into the association of this war. The two Lentuli were sent into Cephallenia, from thence to traverse & crosse over into Peloponnesus, and before winter to fetch about and compass the coast of the West-sea. Martius and Atilius were assigned to visit Epirus, Ætolia and Thessalie. From thence they were enjoined to haue an eie into Bæotia and Eubæa, and so to saile over into Peloponnesus, where they appointed to meet with the Lentuli. But before that they departed from Corcira, letters were brought from Perseus, wherein he demaunded what reason the Romanes had either to transport any forces into Greece, or to seize upon cities? Thought good it was to returne him no answer by writing, but onely by word of mouth thus much to say unto the messenger that brought the letters, That the Romanes did it for the defence and safeguard of the said townes. The Lentuli as they rode their circuit visiting the citties and townes of Peloponnesus, exhorting the States and communalities thereof indifferently one as well as another, To aide the Romans at this present against Perseus, with seembleable courage and like fidelitie as they had stood with them first in the warre against Philip, and afterwards in that with Antiochus; might heare in their publicke assemblies much muttering and grumbling thereat. The Achæans (who from the very beginning of the Macedonian warres had bene altogether for the Romanes, & during the war against Philip, enemies to the Macedonians) tooke it in great disdain that they were reputed in the same range with the Messenians and Eleans, and no better than they who had borne armes against the people of Rome, for Antiochus their enemy; and who but the other day, being enrolled into the communalitie and counsell of the Achæans, complained that they were deliuered unto the victorious Achæans, as the recompence and guerdon of their conquest. Martius and Atilius as they went up to Girona a towne of Epirus, ten myles from the sea, in a generall countsell holden there of all the Epirotes, had audience with great contentment of them all. Four hundred of their yong and able lustie men they sent into the Oristians countrie to lie in garison for defence of those Macedonians who by them were set at libertie. From thence they held on their progresse into Ætolia: & after they had sojourned there some few daies (whiles a new Pretor was elected in the roume of him that was deceased, and Lyciscus appointed the governor, a man knowne for certaine to favour the Romans) they passed over into Thessalie. Thither repaired the embassa-

A embassadours of the Acarnanians and the banished persons of Ætolia. The Acarnanians were enjoined to utter and declare before them what they had committed & done against the people of Rome, being inveigled and deceived by the promises of the twokings Philip and Antiochus during the warres against the one and the other; since occasion was now presented unto them, for to make amends and salve all that was amisse. For if upon their ill demerits toward the people of Rome, they had made triall and tasted of their clemencie, they might now by good deserts proove their bountie another while. As for the Bæotians, they were reprooved and upbraided for entering into association with Perseus; and when they seemed to lay the whole fault upon Isme-nidæ a chieftaine of one of the two factions, and certaine cities and States which being of a different opinion, were drawn to the side; Say ye so? (quoth Martius againe) and that shall soone appeare, for we will permit every communalitie and citie to answer apart and severally for themselves the best they can.

Now was the Diet of the Thessalians holden at Larissa: where, as the Thessalians tooke good occasion & found ample matter of thanksgiving to the Romanes, for the libertie which by their goodnes they had obtained: so the Romane legates had as copious an argument to render them thanks, for that sitt in the war with Philip, and afterwards of Antiochus, they had bin so mightily aided by the Thessalian nation. Thus by this mutuall rehearsall of pleasures and good turnes given and taken, the hearts of the multitude were enkindled with a fervent zeale to decree & ordaine whatsoeuer it pleased the Romanes to desire. After this counsell was dissolved, there came embassadours from king Perseus unto Martius, upon a speciall affiance of the private friendship and hospitalitie which had passed between his father king Philip, and the said Martius [& his father.] These embassadours began their speech with a commemoration of the said familiar and inward acquaintance, requesting him to permit the K. for to have access unto him, & to comming together. Martius answered, that he also had heard his father speake of the limitie and mutuall hospitalitie betweene him and king Philip: in regard and remembrance of which neere bond of familiarie he was the more willing to take upon him the charge of that embassage and commision. As to the parlie, he would not have differred it at all, if hee might commodiously have wrought it: & now for this present he promised (so soon as he possibly could) to send his courtiers before to advertise the king, that they might come to the river Peneus, whereas the passage lieth from Omolium over to Diium. And verily at that time, Perseus was retired from Diium into the inland quarters of his realme, and had gathered some prettie gale of hope, in that Martius had given out, how for love of him he had undertaken this embassie. After some few daies they repaired to the place appointed. The king came accompanied with a great traine as well of his friends, as his courtiers and pensioners which guarded his person. The legates likewise were attended upon with no lesse a troupe, by reason as well of many that followed them from Larissa, as also of divers embassages from the States which assembled at Larissa, and were desirous to carrie home with them certaine newes of the sequele, which they should heare with their owne eares. Every man had an inward desire setled in his heart to see the manner of the meeting of this noble king, & these high commissioners from the soveraigne state and mightiest people of the whole world. Being come to the interview one of another, they stood still on either side of the river, which onely parted them asunder. For a while there passed entercouriers betwene, whiles they made it straunge on both parts, who should passe the river first: for the Macedonians stood somewhat upon the roiall majestie of a king; and the Romanes were as respective to the reputation of the people of Rome, considering withall, that Perseus sought the means and made first motion for this parley. Whereupon, to end this controversie, Martius cast out a mery word, What needs all this (quoth he) let the younger come to the elder without more ado, & the son to the father: this he spake for that himself also was surnamed Philip. The K. soone condescended thereunto. But then arose another doubt and difference, namely with what number he should passe over. The K. thought it meet & convenient to come with his whole traine: but the legates would have had him either to bring over with him 3 persons & no more, or els if he were minded to passe with so great a companie, to put in hostages for assurance, that during the time of the parley no outrage should be committed. So Perseus sent as pledges, Hippias & Pentanchus, the principall & most especial friends that wer about him, whom also he had employed in the embassage. Now were these hostages required, not so much for a gage and pawn of securitie, as that it might appeare unto the allies there present, that the K. in meeting and communing with the Romane

commissioners, should not keepe state comparable with them, but abate somewhat of the port & majestie which they carried. Their mutuall greeting and salutation was nothing strange, as between enemies; but kind and amiable, as among familiar friends. Which done, they sat them downe upon their chaires set readie for them. After they had thus sitten a while in silence and said nothing, Martius began in this manner: You expect (I suppose quoth hee) that wee should answer to your letters which you sent to Corcyra, wherein you demand, Why wee are come in embassie and commission after this manner with armed souldiours, and plant garisons as wee doe in every citie? To which question of yours not to answer at all, I feare me you would take it to be pride in me; and againe to answer a truth, I doubt it will be too harsh, and unpleasant to your eares. But seeing that hee who breaketh a covenant must be chastised either by word or sword, (like as I had rather that any other but my selfe should have commission to make warre upon you;) so I will bee so bold (howsoever it fall out) to speake rough and tart unto you as to my friend: and herein will I follow the maner of Physicians, who for the health of their patients, otherwhiles minister bitter medicines and apply stinging corrosives. Since time that you first attained unto the crowne, the Senat thinketh you have done but one onely thing of all that you ought to have done, namely, that you sent your embassadors to Rome for to renew the league; and yet they judge you had done better in not renewing it, than after it was renewed, to violate the same. Chafed you have out of the realme* Abrupolis, a confederate and friend of the people of Rome. The murderers of Arctetarus you have received and entertained, yea and given the world thereby to understand, that you were well pleased (to say no worse) with his death: and killed they have a prince most fast and faithfull to the Romanes, of all others in Illyricum. Thorough Thessalie and the territorie of Malia, you have marched with an armie against the tenor of the league, as far as to Delphi: and more than that, contrarie unto the said accord, sent you have aid and succor to the Bizantines. With our allies the Bæotians, you have entred into a secret association, and bound the same with an oth, which by right you ought not to have done. Who it was that murdered the Thebane embassadors Eversis and Callicratus who came directly from us, I had leiser enquire than charge any man and declare. The civill warres in Ætolia, the massacres of their princes and States, unto whome may they be imputed in any likelihood, but to your people? As for the Dolopians, wasted they were by your selfe in person and by no other. It grieveth me and goeth to my heart, to speake who it is thar king Eumenes challengeth and burdeneth with this. That in his returne from Rome into his owne kingdom, he was like to have been killed as a beast for sacrifice, and that at Delphi, in a sacred and hallowed place, even before the altars. As for the secret practises which your host of Brundisium hath disclosed and set abroad, I know right well, that not onely you have received letters thereof from Rome, but your owne embassadors also have told you all by word of mouth. You might have soone avoided all this, and heard nothing thereof from me, if you would have forborne only to aske and demand, Wherefore our forces were transported over into Macedonie, and why we sent garisons into our confederate cities? But since you would needs put out such a question, more pride it had beene in us to have held our peace, than to utter the plaine truth as wee have done. Verily for mine owne part, in regard of the hospitall and friendly courtesies that have passed between your father and us, I favour you and will gladly make the best of your cause: and would to God I had some good occasion ministered from your selfe, to sollicite and further your suite before the Senate.

The answer of King Perseus

To these challenges and imputations, the king framed his answer in this wise: Content I am to plead my cause before you, the parties appellants and judges both, which would be found (I doubt not) good, if it were debated and handled in the presence of indifferent and equall arbiters. And first, as touching those matters which are objected against me, they are such as in part, I wot not well, whether I may not glory in them, or at least wile not blush in the confessing and avowing thereof. As for the rest, as they are charged upon me in bare words, so plaine words may serve flatly and simply to denie them. For say, that this day I were subject unto your lawes and by them to have my triall, what can either that promoter of Brundisium, or king Eumenes enforce against me, but it will appeare, that they accuse me not so much with matter of truth, as exhibite onely slanderous and reprochfull tearmes? A like matter ywis it is, that neither Eumenes had any other enemy but me, (he I say, who hath done such wrong and injuriesto so many, both in common and also in particular:) nor I could find a fitter person to serve my turne

A turne in the execution of my projects but this Rammius, a fellow that I never had scene before, nor was ever like to see againe hereafter. I must (forsooth) give account and answer for the Thebanes, who as it is well knowne, perished by shipwracke: as also for the murder of Arctetarus; and yet therein I am no deeper charged than thus, that the murderers of him lived in exile and were shadowed within my realme. Now surely, this hard conclusion and unreasonable condition I will not refuse to under-goe, in case you also will be content to take upon you and avow all those crimes and facts, for which they stand condemned, who as banished persons have fled either to Rome or into Italie: but in case both you and all other nations will disavow and disclaime that, I also will be one among the rest. And in good faith, to speake uprightly, to what end should any man be banished from one countrey, if hee may not find a place in another, and be permit-B ted there to live in exile? And yet (so soone as ever I found by advertisement from you that they were within Macedonie) I for my part, made diligent search untill I had them, and then I commanded them to depart out of my kingdom, yea and expressly forbade them for ever setting foot againe within my dominions. And thus much verily concerning the criminall matters objected unto me as a defendant pleading at the barre. Now let us argue and debate the rest, enforced and laid against me in qualitie of a king, namely, which concerne and touch the accord contracted between me and you. For if the words run in this sort and are thus written in the fore-
C laid covenants of accord, That I may not be suffered to defend my selfe and my realme, nor if any enemy of mine levie warre against me; then I must confesse indeed, that the league I have broken, in that I stood upon my guard and defence by force of armes against Abrupolis, an associate of the people of Rome. But if it were lawfull for me so to doe by warrant of the accord, and allowed also by the law of nations, by force to repell force; what should I lesse, nay what could I else have done I pray you? when Abrupolis had laid wast the frontiers of my kingdom even as farre as to Amphipolis, led into captivity many persons free-borne, carried away a mightie number of slaves, and driven before him many thousand head of cattaille; should I have sitten still and suffered him untill he had come armed to Pella, even unto my royall pallace? But some man may haply say, You did well indeed and justly, in making head and pursuing him by force of arms; many, vanquished he should not have been, neither ought he to have suffered those calamities which follow men vanquished. Why? if I have endured the hazard and fortune thereof, provoked as I was to warre, how can he justly complaine of tasting the like, beeing himselfe the cause and first motive of all? I will not use the same maner of defence (O Romanes) to this, that by force of arms I have bridled and repressed the Dolopians: for if I have not done by them according to their demerits, yet I am sure I have delt by the vertue of the right I have over them, being as they are of mine own kingdom, under my obeisance, & made subjects to my father even by a decree of your own drawing. And yet, were I to render a reason of my proceedings against them, I say, not unto you nor unto my allies, but even to those who like not of any hard and cruel command so much as over bondslaves; can I be thought to have exercised more rigour against them, than equitie and reason would beare? For, Euphranor, whom I deputed governor over them, they killed in such sort, that death is too good for them, and the least punishment of all others that they have deserved. And as I marched forward in my progresse from thence to visite the cities of E Larissa, Antron & Pylleon, I ascended up to Delphi, there for to sacrifice, to the end that I might discharge my conscience and pay those vovyes which I had of long time owed. Now, to aggravate matter in this also against mee, it is said moreover, that I was there with my armie, and intended (no doubt) for to seize cities into my hands, and put garisons into fortresses; for which at this present I complaine of you. Call the States and cities of Greece together to a generall assembly, through which I passed. Let any one man come forth and make complaint of the least harme and wrong done by any of my souldiours; then will I not refuse to bee reputed and censured for one who under pretence and colour of divine sacrifice, went about another thing. Wee sent indeed garisons to the Ætolians and Bizantines, yea, and with the Bæotians wee contracted amitie. But these things, in what sort and for what purpose they were done, my embassadors have F not only declared, but also excused oftentimes before your Senat: where I found some umpires to heare and decide my cause, although not so indifferent and favourable to mee ward, as your selfe are, O Martius, my fathers old friend and familiar. For as yet Eumenes my accuser was not come to Rome, who by false surmises and suggestions, wresting at his pleasure every thing to the worst, to make all suspicious and odious unto you, went about to make you beleieve, that Greece could could not possibly be restored to freedome, and enjoy the fruit of your gracious benefite; so long as the kingdome of Macedonie stood entier and upright. Well, the world you shall see, will turn about; and anone one or other will be here, to make remonstrance and prove, That to no purpose Antiochus is removed and confined beyond the mountaines of Taurus; that Eumenes is become much more greivous & unsupportable to all Asia than Antiochus ever was; and that your allies cannot be at rest nor live in quiet, so long as hee keepeth his roiall court in Pergantus, a citadell (as it were) overlooking and commanding all the neighbour cities bordering thereupon. Right well I know, O Martius & you Attilius, that whatsoeuer either you have objected against me, or I answered for my defence & purgation is but as the eares and affections are of the hearers; neither what I have done, nor what mind and intention I have carried in mine actions will bee so much regarded, as how you take every thing either done or intended. Mine owne conscience beareth mee witnesse, that writing and willing I have not faileed; now, if for want of knowledge and foresight I have beene overseene and done some what amisse, it may bee corrected and amended by this present rebuke and chastisement. This I am sure, my trespass is not incurable; neither have I committed ought; that you should deeme worthe to bee pursued by warre and force of armes. And if yee doe, then surely it is forought, that there goeth this hame abroad throughout all nations of your clemencie: and yett both, if I say for so slight occasions which hardly are worth the complaint & the reasoning about, you be readie to enter into armes & levie warre upon your confederate princes. Martius for that time accorded to his speech, and moved him to addressse ambassadors to Rome, being of advice and opinion himselfe to trie all meanes to the very last point, and to let slip nothing whereof some hope of good might arise. It remained only to be debated in counsell, how ambassadors might passe in safetie. And to this purpose, when it was necessarie for the King to request a surcease of arms, albeit Martius himselfe was willing and desirous thereof (for that his drift was to nothing els by all this conference and parley) yett he seemed to make a hard matter and difficultie of it, and to doe a speciall favour and pleasure unto Perseus in granting his petition. The truth was, the Romanes yett were not readie, nor thoroughly appointed at this present for the warre; they had neither armie puissant ynough, nor captains sufficient: whereas Perseus (but that he was blinded in al his counsels with a vain hope of peace) had all things prepared and in readinesse, and might then have begun to wage war, as in the best and most opportune season for himselfe, so the worst and unfittest of al other times for his enemies.

After this parley and the abstinence of warre assured faithfully on both parts; the Romane commissioners were appointed and resolved to go into Bæotia, where there was begun already some trouble and commotion, by reason that certaine States of the Bæotians were departed from the societie of the common Councell, ever since it was reported backe, how the Romane Legates made answer that it should appeare and bee scene, what cities they were indeed which tooke no pleasure to have any association with the king. And first, the embassadours from Cheronea; afterwards, from Thebes encountered them upon the way, who assured them, that they were not present in that Diet and Counsell, where this association was concluded. To these embassages no answer for this time was made, but willed they were onely to give their attendance and follow them to Chalcis.

At Thebes great variance there was, which arose by occasion of another strife and debate. In their solemne assembly for the election of the Pretour of the Bæotians, that part which had the repulse, in revenge of that injurie and disgrace, assembled the multitude and made a decree at Thebes, That the Bæotarches should not bee received within their cities: in such sort, as like banished men they retired to Thespium; from whence (for received there they were inconitently without any stay) being called againe to Thebes upon better advisement and change of mind, they made an ordinance; That if to the number of twelve private persons held any conventicle or publicke meeting together, they should bee condemned to exile. After this, Ismenias the new Pretour, a noble personage and of great puissance, by vertue of a decree adjudged them in their absence for to loose their lives. To Chalcis they were fled, and from thence to the Romanes at Larissa they went: where they declared that Ismenias was the cause of their association with king Perseus. Upon that foresaid difference, they grew to hore contention, yett embassadours from both parts came to the Romanes, as well the banished persons and accusers of Ismenias, as also Ismenias himselfe. But so soone as the Romane Legates were come to Chalcis; the States and heads of other cities cities (who every one by a speciall decree of their owne had renounced association with king Perseus) joined with the Romanes; wheratt they tooke exceeding great contentment and joy. Ismenias thought it meet and reason that the Bæotian nation should be committed to the protection of the Romanes. Whereupon arose a tumultuous fray, and but that he fled into the Tribunal of the Legates to save himselfe, he had escaped narrowly from being killed by the said exiled persons, with the helpe of their supporters and favorits.

Also the very citie of Thebes, which is the capitall place of State within Bæotia, was in great trouble and uprore; whiles some drew to the king, others enclined to the Romanes. Besides, there was a multitude of Coronæans and Haliartians gathered together to maintaine the ordinance and decree as touching the association with the king. But such was the resolute persistence of the principall and cheefe men, who shewed by the late calamities of Philip and Antiochus, how great the forces, and how happie the fortune was of the Romane empire, that the same multitude relented, & being overruled, passed a new decree, to reverse and cancele the former confederacie with the king; sent those that were the motifes and persuaders of contracting that amitie to Chalcis for to satisfie & content the Roman Legates; yea, & to conclude, were of advice to recommend the citie to the faithful patronage of the said commissioners. Martius and Attilius took great pleasure to hear the Thebanes sing this note, they persuaded with them severally apart, and gave them counsell to send embassadours to Rome for the renewing of this amitie: but before all things they tooke order for the restoring of the banished persons: as for the authors of the confederacie contracted with the king, they by their owne decree condemned. Having thus by this means infringed and made frustrate the Diet of the Bæotians (the thing which above all they most desired) they tooke their journey to Peloponnesus, together with Ser. Cornelius, whom they had sent for to Chalcis. For their sakes a counsell was holden at Argos, where they demanded nothing els of the Achæan nation, but onely to furnish them with a thousand soldiers. This garison was sent to the defence of Chalcis, untill the Romane armie were transported into Greece. Martius and Attilius having thus dispatched all the affaires that they had to doe in Greece, in the beginning of winter returned to Rome.

Then was there sent from thence about the same time an honourable embassie to the Isles in Asia. These embassadours or Legates were three in number, to wit, T. Claudius, P. Posthumus, and M. Iunius. They in their circuit & vilitation exhorted all their allies to take armes against Perseus, for the Romans. And the mightier & more wealthie any citie was, the more earnestly travailed they there; because the inferiour states were like to frame and sort themselves suitable to the example and authoritie of the greater and superiour. Now of all others the Rhodians were reputed of most import and consequence everie way, for that they were able not onely to favour with their countenance, but also maintaine and aid with their forces this warre: and by the persuasion of Hegesilus they had gotten together a fleet of fortie saile. This Hegesilus their sovereign magistrate (whome they call Prytanis) had by many reasons prevailed with the Rhodians, to abandon the hope they had by entertaining these KK. (which they had found by often experience how vaine it was) and to hold themselves to the societie and alliance of the Romans, the surest hold of all others at that time in the world, as well for strength of forces as trustie assistance and fidelitie. There is intended war by them (qd. he) against Perseus, and no doubt the Romans will require of us the same provision and furniture of ships and sea forces, which they have scene in their warre lately against Antiochus, and before that, against king Philip: and then you will be so secke, and forced in great hast to provide a fleet, when it were more time it should be set out and sent forth, unlesse ye begin betimes to repaire and rig your ships, unlesse I say, you set in hand to furnish the same with sailers and mariners. And with to much more endeavour ought yee thus to doe, that by your deed and effectuall employment, you may refute and disprove the false imputations wherewith Eumenes hath charged you. By these remonstrances induced they were, insomuch as at the arrivall of the Roman legats aforesaid, they were able to shew unto them an armada of 40 ships readie rigged and well appointed, that they might know & see they looked not for to be exhorted thereunto. And this embassage was of great import and importance also to gain the hearts of the States in Asia. Only Decimius returned to Rome without any effect of his errand and commission, nay hee ran into an ill name and obloquie, upon suspicion that he had received certaine bribes of the princes in Illyricum.

Perseus upon the conference and communication had with the Romanes, retired into Macedonie donic, and sent his embassadours to Rome, to treat about the conditions of peace begun already with Martius: to other embassadours also of his he gave his letters to carrie to Bizantium and Rhodes: the tenor of which letters was one and the same directed to them all: namely, That he had communed with the Romane legates, but he had so placed and couched as well what he heard as what he spake, that it might seem he gave not one foot unto them but gained the better hand in that dispute and debating with them. These embassadours added moreover and said unto the Rhodians, that they hoped assuredly there would be a peace, for that they by the motion & advice of Martius & Attilius were addressed in embassie to Rome. Now if the Romans, say they, against the covenants of accord proceeded to levie warre, then the Rhodians were to endeavour with all the credite and power they have, to reunite the peace againe; but if with all their praier and intreatie they might not prevaile, then they were to looke about and labour this one point, That the might and puissance of the whole world were not devolved into the hands of that one people. And as this imported and concerned all the rest, so the Rhodians especially, who surrounded other States in dignitie and wealth, both which should be obnoxious and enthralled, if there were regard and respect made of none but the Romanes. The letters of the king and words of the embassadours, were entertained with friendly audience, other effect they tooke none to change their settled minds: for now the authoritie of the better part began also to carrie the greater sway. But this answer was returned to them, & that by way of decree, That the Rhodians wither peace with all their hearts: but if it should come to warre, their king and maister was neither to expect nor yet to exact any thing at their hands, to disjoine the ancient amity which they held with the Romanes, and which they had acquired by many and great deserts, as well in warre as in peace. In their returne from Rhodes, they went to the cities of Bæotia, and namely to Thebes, Coronea & Haliartus, from whom it seemed a thing extorted forcibly against their will, that they were disbanded from the king and clave to the Romanes. The Thebans stood firm & immovable, although they were somewhat discontented with the Romanes, both for condemning their cheife and principall citizens, and also for restoring the banished persons. But the Coroneans & Haliartians upon an in-bred & settled favor by kind unto the kings, sent embassadours into Macedonia, requesting a garrison for their defence against the excessive pride of the Thebanes. To this embassie the king thus answered, That a garrison hee might not send, by reason of the truce made with the Romanes: howbeit he advertised them to maintaine and guard themselves against the injuries of the Thebanes all that ever they could: but yet so, as they gave the Romanes no cause to be their heavie friends, and so to proceed in rigor against them.

Martius and Attilius being come to Rome, made report of their embassie within the Capitoll, in such manner, as in nothing they gloried more, than in deluding and deceiving the king, by means of a cessation from armes, and a pretended hope of peace. For so well appointed was hee and furnished with all provision for warre, and they contrariwise so unprovided every way, that hee mought easily have possessed himselfe of all places of opportunitie and advantage, before that their armie could passe over into Greece. But now having this respite & time of the truce, as the king would come nothing better provided, so the Romanes might begin the war, more fully furnished with all things convenient. Moreover they related how they by their cunning distracted & set a jar in the generall counsell of the Bæotians, so as by no means any more hereafter they can be rejoined to the Macædonians by consent and accord. The greater part of the Senate approved this service of theirs as performed with singular discretion and dexteritie: But the old Senators and those that held in remembrance the ancient maner and custome of the Romanes, said plainly, That in all the course of that embassie, they could see no Romane practise and dealing at all. Our ancestors (say they) were wont to war not by wait-laying and secret ambushes, nor by skirmishes in the night season; ne yet by false semblant of running away and suddaine turning their face againe at unawares upon their unprovided enemies; neither sought they to glorifie themselves by subtil slights more than by true vertue and valour: Their use and manner was, to intimate and publish wars before they made any: yea and to denounce and proclaim the same; otherwhiles also to assigne and appoint the very place where they went to strike a battaile. According to this plaine and faithfull dealing, they detected and disclosed unto king Pyrrhus, the physician that would by poison have taken away his life: by the same they delivered bound unto the Faliscians the vilanous traitour that would have betrayed the children of their K. These are the Roman fashions (say they) not to use the cunning casts and slie shifts of the Carthaginians,

A thaginians, nor the craftie pollicies of Grecians, who ever reputed it more glorious and honorable by fraud to compass, than by force to surpass the enemy. Indeed otherwhiles for the present time, more good is done & greater matters are effected by guile & pollicie, than by valour and vertue: but to say a truth, the courage of that enemy is for ever conquered, who is forced to confesse that he was vanquished not by cunning, nor by venture, but in just and lawfull warre by maine strength and close fight at handie gripes. Thus spake the auncients, who had no great liking to the new-found devils of these politicians. Howbeit that side of the Senate which made more reckoning of profit than of honestie, carried it away and imported so much, that not only the first embassie of Martius was approved, as well performed, but also himselfe was sent back againe with certaine Quinqueremes, with a mandate also & commission to deal in the rest according as he should thinke to stand with the good of the common weale. They dispatched likewise Aul. Attilius to seize Larissa in Thessalie; for feare least if the terme of truce were expired, Perseus should send a garrison thither, and hold in his hand the capitall citie of Thessalie. The said Attilius had a warrant to receive two thousand footmen of Cn. Sicius for to effectuate that enterprise. Also P. Lentulus lately returned out of Achæa was allowed the conduct of 300 souldiours of the Italian nation, to the end that at Thebes he should endeavour to bring all Bæotia under the obedience of the Romanes. When all things were set in this forwardnes, albeit they were at a point and fully resolved to make warre, yet thought good it was to give audience unto the embassadours of Perseus in the Senat; who rehearsed and related in maner the same reasons which were delivered by the king in the late conference and parlie. Much ado they made and laboured hard, to acquit the king of the imputation laid to his charge, for seeking the death of Eumenes; but with final probabilitie or none at all: for the thing was too too apparent. In the end they fell to praier and intreatie: howbeit no care was given unto them, with any such mind and heart, as could bee either instructed or inclined. In stead thereof, warned straightly they were to depart immediately forth of the liberties of Rome, and within thirtie daies out of Italie.

After this, P. Licinius the Cos. who was charged with the province of Spain, had commandement given him to assigne unto the armie the soonest day that he could, for to meet in one certaine place. C. Lucretius the Pretour who had the conduct of the fleet, tooke his leave of the citie with 40 Quinqueremes: for advised it was, that the rest of the ships which had bene repaired, should be itaied at home for to be employed otherwise about the citie. And the Pretour sent his brother Lucretius, before with one Galeace or Quinquereme, and commission to receive of the allies that shipping which by covenant they were to find; and with them neere the Iland Cephalenia, to joine with the rest of the armada: to wit, from the Rhegines one trireme galley, from the Locrians twaine, from the Vires four. With which he coasted along Italie, and having doubled the utmost point of Calabria within the *Ionian sea, he arrived at Dyrrhachium. There he found ten gallions or barks of the Dyrrhachians, twelve of the Issæans, and fiftie foure belonging to king Gentius, which he tooke all with him along, making semblance that he supposed they were provided of purpose for the service of the Romanes: with this fleet by the third day hee fell with the Ile Corphu: and so forward he made saile and arrived at Cephalenia. C. Lucretius the Pretor, having losed to sea from Naples, crossed the streights of Sicilie, and on the fiftieth day cut over likewise to Cephalenia. Then the fleet struck anchor, expecting as well the arrivall of the land-forces, as also that the hulkes and vessels of cariage which were scattered upon the seas from the rest of their companie, might overtake them.

It happened about this time, that Pub. Licinius the Confull having conceived and solemnly made his vowes within the Capitoll, departed in his coat of armes from the citie. A solemnitie at all times verily this is, done with much dignitie and majestie: but especially with exceeding great pleasure and contentment of the beholders; when the Confull is accompanied with a stately traine at his first setting forth, to encounter some great and famous enemy, renowned as well for vertue, as qualitie and fortune: for at such a time men assemble and gather together, not onely in regard of dutie to acquit themselves of their devoir, but also upon a desire they have of the verie shew and sight presented unto their eyes; namely, to see their capitaine to whose conduct and counsell they have committed the managing and defense of the common-weale. Moreover, they take occasion thereby to thinke of the hazard of warre, how adventurous is the event and how doubtfull the issue of battaile in the field. They call to mind the alternative course of good good fortune and bad; and namely, how by the blind ignorance or the unadvised rashnesse of G leaders, many foiles and overthrowes have happened; and contrariwise by politicke wisdom and hardie courage, great matters have been effected and happy victories achieved. And what mortall man is he that knoweth, of what mind and cariage good or bad, how fortunate or unluckie the Confull is, whom they send forth to war: whether he be like soon to be seen again, in triumphant wise with his victorious armie mounting up the Capitoll unto those gods, of whom now he taketh his leave: or shall give occasion to the enemies in the same manner to rejoyce? As for Persus the king, (against whome this expedition and journey is taken) a prince hee is highly renowned both by the Macedonian nation (so famous for feats of armes,) and also by his father Philip, who among other fortunate achievements of his, was ennobled by his war against the Romans. Moreover, the verie name of Persus himselfe (since time that first the diademe was set upon his head) was in every mans mouth, and no talke continually but of him and the ex- H pectation of this warre. With these and such like cogitations (I say) a mightie number of men of all sorts and degrees attended and accompanied the Confull at his departure. With him were sent two Colonels or knight-marshals about the rest, who had been Consuls, namely, C.

Claudius and Q. Mutius: also three brave and lustie young gallants, to wit, P. Lentulus and the two Manlij, both surnamed Acidini, the one sonne to * M. Manlius and the other to L. Manlius.
The Confull thus accompanied, first went to Brundisium to the armie, and from thence passed the seas to Nymphæum, and so encamped in the territorie of Apollonia.

Perſeus ſome few daies before, upon the returne of his embaffadours from Rome, who had cleane put him out of all hope of peace, held a counsell; wherein for a good while the matter was debated with great varietie of fundrie opinions. Some were of mind, that in caſe the Romans enjoined them either to yeeld a tribute, or to forgoe ſome of their lands; yea if they impoſed upon them ſome fine by way of amends and ſatisfaction: in briefe, whatſoever elſe they ſet downe and ordeined, to doe and ſuffer all for to redeeme their peace, and not to reſuſe any condition were it never ſo hard, but to take heed and provide in any wiſe, that Perſeus put not himſelfe nor the realme upon the dangerous hazard of ſo great a jeopardie. For if hee held ſtill the maine point and continued in quiet poſſeſſion of his kingdome, in time and ſpace much good might happen; by meanes whereof he ſhould be able not onely to licke himſelfe whole and recover his loſſes, but alſo become hereafter dread and terrible unto thoſe of whome now he ſtandeth in feare. But the farre greater part caried with them a more courageous ſpirit and gave adviſe accordingly. For they affirmed, That if Perſeus parted with ought and yeelded never ſo little, he muſt make account withall to quit the free-hold of his whole kingdome ſome after. For ſis neither money nor land (ſay they) that the Romanes want; but this they wote full well, That as all things els in the world, ſo eſpecially great monarchies and empires are ſubject to many accidents and casualties: right well they know alſo, how they have quelled and bruiſed the puſſiance of the Carthaginians, and for to yoke their necks and hold them downe, have ſet up a mightie king to be their neighbour and to commaund them; yea and that Antiochus and all his race is macedoned and chafed beyond the mountaine Taurus. There remaineth only now the realme of Macedonie, which is both ſeated in a neere region, and alſo (if the fortune of the people of Rome ſhould happen to faile) ſeemeth able to give heart and courage to her kings at this day, anſwerable to that of their noble progenitors in former times. And therefore whiles the ſtate ſtandeth entire and unſoiled, Perſeus ought to reſolve, whether he had leiſure by forgoing one thing after another, trip himſelfe in the end of all his goods and lands, and ſo turned cleane out of his kingdom, be driven to requelt at the Romans hand either Samothracia or ſome other ſuch petite iſle, where, in qualitie of a privat perſon he may ſurvive his roiall eſtate and live to old age in baſe contempt and needie povertie: or els, to take arms in the defence and maintenance of his royall place and dignitie, like a prince of valor and courage; and either abide all hazards whatſoever the fortune of the field ſhall plunge him into; or after victorie achieved deliver the whole world from the dominion & imperious ſeignorie of the Romans. And no greater wonder and miracle is it to hunt the Romans out of Greece, than it was to chaſe Anniball out of Italie: neither ſee wee in good faith (ſay they) how by any reaſon it can well ſtand, that he who reſiſted with all his might and maine his owne brother, that would have made himſelfe king againſt all right and law, ſhould now to ſtraungers and aliens render the poſſeſſion thereof, which hee came ſo well and truly by, and wherein he is ſo rightfully inveſted? Finally, in war and peace however,

A soever men make questions, disputing and arguing too and fro; yet this conclusion they all grant and agree upon, That as there is nothing more shamefull and dishonest, than to abandon and loose a kingdome without battaile, so there is nothing more glorious and honourable than for the maintenance of princely dignitie and regall maiestie, to hazard all fortune whatsoever. This counsell was holden at Pella, the auncient pallace wherein the Macedonian KK. kept their roiall court. Why then (quoth hee) on Gods name, since you are of that mind and resolution, let us take armes and to the field : whereupon he sent his licters into all parts to his gallants and captaines, and assembled and drew all his forces to Citium a towne of Macedonie. Himselfe in person after he had performed a magnificent sacrifice (like a king) of an hundred head of bealts to the honour of Minerva, surnamed Alicia, he departed accompanied with a number of his courtiers, pensioners, and yeoman of the guard to Citium. To which place were gathered already all his forces, as well Macedonians as auxiliarie strangers. Hee pitched his campe before the towne, and embattailed all his armed men in the plaine. Hee was in all fortie thousand strong; whereof one halfe well-neere consisted of those whome they call Phalangitæ, and those were commaunded by one Hippias of Berthæa. Besides, there were two choice companies (for the flower of age and strength of bodie) selected out of the whole number of targueters, called Cetrati. This regiment, themselves called by the name of The legion; and the same was under the conduct of Leonatus and Thrasippus both * Eulyestanes. The rest of the targueters to the number of three thousand or verie neere, were led by Antiphilus of Edeffa. The Pæonians, those also of Paçoria and Pastrymonia (places subject unto the Thracian) and the Agrianians, together with some inhabitants of Thracia entermingled among them, amounted also to the number of three thousand. Didas of Pæonia had levied and armed them; even the man that murdered young Demetrius. There were besides, two thousand Frenchmen in armes under the leading of captain Asclepiodorus. From Heraclea likewise out of the Sintians country, there were three thousand Thracians free-men borne, under a leader of their own. The like number well-neere of Cretensians followed their commanders, Sylus of Phalassarna, and Syllus of Gnosos; also Leonides the Lacedemonian, had the charge of five hundred out of Greece, but a mixt companie they were of divers nations. This Leonides was said to have bene of the bloud roiall, a banished person, condemned in a frequent assembly and counsell of the Achæans, for certaine letters which he sent to Persus, and were intercepted. The Ætolians and Boeotians who in all made not above five hundred, were conducted by Lyco an Achæan. These auxiliaries or aid-soldiours of so many states and nations mixt and blended together, grew fast upon the number of twelve thousand armed men. As for the cavallery, he had levied out of all Macedonie three thousand horse or thereabout. Corys king of the Odrysians, the sonne of Scuthe, was thither come with a thousand chosen men of armes, and almost as many footmen. In summe, the whole armie arose to the number of 39000 foot and foure thousand horsemen. And this was held for certain, that the like army was never raised by any king of Macedonie, unlesse it were that again, with which Alexander the great passed over into Asia. Twentie yeeres now and sixe were come and gone, since time that peace was graunted unto Philip at his owne suite and request: during which space betwene, Macedonie being in rest and quietnes, had brought forth a goodly frise of fresh youth: a great part whereof was of sufficient age to beare armes; and by the continuall skirmishes which they maintained with the Thracians their neighbours, were rather whetted than weakened, and more enured than wearied; and in one word lived ever in practise of martiall feats: wherby it came to passe, that all things were preft and in readinesse for the war, which Philip first, and Persus afterwards projected to wage against the Romans.

This armie stirred and advanced a litle, not in manner of a full march as to a present battle; but onely for this, that they would not be seene to have stood still in their armes: and thus armed as the souldiours were, Perseus called them to an audience, intending to make an oration unto them. Being mounted up to his Tribunal, he stood there with his two sonnes about him, one of either hand, whereof the elder (named Philip) he adopted to be his child, whereas indeed by nature he was his brother; but the younger (whom they called Alexander) was his owne naturall sonne. Then and there he exhorted his souldiours to fight manfully, and laid before them what wrongs and injuries the people of Rome had done both to his father and also to himselfe. As for my father (quoth he) forced he was by all kind of indignities to enter into armes and begin warre againe; but in the very preparation thereof, he was suddenly surprisid and stricken with death. To my selfe at one time were embassadours from them sent to treat of peace, & armed souldiours also for to seize upon the cities of Greece. Afterwards, by a deceitfull shew of a parley, under colour of reconciliation and peace making, we were born in hand and drawn out a whole winter, to the end that they might gaine time to prepare for warre. And now is the Confull coming with two Roman legions having either of them some three hundred horse besides, and with a proportionable number (and that is the most) of allies, as well foot as horse. And say that the KK, both Eumenes and Masaniissa joine with their aidforces, yet can they not amount above the number of seven thousand. Now that yee have heard what the strength is of the enemies, regard and compare your own armie, namely, how far both in number, as also in goodnesse and qualitie of souldiours, you surpasse them; being your selves from your childhood and infancie warriours trained in practise of armes & warfare, wrought, framed and hardened in so many battels: where as they be new & raw souldiers taken up in hast & enrolled now the first time against this present service. As for the auxiliaries of the Romans, what are they but Lydians, Phrygians, and Numidians? but we to set against them, have to aid us Thracians and Gauls, the most courageous nations under heaven. For harness and weapons, they have no other than such as every poore souldior is able to provide for himselfe: but the Macedonians are furnished out of the kings roiall armorie and arsenal with such armors of prooffe, as my father in many yeeres caused to be made with great care, and to his no small expence. The Romans be far from their provisions, & the same exposed to all the casualties of the sea: but we, besides the revenues and issues out of the mines of mettall, have laid by both coine and corne sufficient to serve for ten years. The Macedonians have store and foison in great abundance heape-full of all things necessarie, and bee provided as well by the gracious favour of the gods, as the carefull diligence of a king. It remaineth now that yee carrye that mind and courage with you, which your noble progenitors bare before you, those I say, who after they had conquered and subdued all Europe, passed into Asia, and by force of armes made way and discovered that part of the world that was never heard of before, and gave not over to win ground still and make more conquests, untill they were barred by the red sea, and could find no more land to conquer. But now beleewe me, fortune hath denounced a trial by warre, not for the purchase of the utmost bounds and marches of India, but for our free hold and possession, for our inheritance even of Macedonie. These Romanes, when they warred against my father, pretended a goodly title, and made a glorious shew to the world, as though they would deliver Greece, and establish it in freedome: but now in open and plaine termes they shoot at Macedonie, intending to bring it into servitude; to the end there might be no king neere neighbor to the Romane seignorie, nor any nation renowned for martiall prowesse, permitted to beare armes and have weapon in hand. For, these things and no lesse, forced shall yee be to part with, and deliver up unto these prowde LL, together with king and kingdome, in case yee surcease war; and to doe whatsoever they will commaund you. All the while that he delivered this speech, there might be heard secret succlamations oftentimes, sufficiently testifying the generall assent of them all: but at these last words they lift up their voices and cried out aloud, part for anger and indignation menacing the enemy, part for courage and resolution exhorting the king to be of good cheare and take a good heart; in so much as hee was constrained to give over, and make an end of his Oration: onely he commaunded them to bee readie for the remove, and to put themselves in the journey against the enemy: for by this time advertised he was that the Romans were dislodged from Nymphæum. After this assembly was dismissed, he gave audience to the embassages from the States of Macedonie: for, come they were to make promise and offer both of money and graine to maintaine this warre, every one according to their abilitie. Thanked they were each one, and releafed of all that charge, with this answer, that the kings provision was sufficient. Onely hee commaunded them to find waines and carts for carriages of the peeces of ordinance, the engines of batterie, the darts, quarrels, and other shot, whereof a mightie deale hee had provided; and in summe, all the instruments and furniture of warre. Then he set forward with his whole armie, marching toward Eordea, and neere unto the lake which they call Begarites, he encamped. The next morrow he advanced to Elimea upon the river Haliacmon. After this having passed over the mountaines named Cambunij through a straight and narrow passage, hee descended to those that inhabite Azorus, Pythous and Doliche, which quarter is called Tripolis. These three townes staid somewhat in suspence, by reason that they had given their hostages to the Larissæans: but in the end, overcome with the fear presented before their eyes, were content

A content to yeeld themselves into his hands. Perseus used gracious words to this people, making this account, that the Perrhæbians would doe the like: and in very deed he entred upon the citie (which surrendered at his first arrivall) without any doubt or stay at all made by the inhabitants within. As for the town Cyretie, he assailed to batter it, and the first day he was repulsed in a sharp skirmish at the very gates made by the townesmen that put on armes, drew to an head, and made resistance. But the morrow after when he had assailed the citie with all his forces, they submitted al to his mercie before night. The inhabitants of the next towne to it, Myleæ, presuming upon their fortifications, and standing upon this, That their citie was imprenable, were so prowde and lustie, that they could not be contented to shut the gates onely against the king, but most rudely and malapertly spared not to cast out reprochfull taunts and gibing tearmes against his owne person and the Macedonians. Which manner of dealing, as it envenomed the enemies and edged them the rather to enforce & follow the assault, so it kindled themselves the more (upon dispaire of all pardon and mercie) to maintaine and make good their place, and stand more resolutely in their owne defence. Whereupon for three daies together the towne was assailed by one part, and defended by the other with mightie courage right valiantly. The Macedonians were so many in number, that by turnes they releevd the assault without any difficultie, and entred one in the place of another. But the townesmen who evermore day & night guarded the walls, without any change and new supplie, were not onely overcharged with many wounds, but also wearied and enfeebled with continuall travell and want of sleepe. The fourth day, when at one instant the skaling ladders were reared against the walls in every quarter, and the gate assailed with greater force and violence than before, the inhabitants being driven from the courtaine & battlements, ran all to ward the gate, and made a suddaine sallie upon the enemies: which proceeding more upon inconsiderate and blind anger, than any true and assured confidence of their owne strength, caused them (few in number and wearied) to bee discomfited and put to flight by the enemies fresh and in heart, who entred pell mell with them into the said gate standing wide open. Thus was this citie taken and ransacked. The bodies also of the free borne persons, as many as remained after the bloudie execution, were sold in market. Perseus after hee had rased, ruined and burned a great part of the towne, dislodged and departed from thence to Phalanna, and the next day following went onward, and marched to Gyrrone. But being advertised that T. Minutius Rufus and Hippus the Pretour of Thessalie were entred thither with a garrison, hee passed besides the towne and never made offer of any assault. But hee surprisid Elatia and Gonnus, by reason that the townesmen were stricken with exceeding feare upon his suddaine arrivall. These two townes are situate upon the very streight which leadeth to Tempe, but Gonnus especially. And therefore hee left it guarded with a strong garrison both of foot and horse, as also fortified with a triple trench and rampier. Himselfe in person went onward still to Sycurium, minding there to attend the coming of the enemy: and withall he commaunded his armie to forage and purvey come every way all over the territorie of the enemies lying under him. For Sycurium is seated upon the hanging of an hill toward the very foot of the mountaine Ossa, having upon the South side the plaine champion of Thessalie under it, but behind on the backe Macedonie and Magnesia. Over and above these commodities, the place is very healthfull and plenteous of all good things, watered also with many quicke and running springs round about.

The Romane Confull having his armie on foot about that time marching toward Thessalie, the first found good way and readie passage through Epirus: but afterwards when hee was passed over once into Athamania, he met with a rough countrey and rugged soile, and in maner insuperable: so as with exceeding great difficultie and by short journeyes hee had much adoe to reach unto Gomphi. And if at that time, whiles his men and horses were encumbered and taintred, the king had made head in battell arraunged, taking the vantage of time and place against him, leading as he did an host composed but of rude and untrained novices, the Romanes themselves cannot denie, but it would have gone very hard with them, and a great overthrow they must needs have received in that conflict. But when they were come once to Gomphi without any skirmish, besides the joy which they conceived, for that they had escaped and overcome that dangerous passage, they began also to contemne their enemies, for that they knew not their owne good, and were so ignorant of the opportunities which they had. The Confull after he had duly sacrificed (as it appertained) and distributed the allowance of corne among his souldiours, sojourned there some few daies for the rest and repose both of man and beast: where, hearing that the Macedonians raged and over-ran the countrey of Thessalie, waisting and spoiling the territories of the Romane allies, he led his souldiours now sufficiently refreshed unto Larissa. And having marched from thence within three miles of Tripolis (which they call Scea) he pitched his tents, and lodged upon the river Peneus.

At the same time Eumenes arrived by sea at Chalcis, together with two of his brethren, Attalus and Athenus, leaving at Pergamus a third brother Philærus, for the defence of his realm. From thence, accompanied with Attalus and a power of foure thousand foot and a thousand horse, he came to the Consull, and left at Chalcis two thousand footmen, commanded by Athenus. Thether also repaired other aids which came in to the Romanes from all the States of Greece, but most of the particulars were so small as now they are growne out of remembrance. The Appolloniates sent three hundred horsemen and a hundred footmen. From the Ætolians there came to the mountance of one Corner of horsemen, even the whole Cavallerie that the said nation could make. Likewise all the Cavallerie of the Thessalians which exceeded not the number of three hundred that served in the Romane campe, and quartered apart. The Achæans sent one thousand men of their youth, armed for the most part after the Candiot manner. And much about this time C. Lucretius also the Pretour, who had the conduct of the ships that anchored in the rode of Cephalenia, after he had given charge to M. Lucretius his brother, to make saile with his fleet beyond the cape of Malea, and so to passe to Chalcis, himselfe went aboard unto a trireme galley, and sailed toward the gulfes of Corinth, for to be seized first of the countrey of Bæotia, and to prevent all matters there. Hee made way but slowly, because of the infirmities and weaknes of his bodie. M. Lucretius being arrived at Chalcis, and advertised that P. Lentulus lay against the citie of Haliartus, sent a messenger, commanding him in the name of the Pretor to raise the siege and dislodge from thence. The lieutenant notwithstanding he had set into that service with the help of the youth of that part of Bæotia which tooke part with the Romanes, retired from before the wals. The levying of this siege gave occasion of a new enterprise: for incessantly M. Lucretius besieged and invested Haliartus with his owne sea-forces to the number of ten thousand fighting men, together with two thousand souldiours from king Eumenes, whereof Athenus had the charge: and as they were now upon the point to give an assault, the Pretour came in unto them from Creusa. And very neere to that time, there arrived also at Chalcis certaine ships from the allies, namely two Quinquere galeaces of Carthage, two trireme gallees from Heraclea in Pontus, foure from Chalcedon, as many from Samos, and five quadrireme gallees of Rhodes. All these vessels the Pretour sent backe againe to the allies, and eased them of that charge, because there was no sea-service to bee performed in any place. M. Marius also came by sea to Chalcis, after he had woon Halops and assaulted Larissa called Cremaste.

This was the state of Bæotia, when Perseus (as hath bene said before) lay encamped at Sycurium: who after he had from every coast thereabout gotten together all the graine that he could come by, sent certaine companies to give the waite unto the territorie of the Phœceans, supposing the Romanes might be surprised, when they should be drawn farre from their owne campe to the succouring of their distressed associates. But perceiving that they stirred never the more for all that tumult: he dealt among his souldiours all the prey, but onely of men and women: now the bootie stood most upon cattails, wherewith they made good cheere. After this, but neere about one & the same time, the Consull & king Perseus both, debated in their counsell, how and where they should begin the warre. The king had taken great heart and courage by occasion that the enemy suffered him to make such havocke and doe his pleasure in the Phœceans territorie. And therefore his resolution was, to march directly against the Romane campe, without giving more time and making any farther delay. The Romanes likewise for their parts were of opinion, that all forsaking now would greatly prejudice their reputation among the confederates, who tooke it exceedingly to the heart, that they had not succoured the Phœceans. As they sate consulting what to do, (now Eumenes and Attalus both were present at this counsell) there came a messenger in post hatt with newes that the enemy approached here at hand with a mighty army. Whereupon the counsell brake up, and presently the signall was given to arme. And advised it was in the meane while, that there should goe forth a hundred horse, and as many darters and foot out of king Eumenes his companies.

Perseus about the fourth houre of the day, being come within a mile and somewhat more of the Romane leaguer, commanded the ensignes of the footmen to stand. Himselfe in person with the

A the men of armes and light armed souldiours advanced forward, and so together with king Cecilius and the captaines of the other auxiliaries, they two marched before. Now when they were within halfe a mile from the campe, they might discover the horsemen of their enemies. Two corners they were, most part Gauls, under the conduct of Cassignatus; besides the loose and light armed forlorne hope, to the number wel-neere of a hundred and fiftie, and those were partly Myrians and partly Cretenians. Hereat the king made a stand, not knowing well the number of the enemies: and anone out of the regiment that hee had with him hee crew two wings of Thracian horse, & as many Macedonians; likewise two cohorts of Cretenian & as many Thracian footmen. Hereupon ensued a skirmish: but for as much as they were matched even in number, and no succour came in to rescue from the one part or the other, it ended likewise in doubtfull ballance of victorie. Of Eumenes his part there died about thirtie: in which number Cassignatus the commander of the Gauls was slaine. So for that time Perseus retired his forces to Sycurium: but the next morrow the king marched with them againe to the selfe same place, and much about the foresaid houre. Certaine carts and waines laden with water followed after: and by reason that for a dozen mile space, all the way was water-lesse and full of dust withall, hardly bestead (as it should seeme) they had ben for very drought and thirst, in case they had ben charged & put to skirmish, at the time when they were first in sight. But considering that the Romanes kept quiet, yea and had reduced their corps de guard within their rampier, Perseus likewise retired with his forces into his campe. This did the enemies for certain daies together, hoping ever that the Romane cavallerie would charge upon the taile of the arriereguard in their retreat: & when C by that occasion the skirmish was once begun, and that they had trained and drawne them farre from their campe; then, they thought with ease wherefoever they were, turne upon them and make head, having the ods of them in horsemen and light armed souldiours. But the king seeing this would not speed, encamped neerer unto the Romanes, and fortified the compasse of halfe a mile. From whence betimes in the morning by the breake of day, after hee had embattailed his infanterie in the usuall place, he led all his cavallerie and light armed men toward the campe of his enemies. The Romanes seeing a greater dust raised by more in number, and the same neerer than ordinarie it had bene, were mightily afraid within their campe. But at the first they would hardly beleve the messenger that brought the newes: for that continually all the former daies the enemy used not to be seene, untill the fourth houre of the day, and now the sun was but newly risen. Howbeit afterwards (I say) when about the gates there were thicker alarmes given, and more and more running from thence, and that now there was no doubt at all of the matter, there grew an exceeding trouble and hurlyburly. The marshals, colonels, captaines, and centurians, betooke themselves into the quarter about the Pretours pavillion: and the souldiours ran every man to his owne tent. Perseus had embattailed his men lesse than halfe a mile from the rampier about a litle hill which they call Calicinus. King Corys had the charge of the left wing, with all those of his owne nation. The ranks of the cavallerie stood marshalled afunder one from the other, by reason that the light armed souldiours were bestowed betwene. In the right wing were placed the Macedonian horsemen, and the Cretenians likewise intermingled among them. Milon of Berthæa led these light armed souldiours: but Meno of Antigonie commanded the horsemen, and the whole regiment of that part. Next to those wings the cavallerie of king Perseus was arranged together with the selected aid-souldiours of many and sundrie nations: and the same were conducted by Patrocles of Antigonie, and Didas the gouverneur of Pæonia. In the midst of all was the king himselfe: having about him a band called Agema; and certaine corners of horsemen named [the sacred wings.] Before him he planted the slingers & darters, who both together amounted to the number of 400: and over them he appointed for to be their leader one Ion of Thessalonica, & Timanor the Dolopian. In this manner as is before said, stood the kings forces embattailed. The Cos. having put his infanterie in order of battaile, sent out his cavallerie likewise with the light armed companies, who were set in array before the campe. C. Licinius Crassus the Consuls brother had the leading of the right point, with all the Italian horsemen and the footmen lightly appointed intermingled among them, M. Valerius Maximus in the left, commanded the horsemen of the Greeke associates, together with the light armed soldiers of the same nation. M. Mutius conducted the battailon in the mids with certain extraordinary chosen men of armes. Before their guidons, 200 horsemen of the Gauls stood in ordinance: & of the auxiliaries of king Eumenes, three hundred Cyrtians, & four hundred Thessalian horse. Not far from thence were ranged, somewhat above the left point king Eumenes himselfe and his brother Attalus, with all their power were planted behind, even betweene the rereward and the trench. Thus stood both battailes much after this manner arraunged, and having of either side alike strength in manner of horsemen and light-armour, they encountred and charged one another; and then the conflict was begun by the forlorn hope of loose shot, to wit, the slingers and darters that went before. And first of all others the Thracians, faring like wild and savage beasts who had been long pent up within some grates and cages, with a nightie crie advanced forth and ran upon the Italian horsemen in the right wing, to the end that they might trouble and amaze them; being otherwise a nation fearlessse, as well by nature as for long experience and practise of warre. * * * The footmen with their swords assailed to cut off the heads of their pikes; and one whiles they hought their horses, and another whiles they ran them into their flanks. Perseus rode into the mids of the battaile, and at the first shooke forced the Greekes to turne aside and give way: and when the enemy pressed moreover hard upon them behind, behold, the Thessalian horsemen who were placed in the rereguard for succour, and stood somewhat apart and severed from the left wing, who at first were beholders onely of the fight (as keeping without the danger of the charge) afterwards stood them in verie good stead, even as they were at the point to goe downe and have the worse. For as they retired leifurely without breaking their ranks, after that they once joyned with the aids of Eumenes, they both yeelded the opportunity to their allies who were disbanded in the rout, to retire in safetie within their ranks: and also espying their owne vantage, when the enemies pursued not so thick in troups, they adventured to put themselves forward beyond, and so staied many of those their allies whom they encountred and received in their flight. Neither durst the kings men, being now also disarraied and disperfed here and there in following the chase, come to hand-fight and joyne battaile with those, continuing so well in order as they did, and marching firme and strong together; whereas the matter had been dispatched and the warre brought to a finall end; in case the king who won the better in horse-fight, had never so little come in with helpe and succour. For as he encouraged his souldiours to fight, there came in place very fady and in passing good time, the Phalanx, which Hippias and Leonatus (because they would not be behind-hand in this hardie enterprise) brought of their owne accord in great hast so soon as ever they heard of the winning-hand of the Cavallerie. And whiles the king wavered in doubtfull suspence, betwene hope and feare of this so great an adventure, Evander the Cretensian, whose service Perseus had used in the await laid for king Eumenes at Delphi, seeing that main battell marching heavily armed under their ensignes, ran unto the king and earnestly advertised him to take heed, least that presuming too much and bearing himselfe over confident of this good speed of his, he brought not unadvisedly the maine chaunce of all his estate, into a needlesse and unnecessarie hazard. For if (quoth he) you can be content with the happie fortune of this faire day and so rest, either you shall have the meanes to make an honourable peace, or else (if you had leiser prosecute the warre) to win exceeding many allies to beare armes with you in the field; who no doubt will follow the traine of your good fortune. To this way stood the kings mind ever, and thither hee soone enclined. Therefore having commended Evander for his good advise, hee commaunded the ensignes to retire, and the footmen to returne into the campe: likewise to found the retreat unto the guidons of the men of armes. In this battaile 200 Romane horsemen that day lost their lives, and no fewer than two thousand footmen, and fast upon two hundred of the Cavallerie were taken prisoners. Of the kings side, there died not past 200 horsemen and fortie of the other.

After that the victorious enemies were upon their return into the camp, all were jocund and glad in generall, but above the rest the Thracians shewed themselves in joy for this their victory, over insolent: for they returned singing full merily, and carried the heads of their enemies fixed upon their speare points. But the Romanes were not onely sad and heavey for this unfortunate journey, but fearfull also lest the enemy should forthwith assaile their camp. Eumenes gave counsell to dislodge and remoove to the other side of the river Peneus, that it might serve them in stead of a defence and bulwarke, untill such time as the amazed souldiours had recovered their spirits and taken heart againe. The Consull was ashamed and abashed to bewray his feare; howbeit, over-ruled with reason, he set his armie over the river in the dead time of the night, and encamped on the farther banke. King Perseus the morrow after advanced forward to bid the enemies emies battell, but perceiving they wer lodged in safetie beyond the river, he confessed that he had faulted indeed, for that he had not followed his victorie the day before; but more overseen a good deale he was in lying still and taking repose that night: for without troubling any els of his own men, he might have sent out the light armed soldiors only to set upon the enemies as they passed over the river in hast and fright, and so defeated a great part of their forces. Now, the Romanes shook off their feare for the present, considering they were incamped in a sure place: but among other damages, the blot especially of their honor and name grieved and troubled them. And as they sat in counsell before the Consull, everie man for his part laid all the blame upon the Ætolians, who first began to be afraid and runne away; and whose example of feare the other allies of the cities of Greece followed: for it was said, that five principall men of marke among the Ætolians, were scene and noted first of all other to have turned their backs. But the Thessalians were praised in a full assembly of the whole armie; and their captaines for their vertue and valorous service were honoured with presents. The spoiles of the enemies were brought before king Perseus; out of which hee bestowed freely upon some, brave and gorgeous armors; upon others, goodly great horses; and finally, certeine were rewarded with the prize of good prisoners. Targuets there were above a thousand and five hundred, cuiraces and coslets not so few as a thousand; besides, a farre greater proportion of murrions, swords, and shot of all sorts. Great matters these were, considered in themselves; but much more amplified and set out by the king himselfe with a speech that hee made in a frequent audience of his armie assembled together, after this or the like manner. You see alreadie by this (quoth he) what you may judge before-hand of the finall issue of this warre: discomfited yee have the better part of your enemies, to wit, the Romane Cavallerie, wherein they tooke themselves to be invincible. For their horsemen are the very gallants and bravest of their youth; their gentlemen of armes (I say) are the seminarie and nource-garden of their Senate. From them they chuse their nobles and peeres to make Consuls of yea, and Generals of the field another day. And the spoiles of these we have erewhiles divided among us. Neither is the victorie lesse which yee have gained of the Infanterie and legions, who although by night they made an escape from you, yet in hastling to passe over the river, they resembled a sort that had suffered shipwracke at sea, and in fearfull hast for their lives have swum and overspred the river every where with their bodies. Sooner shall we and with greater ease, I trow, get over Peneus, to chase them thus alreadie overcome, than they did, making such hast for feare: and being once set on the other side, wee shall out of hand assaile their campe, which we mought have forced and woon this day, but that they tooke them to their heeles and fled. But if they will come to a field and trie the quarrell by the sword point, looke yee for no other issue of the conflict with footmen, than was before of the other with horsemen. These words, both the horsemen (who bare upon their own shoulders the spoils of their enemies lying slain before their eies in open view) heard with great pleasure and contentment, as measuring the hope of the future speed by the fortune passed; and also the footmen enflamed now with the glorie of others (and namely those that were of the Macedonian Phalanx) wished with all their hearts to have the like occasion offered unto them, wherein they might not onely shew their valiant service before the king, but also win semblable glorie of their enemies. Thus the assembly was dissolved, and the morrow after the king marched forward and encamped upon Mopselus, which is an hill situate in the mid way betwene Tempe and Larissa. The Romanes removed their campe into a place of more securitie, howbeit not farre from the banke of Peneus. Thither repaired Misagene the Numidian, with a thousand horse, and as many foot, besides two and twentie elephants. Now as king Perseus during these daies, sat in counsell what course to take as touching the maine conduct of his affaires, when his courage was now well abated and not so lustie for his late victorie, some of his friends were so hardie as to advise him to use this good fortune of his for the obtaining and compassing of some honourable peace, rather than upon a vaine hope to carie his head aloft, and engage himselfe and his whole state into some hazard and jeopardie, out of which hee should not bee able to recover and retire into safetie. For to keepe a meane and moderation in prosperitie, and not over-confidently to trust upon the present flattering fortune, is the part (say they) of a wise man indeed and truly happie. And therefore the best course is, to send certayne men of purpose unto the Consull, for to renew the league upon the same conditions, with which your father Philip had accepted peace heretofore of T. Quintius the conquerour. For neither (say they) can the warre be taken up with greater honour and reputation, tion, than after so memorable a battell; nor ever will there bee presented more firme and assured hope of a peace to continue for ever, than upon this occasion, which will worke and mollifie the Romanes as a man would have them, to come on and assent to any accord, considering they are well tamed with the infortunitie of this battell. But in case the Romanes upon an inbred peevishnes and engrafted pertinacitie of theirs, should not hear reason, but refuse an indifferent end, then both God & man shal be witnesse, as wel of the moderation of Perseus, as of their pride and insolent frowardnes. The K. was willing enough to give care to this, & indeed never misliked such discourtesies; & therefore the advise was approved by the assent of the most part: wherupon embassadours were sent to the Col. and in a frequent councill assembled, had audience given them. Peace they demanded, and promised that Perseus should pay unto the Romanes as great a tribute as Philip had covenanted for; and likewise quit the same cities, pieces, and territories, which Philip had given up and surrendered. To this effect spake the embassadours; who being retired aside, the Romanes debated in councill, and in the end, Romanes constancie imported and had the upper hand: for in those daies the manner and use was, in time of adversitie to beare all out and let a good countenance, but in prosperitie to hold an even hand and to use governance. So agreed it was to returne this answer, That peace might be graunted with this condition, That K. Perseus should permit full and free power to the Senate of Rome, for to dispose both of his person and the kingdome of Macedonie at their good pleasure. When the embassadours had made relation hereof, this constant resolution and invincible persistance of the Romanes made them to wonder againe, as being not acquainted with their manners and fashions: and most of them forbade to make mention any more of peace, saying, That the Romanes would be glad shortly to seeke for that of their owne accord, which now at this present they loathed and rejected when it was offered. But Perseus mightily feared, that this arrogant spirit of theirs, proceeded from the confidence they had in their owne forces; insomuch as he gave not over so, but assaied to tempt the Consull, if haply by augmenting the summe of money, he might buy peace at any price and reckoning whatsoever. But seeing him nothing to come downe, nor to alter one jot from the first answer; in despaire now of all peace, he returned to Sycurium from whence he came, purposing once againe to trie the hazard of the field. Now the fame of this late fight of cavallerie was slowne over all Greece, and discovered the minds and affections of men: for not onely they that tooke part with the Macedonians joyced to heare this newes, but also very many of them who were obliged & beholden unto the Romans for benefits and favors received at their hands, and some likewise who had tasted of their violence & proud government. And this they did for no other reason at all, but only upon a foolish & perverse affection, like to that wherewith the common people ordinarily is carried away in the beholding of disports and triall of maisteries, even to favour evermore the weaker and him that taketh the foile.

At the same time Lucretius the Pretour had with most forcible meanes assaulted the cittie of Haliartus in Bæotia: and albeit the besieged defendants within were releevd by no foraine aid, but onely the youth of the Coronæans (who at the beginning of the siege entred the cittie) not hoped for any to come; yet they stood out and made resistance with courage of heart more than with strength of hand: for they issued forth many times, and sallied upon the fabrickes & engines of the enemye, yea, and when the ram approached hard to the wall, they let fall therupon a mightie weight and counterpoise of lead, and so depressed and drave it downe to the ground. And if haply the enemies who ran with the ramme against the wall, avoided that devise of theirs, laid batterie, and shooke it in some other place; the townesmen within, raised presently with great speed another mure, piling up hastily the stones one upon another, which they found lying among the very ruines of the breaches. The Consull seeing this manner of service by way of ordnance and batterie, to become slow and tedious, commaunded to divide ladders among severiey companie, and purposed to invest the cittie round about with the Escalados; supposing that the number which he had would be sufficient to exploit this enterprise, because on that side where-as the towne is enclosed with a marish, it was bootlesse (or rather impossible) to assault it. Himselfe in person presented two thousand elect souldiours before that part, whereas two turrets, and all the wall betweene was beaten downe and overthrowne; to the end, that in the very instant, whiles he assaied to enter at the breaches, the townesmen should run all thither to repulse him, and in the meane while the walls void of defendants might in some part or other bee skaled and woon. But they within bestirred themselves lustily to give him the repulse. For having piled in the

A very open breaches a mightie number of faggots made of drie vine cuttings and such small brush, they stood readie with flaming firebrands and burning linkes, threatening ever and anon to kindle the same and set all on fire, to the end, that being defended from the enemye by the meanes of fire betweene, they might have time to oppose an inner countermure against them. But by mischance this devise and enterprife of theirs was impeached. For there poured down on a suddaine such a mightie shower of raine, that the fewell would not easily take fire, and looke what was set a burning, it soone was quenched againe. By which meanes not onely the passage was made open betweene the smoking faggots drawne apart one from another here and there, but whiles they all intended wholly the defence of that one place, the walls were taken at one instant by ladders reared up against many and sundrie parts thereof. In the first heat upon the winning of the citie, old and young, such as chanced to come in their way, without any respect at all of age were put to the sword. The armed souldiours fled into the castle, and the next day being past hope to make good the place, they yeilded and were all sold under the girland in port-sale, to them that would bid most, to the number of two thousand and five hundred men or very neere. The ornaments and beauties of the citie, as statues, images, painted tables and pictures, and whatsoever was found in the pillage to beare a better price, was caried to shipbord, and the towne it selfe raised from the very foundations, and laid even with the ground. From thence the armie was conducted to Thebes: which being woon without any resistance he put into the hands of the banished persons, and those that tooke part and sided with the Romanes; but those of the contrarie faction, such as favoured the king and the Macedonians, hee sold by whole families in covert market to the best chapmen. Having performed these exploits in Bæotia, he retired himselfe to the sea side to his ships.

Whiles these affaires passed thus in Bæotia, Perseus lodged for certaine daies in campe at Sycurium. Where being advertised, that the Romanes made great hast to inn the corne newly reaped downe, and to carie it from all parts of the fields unto the leaguer, and that every souldior before his tent cut & shred off the ears as they lay bound in sheaves, to the end they might thrash & drive out the cleaner corn, by which occasion they had made great heaps of straw throughout all parts of the camp, he supposed it was an easie matter to set all their tents and pavillions afire. Wherupon he commaunded to provide torches, linkes & balls made of tow besmeared with pitch and tarre: thus provided & furnished, he set out at midnight, that by the dawning of the day, he might put this devise in execution without being descried before. But all came to nothing; for the foremost corps de guard although they were surprised with this sodaine comming, by their trouble and affright awakened & raised all the rest, & immediatly the alarme was given; so as at one instant the souldiours were readie and well appointed at the gates, and upon the rampier bent and prest for to defend the campe. Perseus likewise incontinently turned about with his ensignes, putting his hardage and carriage before, and then commaunded the infanterie to march after: himselfe with the cavallerie and light-armours staied behind to fortifie and guard the reeward, supposing (as it fell out indeed) that the enemies would make after to charge upon the taile of the march. His light armed souldiers had some short skirmishing especially with the forlorne hope & loose avantcourriers, but the horse & footmen both, retired without any impeachment into the camp. E Thus when all the corne was cut downe about those quarters, the Romanes dislodged & removed into the territorie of Crannon, which as yet was not endammaged. Whiles they lay encamped in securitie and mistrusting nothing (because the enemies were so far off, and by reason that the way between Sycurium and Crannon was so difficult for want of water;) behold all on a suddaine early in the morning by day light, the kings cavallerie and light armed souldiours shewed themselves upon the hills that overlooked them from above, and put them into great trouble. Departed they were from Sycurium at noon the day before, and had left the infanterie behind, about the breake of day upon the plaine next thereto. For a while he stood upon those said hills, hoping that the Romans might bee trained forth to an horse-fight. But perceiving them not to stir at all, he sent one on horseback to commaund the footmen to retire againe to Sycurium, and himselfe in person followed streight after. The Roman horsemen made after a pretie distance off, if haply they could spie any vantage in one place or other to charge upon them, disbanded and straggling a sunder. But when they saw that in their dismarch they kept close together, following their guidons and keeping their rankes, they also returned into the campe. After this, the king wearie of making so long journeyes, dislodged and removed to Mopsium. The Romans

for their part likewise having mowed downe all the corne of Crannon, passed into the territorie of Phalanneum. The king having intelligence by a renegade revolt, that the Romans were scattered all over the fields, and reaping the standing corn without any guard of armed men, made a rode with one thousand horse, and two thousand Candiots and Thracians: who marching with as great hast as possibly they could, set upon the Romanes at unawares all unprovided; where he tooke a thousand carts or thereabouts, together with their teemes, most of them laden, and upon 800 men besides. The guard and convoy of this bootie into the campe hee committed to the charge of three hundred Cretensians. Himselfe having rallied his cavallerie dispersed here and there busie in execution, and reunited withall the rest of the footmen, led them to the next corps de guard or garrison of the enemies, supposing that with little ado they might bee surprised and vanquished. L. Pompeius a Colonell had the command of them, who seeing his souldiours affrighted with this suddaine comming of the enemies, retired with them to an hill neere at hand, for to defend himselfe by the vantage and strength of the place, considering that otherwise in number and forces he was too weake. Where after he had cast his men into a ring, for to ward against the shot of arrowes and darts by a rouse and fence of targuets couched close together over their heads: Perseus having environned the hill round about with armed men, commanded some to mount up and assay to win the place on all parts; if possibly they could, and then to fight close hand to hand: others he charged to launce their darts and shoot their shafts thick at them a farre off. The Romanes were beset with a double fear; for neither could they maintaine skirmish and fight close together, because of those who laboured to climbe the hill: and say they had broke any ranks with excursions and outrodes upon them, yet were they exposed and lay open to the shot of arrowes and darts. Most hurt they had by certaine weapons called Cestrophendonæ [sling-darts.] A new kind of dart this was and lately devised in the time of this very warre. It had a sharpe head of yron the length of two hands breadth, & the same set fast in a stele which was halfe a cubite long, and about the thicknes of a mans finger: for to flie direct and straight, three feathers it had about it in manner of a shaft: the sling from the middle part had two cords of an unequal size: now when as the slinger swong it about, as it lay even poised in the greater capacite of the leather thong, out flew the dart and was driven with violence like a bullet. Many of the souldiers being very fore wounded as well with this weapon as all other sorts of shot, so as now for wearines they were scarce able to beare their owne armour: the king was earnestly in hand with them to yeeld and submit, assuring them upon his faithfull word their lives, yea and otherwhiles promised them rewards and recompences. But there was not a man whose heart enclined once thereto. Now as they stood thus stiffe and resolute to die, there shone upon them a little comfort & some hope of evasion beyond all their expectation. For certain of the forragers and corn purveyors, who hapned to flie for refuge unto the camp, brought word unto the Consull, that the corps de guard aforesaide was besieged round: whereupon being moved with the jeopardie wherein so many cittizens stood (for about nine hundred they were, and all cittizens of Rome) he went forth of the campe with the cavallerie and light armed souldiours, and unto them joyned certaine new succours of the Numidians as well horse as foot, together with the elephants: and gave commandement to the martiall colonels, that the ensignes of the legions should follow after. Himselfe in person marched before toward the hill aforesaid, taking with him a certaine number of skirmishers, for to strengthen the light armed auxiliaries. Eumenes, Attalus, & Misagenes also the king of the Numidians, flanked the Cos. on either side. When as the besieged Romanes had a sight once of the formost ensignes of their friends and fellows, they tooke comfort and courage againe upon their former extream dispaire. Perseus, who had purposed in the first place, not to spend any long time in laying siege to this corps de guard, but to content himselfe with the fortunate successe which at a venture hapned, in that he had taken and slain some of the forragers: secondly (when he was in some sort entred into that action) to depart (whiles he had means thereof) without any damage received, as knowing that hee had no strength, to speake of, about him: yet puffed up & caried as it were above the ground with the conceit of his late good hand, both staid in person to attend the enemies comming, & also sent out in all hast, for the [Macedonian] Phalanx. Which comming later than the present necessitie required (albeir in great hast they hurried) it fell out so, that they were to encounter (troubled & disordered as they were in running) their enemies that were well appointed and provided aforehand. And the Cos. who had prevented them, presently welcommed them with battaile. At the

A the first, the Macedonians made resistance; but afterwards being in no respect equall unto the enemies, after they had lost three hundred footmen, with foure and twentie of the most forward and bravest horsemen out of that corner which they call Sacra (amongst whom Antimachus also their leader died) they endeavoured to retire & be gone. But the way by which they were to passe, was more troublesome to speake of, than the skirmish and battaile it selfe. The Phalanx being sent unto by a messenger in hast, and conducted as hastily, encountred affront in a certaine straight a troupe of prisoners, and likewise the waggons charged with corne. Who being laid at to give way, thereupon arose a great trouble as well of the one part as the other; whiles no man tooke heed how to march in ordinance: but the armed souldiours cast down and overthrew the heapes of sardage and baggage, for otherwise there could no way bee made: and the draught-beasts being pricked and provoked forward, raged & made foule worke in the prease & throng. B Hardly and with much adoe were they dispestered and rid of this confused & disordered companie of captives, when they met with the king his companie and the horsemen discomfited. In which place, the noise which they made crying unto the Phalanx, Backe againe, Backe againe, made a fright among them, as if there had bene something readie to fall upon their heads: in such sort as if their enemies durst have entred into the straight and pursued farther after them, no doubt they had received a great overthrow. But the Consull contenting himselfe with a meane good hand, in that he had rescued and recovered his corps de guard from off the hill, retired with his forces into the campe. Some write that there was a great battaile fought that day, and how eight thousand enemies were slaine, and among them Sopater and Antipater two of the kings captaines. Also that there were taken prisoners about two thousand foure hundred: and militarie ensignes seven and twentie carried away. Neither was the victorie easily gotten but cost blood, for not so few as foure thousand and three hundred were slaine of the Consull his armie, and five guidons of the left wing lost. This journey recomfited the Romanes, but daunted and quailed Perseus in such sort, as after he had staid a few daies at Mopselum, especially about entering the bodies of his dead souldiours, and left a sufficient garrison at Gonnos, he retired his armie into Macedonie, leaving also at Phila one of his owne captaines named Timotheus, with some small forces, whom he commanded to assay the Magnesians and the borderers adjoining. When he was come to Pella, he dismissed his armie out of the field, and sent them to their wintering harbours, but himselfe together with king Cotys went to Thessalonica. D Thither newes came, that Attesbius a petie king of the Thracians, and Corragus a captaine under king Eumenes, had invaded the marches of Cotys, and were maisters of the countrie. which they call Marene. And therefore supposing that hee must needs discharge Cotys to looke to the defence of his owne realme, he bestowed rich presents upon him at his departure: and gave him 200 talents for sixe months wages of his cavallerie, whereas at the beginning he purposed to bee at the charge of a whole yeeres pay. The Consull after he heard that Perseus was gone, approached with his armie neere to Gonnos, and there lodged; if haply he might force and gaine that also. Situate it was over against Tempe, at the very mouth and guller of the streights, and is the very frontier town, yeelding both a most assured defence and strength to all Macedonie, and also a commodious passage for the Macedonians to enter into Thessalie. And being a place imprenable, as well for the naturall site thereof, as the strong garrison therein planted, he gave over the enterprise. So turning and bending his way into Perrhaebia, after he had forced Mallaea at the first assault and put it to the ransacke; and received Tripolis with the rest of Perrhaebia, yeelded by composition; he returned to Larissa. And then having sent Eumenes and Attalus home into their owne countrie, & bestowed Misagenes and the Numidians in divers cities of Thessalie neere at hand, to remain there for the winter time, and distributed part of his forces throughout all Thessalie, in such sort, that not only they had all commodious wintering, but also served in stead of garisons to the cities. Q. Antiochus his lieutenant he sent with a regiment of two thousand men to guard Ambracia and keepe it in obedience. All the confederates of the Greeke cities, save onely the Achæans he licenced to depart. With one part of his armie he went into Thessalie in Phthia; where he rased down to the ground Pteleum, abandoned of the inhabitants. But Antrona he wooon with the good will of the townsmen. Then afterward hee approached before Larissa with his forces. The citie was left desolate, for all the people were retired into the fortresse, the which hee began to assault: and first the kings garrison of Macedonians quit the place: of whom the townsmen being forsaken and left left to themselves, submitted incontinently. Then he stood in doubt whether he should assaile Demetrius first, or haue an eye and looke into the troubles and state of Bœotia. For the men of Thebes being grievously molested and annoied by those of Coronæa, had sent for him into Bœotia: at whose praiers, thither he conducted his armie; and besides, Bœotia was a country more commodious to winter in than Magnesia.

THE XLIII. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the three and fortieth Booke.

Divers Pretours were iudicially condemned, for demeaning themselves with crueltie and avarice in the administration of their provinces. P. Licinius Crassus the Proconsull, woon by force many cities in Greece, and cruelly risted them. For which rigour of his, the captives whome he had sold under the guise and in ouert market, were by an order directed out of the Senate, restored afterwards to their former estate. The Admirals of the Romane fleets committed many outrages and enmities against their allies. Besides, there are comprised in this booke, the prosperous affaires of king Perseus in Thrace, after hee had vanquished the Dardaniens and subdued Illyricum, wherof Gentius was king. The troubles which began in Spaine by means of Otonius, were appeased by his death. M. Æmylius Lepidus, was by the Censors created president of the Senat.

He same sommer, wherein the Romanes wan the victorie with horse-fight in Thessalie, the lieutenant being sent into Illyricum from the Consull, compelled by force and armes two rich townes to yeeld; unto which neverthelesse he gave all their goods againe, to the end that by an opinion of this clemencie, hee might win the hearts of the inhabitants of Carnus, that strong citie. But when he saw that he could not contraine them to render, no more than force them by siege; because his soldiours should not seeme to have been wearied for nought in the besieging of two townes, he fell to rife and ransacke that, which before hee left untouched. The other Consull C. Cassius neither performed any memorabile exploit in Gaule, which was his province by lot; and having endeavoured to conduct his legions through Illyricum into Macedonie, all his designment came to no effect at all. That the Consull was entred upon this journey, the Senat was certified by the embassadours of the Aquileians: who complained that their colonie newly erected was feeble, and not as yet wel secured among those fierce nations of the Istrians and Illyrians: and withall they made suit, that the Senat would provide and take order, that the said colonie might be fortified: and when the question was put unto them, Whether they would be content that commission should be directed unto C. Cassius in that behalfe? they answered, That the said Cassius, having assembled his armie at the Rendez-vous in Aquileia, was departed through Sclavonia into Macedonie. This at first was thought incredible, and every man supposed verily, that he had been gone to levie warre, upon the Carnians haply or the Istrians. The Aquileians were able to reply no farther, nor affirme more upon their knowledge than this, That allowance of corn was made for the soldiours to serve thirtie daies, and that guides were sought and brought out, who knew the waies out of Italie into Macedonie. Hereat the Senat (yea may be sure) tooke great smitte and was highly displeased, that the Consull should be so hardie as presume to leave his owne province for to passe into that which belonged to another, and to lead his armie an unknownen and new way, and the same dangerous, through strange and foreine countries, thereby to open passage as it were, for so many nations to come into Italie. Whereupon in a frequent assembly of the Senatours, there passed a decree, That C. Sulpitius the Pretour should nominate three embassadours out of the bodie of the Senate, for to depart out of the citie that present day, to make all the hast they possibly could to overtake the Consull wheresoever hee was, and to give him warning to levie no warre against any nation without direct warrant from the Senate. And these Embassadours went, namely, M. Cornelius Cethegus, M. Fulvius, and P. Martius Rex. The present feare as touching the Consull and the armie, was the occasion that the care of fortifying Aquileia was deferred for that time.

After this, were the embassadours of certaine States in both provinces of Spaine admitted to come into the Senate: who complained of the covetousnes and pride of the Romane officers and governours among them; humbly beseeching the Senate upon their knees, Not to suffer them (being allies and confederates) to be more shamefully pilld and spoiled than the verie enemies. Among other indignities for which they shewed themselves aggrieved, notorious it was, that the said magistrates had taken bribes, yea and used extortion in wringing mony from them. Whereupon a commission was graunted to L. Canuleius the Pretour (unto whom Spaine by lot was fallen) to ordaine five judges or commissioners (and those out of the rounge and degree of Senatours) for every person of whome the Spaniards claimed to recover such monies; and likewise to permit the plaintifes to take unto them what advocates and counsell they would. Then, after those embassadours were called againe into the Senat, this decree and act of the Senate was read unto them, and willed they were to nominate their advocates; who named foure, to wit, M. Porcius Cato, P. Cornelius Scipio the sonne of Cneus, L. Æmylius Paulus the sonne of Marcus, and C. Sulpitius Gallus. And first they tooke commissioners to proceed against M. Titinius, who had been Pretour in the higher province of Spaine, when M. Manlius and M. Junius were Consuls. Twise was the cause of the accused partie adjourned to a farther time, but at the third session he was quit and found unguiltie. Then arose some variance and dissention between the embassadours of those two provinces. The States of this higher Spaine, tooke for their patrons and advocates, M. Cato and Scipio; they of the farther and lower Spaine, made choice of L. Paulus and Gallus Sulpitius. They of high Spaine convented before the delegate judges, P. Furius Philus; the other of base Spaine, M. Matienus. Philus had ben L. deputie there three yeeres past, when Sp. Posthumius and Q. Mutius were Consuls; but this Matienus two yeeres before, during the Consulship of L. Posthumius and M. Popilius. Charged they were both of them with right grievous matters and imputations, and a farther day graunted of a finall judgement: but when they were to answere judicially againe, they made default, and for excuse it was alledged, that they were both out of the country; and so they departed into voluntarie exile, Furius to Præneste, and Matienus to Tibur. The voice went, that the patrons of the plaintifes would not suffer them to follow proceffe still against such noble and great personages: and the suspicion hereof was more pregnant, by reason that Canuleius the Pretour let this matter fall, and began to take musters and levie souldiours for the warre; and so forthwith directly went into the province, to the end that no more men should be brought into question and troubled by these Spaniards. By this means, all former matters past were buried in silence and no more speech made of them; but for future time, the Senat tooke order and provided for the Spaniards so well, that they obtained an immunitie, That no Romane magistrate should have power and authoritie to set the price upon any graine, nor force the Spaniards to sell the Vicesimes at what rate he pleased to set downe: also that there should be no commissioners appointed within their townes for the gathering and receiving of the revenues and mony issuing from thence. Besides, there came another embassie of a sort of people out of Spaine, after a new and strange manner: for there were above four hundred persons, avouching themselves the children of Romane souldiours and Spanish women not joyned in wedlocke: who appeared before the Senate and besought them, for to allow them a citie to inhabit. Whereupon ordained it was, That they should enter their names and be matriculated before their Pretour L. Canuleius: and looke whomsoever of them he enfranchised and made free, those they thought meet to be sent to Carthage neere the sea side, and there planted: also that those Carthians, who were willing still to keepe home and remaine there, should be privileged as Coloners & so enrolled, and to enjoy besides a portion of lands assigned unto them. This was a Latine colonie, and was called the colonie of the Libertines.

At the same time there came an Embassadour out of Africke, Gulussa the sonne of Masani, and likewise the Carthaginian embassage. Gulussa first was brought into the Senate; who declared what his father had sent unto them against the Macedonian warre: promising withall, that if it pleased them to impose more upon him, hee would be readie to performe the same in remembrance of the benefits received from the people of Rome: finally, he gave the LL. of the Senate a caveat by the way, to take heed that the Carthaginians deceived them not in the end: for that resolved they were, and went in hand to prepare a great navie, under pretense of sending it to the Romanes against the Macedonians; which if it were once readie rigged and furnished, it was in their choice then, to make whome they would either friends or foes.

Being entred the campe and shewing the heads aloft, they struck such a feare, that if immediately the armie had come forward and advanced against them, the campe might have been woun: and yet even then as it was, they fled amaine: and some there were who gave their opinion, to send embassadours to treat and with prayers to intreat for peace. Vpon the newes reported hereof, many cities submitted and were surrendered. Such as made excuse, and laid the fault upon the follie of two persons only, who had of their owne accord offered themselves to be punished, obtained pardon of the Pretour. And then forthwith hee went in expedition against other cities; but finding them all readie to doe whatsoever they were commaunded, hee passed quietly with his armie through that countrey in peace, which but a while before was all up in armes and on a light fire. This lenitie of the Pretour, which he used in taming and subduing this most fierce and proud nation without effusion of blood, was by so much more acceptable to the LL. of the Senate and the whole bodie of the people, as the Consull Licinius and the other Pretour Lucretius had warred in Greece with greater crueltie and avarice. As for Lucretius, the Tribunes of the Commons accused him daily in their ordinarie orations before the people for his absence: Notwithstanding his excuse was alleadged, that absent he was, and employed about the affaires of the State. But in those daies, so unknowne were things done hard by, that even at that present he was at his ferme within the territorie of Antium, and busie in conveying a conduct of water out of the river Loricina to Antium: the charges whereof he defraied with the money raised out of the sale of prizes taken from the enemies. Some say that he bargained to have that peece of worke effected, for the summe of a hundred & thirtie thousand Asles. Moreover he embellished and adorned the temple of Aesculapius, with the painted tables found in the pillage. The envie and ill will, the obloquie also and dishonour like to grow to Lucretius, turned upon his successor Hortensius, by occasion of the embassadours of Abdera, who in piteous wise complained with teares before the Senate, that their towne was by Hortensius forced and ransacked: How the cause of this ruine and destruction of their cittie was no more but this, that being enjoined by him to make payment of a hundred thousand Denarij, and allowance of fiftie thousand Modij of wheat, they requested some respite of time, wherein they might address their embassadours, as well to Hortensius the Consull as unto Rome, concerning this imposition. For scarcely were they come unto the said Consull, but they heard how their cittie was forced, the principall citizens thereof beheaded, and all the rest sold in portsale under the guirland. These were greivous indignities in the sight of the Senate, whereupon they passed the same ordinance in the behalfe of the Abderites, that the year before had bene directed in the like case as touching the Coronians; and commaunded the Pretour Q. Metellus to publish the said decree before the publicke assemblie of the people. In like manner two Commissioners were sent, namely, C. Sempronius Blasus, and S. Julius Caesar for to reestablish the Abderites in their freedom: who also had in charge to signifie from them, both to the Consull Hortensius, and also to the Pretour Hortensius, That the Senate judged the hostilitie offered unto the Abderites injurious, and the warre unlawfull, and therefore that all such as were brought into servitude, should be sought out and restored again to libertie.

At the same time presentation was made unto the Senate of certaine complaints against C. Cassius who had been Consull the year before, and at that time was employed in qualitie of a Colonel-marshal together with A. Hostilius in Macedonie. Likewise there arrived the embassadours,

A dours of Cincibilis a petie king of the Gaules. A brother of his having audience graunted in the Senate made a speech, wherein he complained, that C. Cassius had given the wast to the lands and territories of the people inhabiting the Alpes, who were their allies and confederates, and from thence had led away into captivitie many thousand persons. And much at one instant there came the embassadours of the Carnians, Istrians & Iapides with complaints against Cassius. That first hee had enjoined them to furnish him with guides for to shew and direct him the best way to march with his armie into Macedonie, and so departed in peace from them, as if he had ment to war elsewhere: but afterwards out of the midway of his journey, he returned upon them, and in hostile manner overran their frontiers, robbing, spoiling and burning wherefoever he went; and to this day they cannot devise and know the reason, wherefore the Consull should hold them for enemies and deale so cruelly by them. As well the prince of the Gaules aforesaid being absent, as these embassadours in place received this answer, That as touching the outrages for which they shewed themselves grieved, the Senate neither knew thereof beforehand, that ever they were intended, ne yet approved of the same, since they were committed. But against al right & equitie it were to condemn unheard in his own defence, & absent, such a personage as he is, namely a man who had ben Consull considering also that his employment about the C.W. is the occasion of his absence. When C. Cassius is once returned out of Macedonie, then if they would shew themselves and accuse him face to face, the Senate would heare the cause and take knowledge accordingly, yea, and endeavour that they should be satisfied and contented. Moreover, thought good it was, that these nations should not be dispatched onely with this bare answer, but that embassadours also should be sent: two unto the foresaid king beyond the Alpes; and other three to the people above named, for to acquaint them with the resolution of the lords of the Senate. And they gave order besides to send presents to each of the embassadours to the valour of two thousand Asles over and above, to the two princes that were brethren, these gifts following, to wit, two chaines of gold weighing after they were wrought five pound of gold: also five peeces of plate in silver, amounting to the weight of twentie pound: two bard horses with their hennemen and lackies: likewise horsemens armours and their cassiocks: and liveries likewise for all those of their traine, as well bond as free. These were the things sent unto them. But at their owne request granted it was besides, that they might for their money buy each of them ten horses, & be allowed to transport them out of Italie. The embassadours sent with the Gaules beyond the mountaines, were C. Lalius and M. Aemilius Lepidus: to the other nations, C. Stanius, P. Cornelius Blasio, and T. Memmius.

Moreover, there met together in Rome at once, the embassadours of many States both of Greece and Asia. And first the Athenians were brought into the Senate, who related, That they had sent unto the Consull P. Licinius and the Pretour C. Lucretius, what shipping they had, and all the fighting men they were able to make: but seeing they had no use of them, they had raised a levie of a hundred thousand Modij of corne. Which, albeit their land was but barren for tillage, and the very husbandmen themselves lived of forraine corne brought in unto them, yet they had made meanes to doe accordingly, because they would not seeme to be wanting in any dutifull service: and willing they were yet, and prest to performe whatsoever they would require. E The Milesians for their part said, That hitherto they had done nothing, marrie they offered themselves to be readie to accomplish all that the Senate should commaund them toward this warre. The Alabandians shewed, That they had built a temple to the cite of Rome, and ordained besides, that in the honour of that goddess there should be a solemnitie of games and plaies exhibited every yeere. Also, that they had brought with them for a present, a crowne of gold weighing fiftie pound, to set it up in the Capitoll as a gift and offering to Iup. Opt. Max. and withall, three hundred horsemens shields, which they were minded to bestow upon those, unto whom it pleased them to appoint and commaund. Their petition was, that they might bee permitted to offer their present in the Capitoll, and there to sacrifice. The men of Lampascus came with a golden crowne weighing fourescore pound, protesting, That they had quit and abandoned Perseus, so soone as ever the Romane armie was arrived in Macedonie, notwithstanding they owed alleagiance unto Perseus, and were homagers to his father Philipp before him. In which consideration, as also for that they had performed their devoir to their full power to the Romane Generals, they requested no other favour to be gratified withall, but to bee received into the amitie of the people of Rome: and in case there should be peace concluded with Perseus, that they might bee excepted cepted and exempted in the accord, for being reduced under his obedience. The rest of the embassadours had a gracious answer returned unto them. As for the Lampfacenes, order was given to Q. Menius the Pretour, to enter and enroll them in the number of allies. Every one of these embassadours were rewarded with a present worth two thousand Assees. The Alabandians were appointed to carrie backe with them into Macedonie their shields aforesaid, and to deliver them unto A. Hostilius the Consull. Over and besides, the Carthaginian embassadours out of Africk, made relation that they had brought from thence ten hundred thousand Modij of wheat, and five hundred thousand of barley, which they had a shipbord at the sea-side, readie to carie the same wheresoever the Senate would appoint. This benevolence of theirs they accompanied with good words, saying, they knew well that this gift & recognoissance of their dutie, was inferior either to their own goodwill, or the demerits of the people of Rome. Howbeit many times heretofore they had shewed themselves to doe the part of thankfull, faithfull, and trustie allies, in all things tending to the profit and good of both states. In like sort the embassadours of Masissa promised the same proportion of corne, with 1200 horse, and twelve elephants, assuring them in his name, to doe whatsoever the Senate would impose and should be thought needfull; and that with as free an heart as the benevolence offered of his owne accord. Thanks being given both to the Carthaginians and also to the king, requested they were to transport over into Macedonie to the Consull A. Hostilius, those things which they had promised. To the embassadours were sent by way of presents, two thousand Assees apeece. The Cretensian embassadours, related how they had sent into Macedonie such a number of Archers, as the Consull P. Licinius had imposed upon them: and when they denied not upon the question asked, that there served more archers of theirs under Perseus than with the Romanes, this answer was made unto them, That if the Cretensians would well and truly and in good earnest preferre the friendship of the people of Rome before that of king Perseus, the Senat of Rome likewise would give them answer as certaine & assured allies: in the mean while, they should let their countie-men to understand, that it was the will and pleasure of the Senate, that the Cretensians should with all speed possible call home all those souldiours whom they had in any garrison of king Perseus. The Candians being dismissed with this dispatch, then the Chalcidians were called in: and at the very first sight of them it soone appeared upon what termes of necessitie they were driven to send an embassage: when Asicion the chiefe man among them, by occasion that he was lame with the gout in his feet, was brought into the Senate in a litter. In which extremitie diseased as he was, there was no pleading of any excuse by his infirmities, nor craving pardon, since he was to go without, when he had all done. He began by way of preface and preamble, saying, he had nothing left alive but his tongue, for to deplore & bewail the calamities of his country: then he went forward, & first shewed what courtesies & good turns the State wherein he lived had performed to the captaiues general and armies of the Romanes, both of old, and also of late in the warre against Perseus. After this, he declared what parts of pride, covetousnes, and crueltie, first, C. Lucretius a Romane Pretour had exercised upon his countie-men, & afterwards what L. Hortensius practised, at that time above all others: also how the Chalcidians were resolved to endure all calamities, were they more grievous than those which they presently suffered, rather than they would yeeld to Perseus. And as for Lucretius and Hortensius, they knew full well, that it had bene better & more for their safetie to have shut their gates against them, than to receive them into their cittie. For such as had excluded them forth, as namely they of Emathia, Amphipolis, Maronea, & Aenus, remain still entier & in good estate; but with us (say they) the temples have bin robbed of all their beautiful ornaments, and utterly spoiled by these sacrileggers. C. Lucretius hath carried away, by water over to Antium, and hath led away into bondage and captivitie the persons free borne. So as the goods and fortunes of the allies of the people of Rome, both have bene and daily are pillled and rifled. For according to the use & fashion brought up by C. Lucretius, Hortensius likewise houseth his mariners as well in summer as winter, and our houses are full of a rable of these sailers and sea-men, in such sort as our wives and children bee forced to converse among such groomes as make no account at all what either they say or doe. Hereupon thought good it was, to send for Lucretius into the Senate, that he might see his accuser, answer face to face, & purge himselfe of these challenges. But when he was come in place, he heard much more in presence, than had bene spoken against him in his absence. Over and besides, there shewed themselves and joined together against him, two other more stout adversaries and bitter accusers, to wit,

M. Iuven-

M. Iuventius Taurus and Cn. Aufidius. And these two not onely coursed him before the Senat, but also having drawne him perforce into the generall assembly of the people, and charged him before them with many reproches, tooke out processe also and arrested him to make his appearance and answer judicially at a day before the people. Then Q. Menius the Pretour, by order from the Senate, answered the Chalcidians in this manner: Whereas yee alleadge and say, That yee have well deserved of the people of Rome both heretofore and also in this present war now in hand, the Senat knoweth all that to be true, & accepteth the same thankfully in the best part, as of right they ought: As touching your grievances and complaints for the lewd parts which C. Lucretius hath plaied, and which L. Hortensius still practiseth (both Pretours of Rome) the same neither have bene nor are committed & done by the will and allowance of the people of Rome. For who would not judge so of it, that knoweth how they levied warre upon king Perseus and his father Philip before him, for to enfranchise Greece and set it at libertie; and not that their allies and friends should thus hardly be intreated by their magistrates and governours sent from hence? Write therefore they would unto L. Hortensius the Pretour, to let him understand that the Senate is not well pleased with these pranks of his which the Chalcidians complaine of. Also if any free-borne persons were become thrall and bound, that withall convenient speed he should take order to seek them up and restore them again to their former freedome. Last of all, that they deemed it meet & reason, that no sailer or martiner, but onely the maisters of ships should be lodged and enterreined in your houses. And these were the contents of the letters written unto Hortensius, by commandement from the Senate. Vnto the embassadours were gifts sent, to every one as much as came to two thousand Assees. As for Micion, he was allowed his carriage in chariots at the charges of the citric, and order given that he should with all ease ride in them to Brundisium. As for C. Lucretius, when the day of appearance was come, the Tribunes commended an action against him before the people, to be fined at a million of Assees. And in a generall assembly and Session holden for this purpose, cast hee was and condemned by the suffrages of all the tribes, even thirtie five and no fewer.

In Liguria no memorable exploit was that yeere performed: for neither the enemies entred into armes, nor the Consull led his legions into their countie; and when he was assured of peace for that yeare, hee discharged the souldiours of two Romane legions, within 60 daies after his first comming into the province. As for the armie of the Latine allies, hee brought it early into the cities of Luna and Pisa there to winter: and then himselfe with the cavallerie visited most of the cities in the province of Gaule.

In no place was there any warre but in Macedonie: howbeit they had in suspicion Gentius and the king of the Illyrians. Therefore the Senate ordeined to send from Brundisium eight ships readie rigged and fully furnished, unto the lieutenant C. Furius at Issa, who was governour of the Iland with the guard and strength of two Ilesian vessels; in which were put aboard and shipped two thousand souldiours, which Q. Menius the Pretour by a warrant directed out of the Senate, enrolled in that quarter of Italie which lieth opposite to Illyricum. In like manner the Consull Hostilius sent Appius Claudius into Illyricum with foure thousand footmen, for to defend the people in those parts: who not content with those forces of his owne which hee had brought with him thither, demanded here and there aids and succours of the allies, untill hee had put in 20000 eight thousand men of divers and sundrie nations. And after hee had made his progresse through all that region, hee set him downe and rested at Lichnidum a citie of the Dassaritians. Not farre from thence there stood a frontier towne called Vscana, and for the most part raunged under the obedience of Perseus. There were within it one thousand citizens, and a small garrison of Cretensians for their better safeguard and defence. From thence there came to Claudius secret courriers, advertising him, that if he would approach neerer with his armie, there would be some readie at hand to betray the towne into his hands: and woorth the adventure it was (say they) and would quit for all the paines: for able it was with pillage to enrich not himselfe and his friends only, but also all his soldiours. The hope of this cheat, fitting so well his covetous humour, so blinded his spirit and understanding, that he had not the sence to keep with him any one of those courriers that came unto him, nor the wisdom to demand hostages for assurance of this enterprise which was to be exploited by stealth & fraud, ne yet the foresight to send out escours & espies, or so much reason & mother-wit as to require their oth & bond of faithfull promise. Only at the day appointed he departed from Lychnidum, and within twelve miles of that citie toward

After this the assembly was published for the chusing of Censours. In election there were for this dignitie of Censureship, the very principal persons and of best note in all the citie, C. Valerius Lavinius, L. Posthumus Albinus, P. Mutius Scævola, C. Iunius Brutus, C. Claudius Pulcher, and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus. These two last rehearsed the people of Rome chose for Censours. When as by occasion of the Macedonian warre, a greater care was had about the taking of musters, than at other times before, the Consuls found much fault with the common people, and complained unto the Senate, that the young and able men for service being called, would not answer to their names. But C. Sulpitius and M. Claudius two Tribunes of the Commons, maintained the cause against them in the behalfe of the Commons, saying, That it was no hard & difficult matter for Consuls to levie souldiours: marie, for corrupt, affectionate and popular Consuls, it was not so easie a thing, and namely, such as would be sure, to enroll no souldiours against their wils. And to the end that the LL. of the Senate might know this to bee a truth, they should see the Pretours (if the Senate were so content, and thought well thereof) whose power of command, and authority of government was *lesse than the Consuls, to go through with the musters without empeachment. So that charge was committed to the Pretours with the great assent of the Senatours, but not without some backbiting and detraction of the Consuls. And the Censours for to assit and set forward that affaire, made it knowne, and protested in the full assembly of the people, that they would publish an act, as touching the review and estimate of every mans havoir and habilitie; that besides the ordinarie oth of all citizens, they should sweare to these points in this forme following: Art thou under fixe and fortie yeeres of age? then by vertue of the edict made by the Censours C. Claudius and Tib. Sempronius, come forth and shew thy selfe at the musters so often as there shall bee any levie taken: and what Censours soever shall happen to be in place, thou shalt appeare and be enrolled, in case thou wert not a prest souldiour before. Moreover, because the voice went, that many soldiours of the Macedonian legions were absent from the armie, & had obtained large passports without limitation of return, & that through the corruption and favour of the Generals, they published an edict as touching the souldiours enrolled for Macedonie, when P. Aelius and C. Popilius were Consuls, or any time after, That as many of them as remained within Italie, after they were enrolled and registred first under their hands, should within thirtie daies repaire againe to their colours into the province: and whosoever of them were at the disposition of father or grandfater, their names should be presented and declared before them. Semblably, they would take knowledge of their causes who were cleane dismissed and cased: and look whomsoever they judged to have obtained their discharge by any speciall grace and favour, before they had served out their full time by law required, they would commaund them to be enrolled souldiours againe. By vertue of this edict of the Censours, as also by their letters sent out and divulged abroad in all incorporate townes and places of resort for market and merchandise, there assembled together and came to Rome such a multitude of lustie, young, and able men, that their unusual and extraordinary number was chargeable and comberous to the citie. Thus besides the former levie taken of those that were to bee sent and employed in supplie of the old armies, foure legions more were enrolled by C. Sulpitius the Pretour, and within eleven daies the musters were accomplished and ended.

Then the Consuls cast lots for their provinces. For the Pretours had their governments allotted unto them before, and the sooner, by reason of the civile causes which required their jurisdiction. The one over the citizens was fallen to C. Sulpitius, the other over forrainers to C. Decimus. M. Claudius Marcellus obtained the regiment of Spain, Serg. Cornelius Lentulus of Sicilie, P. Fannius Capito ruled Sardinia, C. Marius Figulus had the conduct of the navie. And then, I say, to Q. Servilius one of the Consuls fell the government of Italie, and to Q. Martius the other of Macedonie. This Martius so soon as the Latine feasts were solemnised, departed toward his province immediately. After this, upon the motion of Capito to the Senate to know their pleasure, which two legions of the new hee should conduct into Gaule: the LL. ordained, That the Pretours C. Sulpitius and M. Claudius should give unto the Consull, which it pleased them of those legions that they had enrolled. This hee tooke to the heart, that hee a Consull was thus subjected to the will of the Pretours; yet after the Senate was risen, hee stood waiting at the Tribunall of the Pretours, and required them according to the order set downe by the Senat, to assigne him his two legions. But the Pretors submitted the choise thereof to the Consull himselfe. This done, the Censours tooke a review of the Senat, and chose new Senatours: and M. Aemilius Lepidus

*The civile Pretours within the citie were allotted but two Licitors, & the provinciall abroad in forraigne parts not above fixe apeece, whereupon Polybius calleth a Pretour ἡγεμῶν, where as each Consull had everie where twelve.

Lepidus was elected president of the Senat; and these were the third Senatours that made choise of him consequently one after another. Seven were displaced and deposed from their Senatours dignitie. Now in taking the number of the people, and in assessing them, they compelled to returne into Macedonie those who were departed from the armie there: and by meanes of this assessment, they soone knew who were absent from their companies: they examined them for what causes they were discharged from soldierie; and whose licence they judged not to be grounded of good and sufficient reason, those they forced to take the militarie oth againe in this manner and forme: According to the edict of C. Claudius and Tib. Sempronius the Censours, thou shalt well and truly sweare, to returne willingly and with all thine heart, into the province of Macedonie; and this shalt thou doe to thy power without fraud or covin. In making the review of them that served on horsebacke, their censure was executed with great rigour and extremitie. They tooke from many their horses of service: upon which occasion having given offence to the wholestate of knights and gentlemen of Rome, they blew the coales and kindled the fire of ill-will and heart-burning against themselves: by a certeine edict of theirs besides, whereby they intimated, That none of them who in the time that Q. Fulvius and Au. Posthumus the Censours had taken to farme the renewes, fruits and profits of the citie, or undertaken at a price the publicke workes and provisions, should be so hardie as to present themselves to their speare set up, either to be farmers or undertakers, no nor to bee parteners, or have anything to doe with those that were in such negotiation, commerce and bargain. The old Publicanes and farmers had oftentimes complained hereof to the Senate: but when they could obtaine no comfort from them; to moderate and abridge this infinite power of the Censours, at length they met with a Tribune of the Commons, one Rutilius, to stand with them and defend their cause; a man who upon a particular and private quarrell of his owne was offended and bare a grudge against the Censours. And this was the occasion: They had commaunded one of his late vassals and enfranchised retainers, to pull downe a wall standing in the street Sacra over against a publicke edifice; pretending that the said wall was built upon the citie ground. The man a private person, called unto the Tribunes for their lawfull helpe and favour: but when as none of them all but onely this Rutilius would meddle in the matter and interpose their helping hand, the Censours sent to straine and take gages for to bind him to answer the cause, and before the bodie of the people intended an action against him, and set a greivous fine upon the head of that partie aforesaid. By meanes of this debate begun upon such an occasion, when as the old publicans betooke themselves for succour to this Tribune, presently there was a bill preferred and subscribed with the name of the said Tribune alone, in this forme, That what publicke renewes and profits of the State, C. Claudius and Tib. Sempronius had to ferme let for a rent, or what publicke workes and provisions they had put out to bee made and purveied at a price, the same leases and bargaines should not stand for good but bee cancelled, and new demises drawne and made. Also that it might bee lawfull for all then indifferently either to bee farmers or undertakers of the premises. And the said Tribune assigned a day for a generall assembly and session, to have this bill to bee cast by the voices of the people. When the day was come, the Censours advanced and put themselves forward to dissuade and plead against the bill. So long as Gracchus spake, hee was heard with patience and silence. But at Claudius when he opened his mouth, they hissed and kept a muttering, so as hee was forced by an οἶκ made by the crier to procure audience: which being made, the Tribune found himselfe grieved and complained, that the people there assembled were withdrawne and called away from him, to the prejudice of his autoritie and honour, and with that slang out of the Capitoll where this assembly was holden. The next day hee kept a great coile and made a soule stirre: first he interdicted the goods of Tib. Gracchus as condemned and accursed, for that in setting a fine, and streining gages of him, who had appealed to a Tribune, and in not obeying and condescending to his opposition, hee seemed to set light by his Tribunes autoritie, & prejudice his reputation. As for C. Claudius, he arrested him to answer at a day, for that he had withdrawne the assembly from him: nay, hee professed that he would endite both the Censours of treason or felonie in the highest degree, and required of Sulpitius Pretour for the citizens, a day of assizes for their judiciall triall. The Censours refused not to have this matter put to an issue with all speed, and to be tried by the dome of the people. So the time for the hearing and determining of this hainous crime of majestic or treason aforesaid, was assigned the *daies immediately before the eight and seventh calends of October. Upon this, *ante 8. & 7. Calendas Octobris, that is, the 25 and 24 of September.

this, the Censours incontinently ascended up into the Porch of Libertie: where after they had made sure and sealed the publicke registers and records, shut up and locked all the offices of the Chauncerie, and discharged for the time the publicke clarkes and proto-notaries attending upon that court, they protested that they would not goe in hand with any publicke affaires of state, before the sentence and judgement of the people were passed upon them. The day came, and Claudius first pleaded his owne cause and spake for himselfe: and when of twelve Centuries that were of gentlemen, eight had found the Censor guiltie and cast him, yea and many other centuries of the first Clasis. Then presently, the principall persons of the citie in the very sight of the people, changed their weed, laid away their rings, and went about from one to another in humble manner, to crave the commons to be good unto the Censors. But that which most of al either staied or reversed the definitive dome against him, was (by report) Tib. Gracchus himselfe the other Censor: for that when the commons cried from all parts, that there was no danger growing toward Gracchus, hee swaie by expresse words, That if his colleague were condemned, hee would (without attending the judgement of the people as touching himselfe) accompanie him into banishment. Howbeit the defendand and accused person, was driven to this neere point and hard exigent of extremitie, that he came within eight centuries of being cast and condemned. Thus when Claudius was acquit, the Tribune said hee would not trouble and molest Gracchus.

This yeer at the earnest suit of the Aquileian embassadours unto the Senat, for to have the number of their colonies encreased; a thousand & five hundred families (by vertue of a decree granted out of the Senate) were enrolled: and for the conducting of them to Aquileia, were sent as Triumvirs or commissioners these three, to wit, T. Annius Lufcus, P. Decius Subulo, and M. Cornelius Cethegus. The same yeere C. Popilius and Gn. Octavius embassadours, who had bene sent into Greece, having first red and published at Thebes the arrest and ordinance of the Senate, carried it afterwards throughout all the cities of Peloponnesus, to this effect, That no person should contribute toward the warres, and put into the hands of the Romane magistrates, more than that which the Senate had set downe. This put them in good hope and assurance for the future time, that they should be eased of those charges and expenses, by which they were impoverished and wasted, whiles every one imposed upon them some taxation or other, and never gave them repose. In the Achæan generall counsell holden at Argos, they had audience given them and were heard in gracious sort: from whence leaving this most loial and faithfull nation in singular good hope of happie estate for the time to come, they passed into Ætolia. There was as yet no sedition broken out there; but all were in jealousie and suspicion one of another, and full of naturall accusations: in regard of which jarres and troubles, the embassadours onely demanded hostages, and without any other end made, went directly into Acarnania. The Acarnanians graunted unto these embassadours a Diet to bee holden at Tyrreum: where some debate was betwene the partakers of divers factions. Some principall men of the States, required that there should be garrisons received into their cities, to bridle the wilfull folie of those that inclined to the Macedonian nation: others gainsaied this course, and besought the contrarie, for feare least that peaceable and confederate cities should be put to receive that disgrace and dishonour, which usually falleth upon knowne enemies and those that are conquered by force of armes. And this request was reputed just. Then the embassadours returned to Larissa unto Hyllius the Pro-consull, for from him they were employed in embassage. Octavius he retained still with him: but Popilius together with a thousand souldiours or very neere, he sent to Ambracia, there to lodge for the winter time.

Perseus in the beginning of winter durst not go forth of the frontiers of Macedonie, for feare least the Romanes would invade with violence his realm in some place or other, if they found it void and disurnished. But toward the mids of December about mid-winter, when by reason of the deepe snow the mountaines are unpassable and unsuperable from out of Thessalie, thinking he had then a fit season & opportunitie to cut off the hopes and breake the hearts of the neighbour-borderers, that when he should be averted another way and busied in the Romane warre, he might be secured of danger from them: considering that from the parts of Thracia hee had peace with Cotys; and likewise from Epirus side (by the means of Cephalus, who suddainly of late was revolted from the Romanes:) moreover having newly vanquished the Dardanians in warre; and seeing onely that quarter to infect and annoy Macedonie, which regardeth and affronteth Illyricum;

Illyricum; and that those Illyrians also were not quiet & at peace, but readie to give entrance unto the Romanes; but if he had subdued & tamed those Illyrians which were next unto him, then king Gentius also, who a long time hung betwene in doubtfull tearmes, might bee induced and drawne wholly into societie with him: he revolved at length, and with ten thousand footemen heavily armed, whereof part were Phalangitæ, and other two thousand lightly appointed; and five hundred horse, he made a rode and presented his forces before Stubera: from whence after he had provided himselfe of come to serve for many daies, & given order that the ordinance and engines of batterie should follow after; at the third daies end he lodged nere Vlcana, the head citie of all that land Penestria. But before that he offered any assault, he sent certaine of purpose to sound & sollicite the affections, one while of the captaines of the garrison, and another while of the townesmen. Now there lay within the cittie, together with the manhood and youth of the Illyrians, a garrison also of the Romanes. And when he saw that they brought no news of any peaceable dealing from thence, he began to bend his forces against them, and assaied to invest them round about, and so to force the cittie. And albeit both night and day without any rest and intermission, they pressed upon the inhabitants, and evermore one succeeded another; whiles some reared ladders against the walls, others threw balls of fire against the gates, yet the defendants of the citie held out and endured that furious and violent tempest: because they hoped that neither the Macedonians lying abroad were able any long time to endure the rigor of the cold winter; nor the king on the other side could have so much release and relaxation from the Romane warre, as to stay there and make his abode. But after they perceived once the mantlets approach, and the frames of turrets and fabrickes erected, their persistance was over-matched and they began to relent. For besides that in plaine force they were the weaker and not able to resist, distressed also they were for want of corn, neither had they store of any other provision, as being taken on a suddaine, and looking for nothing lesse than siege at such a time of the yeere. Therefore when they were past all hope to be able any longer to resist, C. Carvilius Spoletinus and C. Afranius were sent from the Romane garrison, to crave of Perseus, first that hee would permit them to depart in their armes, and to carrie with them their bag and baggage: secondly, if they might not obtaine so much, that he would but give them assurance of life and libertie. The king was more free and liberall to promise, than fast and faithfull to performe. For after he had commanded them to goe forth, and carrie with them all that was their owne: the first thing that hee did was to disarme them and tak away their weapons.

They were not so soone departed out of the town, but both the company of the Illyrians, to the number of five hundred men, & also the inhabitants of Vlcana ranged themselves & their citie. Perseus when he had put a garrison in Vlcana, led away the whole multitude of the yielded townsmen (& those were wel-nere as many in number as his own army) & transported them to Stulera: where, after he had sent the Romanes (al besides their chieftains) who were 4000 fighting men, into sundrie cities to be kept in wards, & sold the Vlcenians & Illyrians; he led his armie back into Penestria, intending to be maister of Oeneum, a town seated otherwise commodiously, & with all it is the very key and highway that openeth passage into the countrie of the Labeates, within the realme of king Gentius, and where he kept his roiall state. As he passed by a strong borough town wel inhabited, named Draudacum, one about him that was well acquainted with the coasts of that countrie, put into his head, that bootlesse it was & to no purpose to win Oeneum, unless he had Draudac also in his hands, as being a towne situate more commodiously in all respects. Whereupon he advanced forward, and so soone as ever he presented his armie before it, incontinently all the inhabitants submitted and yeeldec. Being much animated and encouraged with this surrender of theirs, which they made farre sooner than he hoped or looked for; after that he perceived how terrible this redoubled armie of his was, all the way as hee marched hee brought under his subjection eleven other castles and strong holds, upon the like feare that they were put into. Violence he used against very few of them; the rest yeeldec willingly: wherein were taken fiftene hundred Romane souldiours, placed there in severall garrisons. In great heed and to very good use served Carvilius Spoletinus in all their parlies; who evermore gave it out, that there had bene no crueltie nor rigor exercised upon him and his fellows. At length the king came before Oeneum, which could not possibly be woon without a set and full siege. For the town had far more youth and able men within it than the rest, was fortified with a strong wall about it, and defended of the one side with the river called Artaxus, and of the other with an exceeding high hill, hill, and the same of hard and difficult access. All these things considered, the townsmen were in good hope to be able for to make resistance. Perseus, having entrenched the towne and cast a rampier round about it, began likewise to raise a terrace and mount from the upper part thereof, to that height as might surmount and over-top the walls. But during the time that this peece of worke was in hand and brought to perfection, a great number of the inhabitants within were consumed by divers and sundrie adventures, whiles they skirmished off and sallied forth, endeavouring both to defend their owne walls, and also to impeach the fabricks and devises of their enemies. And those that remained alive, what with toilsome labour night and day, and what with many a wound, were past all service and good for nothing. So soone as the terrace and mount afore said was raised close unto the wall, both the kings cohort (whom they call Nicatores) mounted up into it, and also with ladders the assault was given unto the citie in many places at once. All that were above fourteene yeeres old hee put to the sword: their wives and small children he cast into prison. The rest of the boocie and pillage fell to the soldiours share. As he returned from thence with victory to Stuberæ, he sent as ambassadors unto Gentius, Pleuratus the Illyrian (a banished person who sojourned with him) and Aputus a Macedonian of Berthæa. Them hee gave in charge to declare unto Gentius, what he had atchieved against the Romans and Dardanians the sommer past, together with the late exploits performed in that winter expedition; and withall to perswade the king, for to be knit in amitie with him and the Macedonians. These embassadours having transmounted the top of the hill Scordus, and traversed the wilds and wolds of Illyricum, (which the Macedonians of purpose had laid wast and desert, to the end, that the Dardanians might have no easie passage either into Illyricum or Macedonie) after much paine and travaile they arrived in the end at Scodra. Now was king Gentius at Lissus, and thither were these embassadours sent for, where they delivered their message with gracious audience: but they went away with an answer to no effect; namely, That he wanted no will, and his heart was good enough to warre upon the Romans; but his coffers were emptie, and he lacked money especially, to goe in hand and enterprise that which hee desired. This answer they related unto king Perseus at Stuberæ, at what time as he was most busie in selling of his captives taken in Illyricum. Then forthwith were the same embassadours addrest againe unto him, accompanied with Glaucias one of the kings guard and squires of his bodie, without any mention made of money, and that was the onely meanes to induce the bare and needie barbarous prince to levie warre. After this, Perseus ransacked the citie Ancyra, and once againe reduced his armie into the Penestines countrey, and having strengthened the garrisons in Viscana, and in all the forts and peeces about it, he returned into Macedonie.

L. Celus a Romane lieutenant, lay in guard for the defence and rule of Illyricum, who durst not stirre so long as king Perseus was in those quarters; but in the end after his departure, hee endeavoured to recover Viscana in the Penestines countrey, but was repulst from thence by the garison of the Macedonians there, and caried away nothing but many a drie knock and bloudie wound, and so retired with his forces to Lynchnidum: from whence, some few daies after, he sent M. Trebellius Fregellanus into the Penestines countrey, with a strong and sufficient power, for to receive hostages of those cities who faithfully had persisted in amitie and friendship. Hee commaunded him also to go forward to the Partines (for they likewise had covenanted to put in pledges) for that of both these nations, the said hostages might be exacted and gotten without any stirre and trouble. The hostages of the Penestines were lent to Apollonia, but those of the Partines to Dyrrhachium, which in those daies was more usually called by the Greeks, Epidamnus. App. Claudius, desirous to rase out the blemish and make amends for the dishonour received in Illyricum, set in hand to assault Phanotes a fort of Epirus, having brought thither with him the Athamans and Thesprotians (over and above the Romane armie) to the number of 6000 men; but he got nothing there but travaile for his paines, by reason that the place was valiantly defended by Clevis, left there with a strong garison by K. Perseus. Perseus likewise made an expedition to Elinia; and after he had taken a tolesome survey of his armie about it, hee conducted his power to Stratus at the request of the Epirotes. This Stratus then, was the strongest citie of all Ætolia. Situate it is upon the gulf of Ambracia, neare the river Achelous. He advanced thither with ten thousand foot and not above 300 horse of them hee rooke the fewer with him in number, by reason of the streight passages and rugged waies. Being come at the third daies end so farre as to the mount Citius, after hee had with much difficultie passed over it, the snow lay lay so deepe, that hardly and with much adoe could hee find a convenient place to encampe in. From thence he remooved, more for that he could not there abide and remaine, than for any intollerable way and weather hee met withall in his dismarch and journey forward: so with passing great traivale and trouble, of his beasts especially, the second day he arrived at the temple of Iupiter called Niceus, and there lodged. Then, after he had taken an exceeding long journey, he abode at the river Arachthus, being staid there by reason of the deepe waters, during which time, he made a bridge over and transported his forces; and when hee was gone a daies journey onward, he encountered on the way Archidamus a principall person of the Ætolians, by whose meanes the citie of Stratus was to be delivered up unto him. And that day hee lodged upon the frontiers of Ætolia: from whence the next morrow hee journeyed as farre as to Stratus, where, having encamped neere the river Achelous, hee looked that the Ætolians would run out unto him by heaps at all their gates, to yeeld themselves unto his protection: but in stead thereof he found their gates shut, and a garison of Romanes received into the citie that very night when he came, together with the lieutenant C. Popilius. For the chiefe of the citie (who induced and enforced by the authoritie of Archidamus whiles he was present in place, had sent for the King) became more slacke and negligent, by occasion that Archidamus was gone forth to meet with him, and thereby gave advantage and opportunitie to the adverse faction, to send for Popilius with a thousand footmen from Ambracia. In verie fit time and to right good purpose came Dinarchus also a capitaine of the Ætolian Cavallerie, accompanied with sixe hundred foot and a hundred horse. Knowne it was for certain, that he marched toward Stratus, as intending to band and take part with Perseus; but changing his mind together with the turning of fortune, hee joyned with the Romans, & banded against him for whom he set out at the first. Neither was Popilius, among these wavering and inconstant spirits, more secured than he should be: and therefore incontinently gat the keyes of the gates into his hands, and possessed himselfe of the guard of the walls. As for Dinarchus and the Ætolians, together with the youth and able men of Stratus, he bestowed them all in the fortresse, under a colour of guarding the same. Perseus, having assaied to parly with them from the hills which commaunded the higher part of the citie, finding them perverse and obstinate, and seeing them readie to set him farther off with thot of their darts, encamped five miles off from the citie, beyond the river Petitarus. There, hee called a councell; in which, Archidamus together with the revolts and renegates of the Epirotes, exhorted him thereunto to sojourne and continue: but the chieftains of the Macedonians contrariwise were of advise, that there was no striving with that troublesome and daungerous season of the yeere, considering their provisions were not readie; and the assailants were like sooner to feele the scarcitie and want thereof, than the defendants: in regard whereof, and especially for that the enemies wintered not far from thence, hee dislodged and remooved to Aperantia. The Aperantians by reason of the great credit and reputation of Archidamus among them, received him with a generall content. And the same Archidamus was made capitaine there over a garison of eight hundred souldiours. And so the king returned into Macedonie, with lesse trouble both of his men and beasts, than he came thither. Howbeit the bruit blowne abroad, that Perseus led his forces against Stratus, caused Appius to levie his siege from before Phanotes. And Clevis with a brave regiment of lustie men well appointed, followed hard after him, and at the foot of the hills which were almost unpassable, hee slew well-neere a thousand of them as they marched heavily armed and encumbered, and tooke prisoners about two hundred. But after that Appius was passed those streights and come into the plaine called Eleon, he lay encamped there some few daies: meane whiles Clevis, accompanied with Philostatus the chiefe commaunder of the Epirotes, passed over into the territorie of Antigonea. The Macedonians went about to rob and spoile: but Philostatus with his cohort sate him downe in await, under a covert and hidden place for the purpose. And when as those of Antigonea issued forth in armes, and charged upon the forraiers as they raunged over the fields, and dispeafed in straggling-wise; pursuing them too eagerly in their flight, they chaunced to engage themselves over farre within the valley where the enemies lay in ambush: and there, to the number of a thousand of them lost their lives, and almost an hundred were taken prisoners. And so the enemies having sped well in all their enterprises, remooved their campe close to that of Appius, to the end that the Romane armie might doe no violence and outrage upon their friends and allies. Thus Appius spending the time in these parts to no purpose, and doing no good, after hee had discharged the companies of the Chaonians, and as many of the Epirotes as were with him, returned into Illyricum with his Italian souldiours: and when hee had distributed them among the confederate cities of the Partynians, there to winter, returned himselfe to Rome by occasion of a certaine solemne sacrifice. Perseus sent to Cassandrea for to lie in garrison there, a thousand foot and two hundred horse, whom hee had caused to come againe out of the cuntry of the Pene- stines. And they that returned from Gentius related still the same song from him, yet never- rested hee nor gave over to tempt and importune him, sending embassadors after embassadors unto him, knowing right well, that in him rested great importance: yet could not hee by any meanes possible bring the man to expend ought and to be at any charge, in a matter every way of greatest consequence.

THE XLIII. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIVS

Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the foure and fortieth Booke.

Quintus Martius Philippus passing through wilds and woods, entered into Macedonie and surprised many cities. The Rhodians sent embassadors to Rome, threatening to aid Perseus, unless the people of Rome would conclude peace and contract amitie with him: whereat was taken great scorn and disdain. Now when the charge of this warre was committed to L. Aemilius Paulus the Consull now the second time for the yeere following, Paulus before the publike assembly of the people praised unto the gods, that all infelicitie and cursed fortune comming toward the people of Rome, might bee averted from thence, and light upon his owne house. And so having taken a voyage into Macedonie, vanquished Perseus and subdued all Macedonie. A little before he should strike a battell, C. Sulpitius Gallus a martial Colonel, fore-warned the armie that they should not wonder and be troubled in mind at the eclipse of the mome which was to happen the next night following. In like sort Gentius the king of the Illyrians having entred againe into armes, was overcome in field by Anicius the Pretor: and having submitted himselfe unto him, was with his wife, children, and kindred sent to Rome. From Alexandria there arrived the embassadors of Cleopatra and Ptolemus king and queene of Egypt, complaining of Antiochus king of Syria, for that hee warred upon them. Perseus having solicited Eumenes king of Pergamus, and Gentius king of the Illyrians to aid him, was by them abandoned, for that he made not true payment of money according to his promise.

IN the beginning of that spring which immediately followed the winter wherein these occurments happened, Q. Martius Philippus the Consull came to Brundisium with five thousand men, whome hee intended to transport over the seas for the supplie of his legions. And M. Popilius (one who had been Consull) and other brave gallants of noble parentage as well as him- selfe, followed after the Consul to be martiall Tribunes in the Macedonian legions. Also about the same time C. Martius Figulus, the Pretor, & admirall of the navie, repaired to Brundisium, VVho weighing anchor, loosed to sea from Italie together, and arrived the next day at Corphus; but the morrow after that, they put within Aetium, an haven of

A of Acarnania. From thence the Consull set saile for Ambracia, where hee disembarked and travelled by land to Theffalie. But the Pretor having doubled the point of Leucas, entred the gulf of Corinth; and leaving his vessels at Crensa, journeyed likewise by land to Chalcis unto the naval forces, making such expedition that he crossed through the middest of Bæotia in one day. At the same time A. Hostilius lay encamped in Theffalie, neere to Palæpharsalus. VVho albeit hee had performed no memorable exploit of warlike feats, yet he had reclaimed his souldiours from all licentious loosenesse wherewith they were corrupted, and raunged them within good order of militarie discipline. Also by his faithfull carriage in government, hee had entertained and kept the love of the allies still, yea, and protected them from all manner of wrong and injurie. Now when he was advertised of the arrivall of his successour, he assembled with all diligence his forces both men and horse, and gathered together all armour, as well offensive as defensive: and so with a brave armie right well appointed, he went forth to meet the Consull upon the way. As their first encounter and meeting was honorable, and besitting as well their own reputation as the great estate of the Roman name, so for the managing of the affairs afterward [*it was very expedient to the Consull Philip: For the pro-consull turning to his own armie, exhorted the souldiours to performe valiant service; and so when he had delivered it to the Consull, returned to Rome.] Some few daies after the Consull, made an Oration in a solemne audience of all his souldiours: Wherein first hee began with the parricide of Perseus, committed upon the person of his owne brother, but projected against his very father. Then he proceeded forward and declared the wicked and divellish means whereby he attained to the crowne, also his practices of poysoning, his bloudie murders, how hee laid await for king Eumenes his life by way of detestable brigandage & robbrie: moreover, the injuries offered to the people of Rome, and the sacking of associate cities against the covenants of accord. All which dealings of his he should find one day (quoth he) by the issue of his affaires, how odious and cursed they are in the sight also of the immortall gods. For the gods are evermore favourable and gracious to pietie and fidelitie, the only means whereby the people of Rome is mounted to that pitch and heighth of felicitie. Then hee compared the forces of that State which already compassed the round world, with the strength of Macedonie; he set armies to armies, making remonstrance how far greater was the puissance of Philip and Antiochus before, & yet was it defeated utterly by no greater power than the Romans now were able to shew. Having thus enkindled & enflamed the courages of his souldiours by this manner of exhortation, he began to debate in counsell as touching the principall & maine point of the whole war. And thither repaired unto him from Chalcis, the Pretor C. Martius, after he had taken the charge of the armada & sea-forces. Resolved it was and concluded to make no longer abode in Theffalie, & there to loose time, but presently to dislodge & remove directly into Macedonie: that the Pretor also should endeavour and cast, how at one and the selfsame time hee might infest and annoy the sea coasts of the enemies. Now after that the Pretor was dismissed & sent away, the Consull commaunded his souldiours to bring every man with him provision for a moneth: and so the tenth day after he had received the conduct of the armie, he removed the campe and set forward. VVhen he had gone a daies journey, he called together the guides, and after hee had commaunded them every one to declare before the counsell there assembled, which way each one of them intended to direct the armie, he caused them to void and goe aside: and then debated it was in counsell, which course to take above all others. Some were of opinion to lead by the way of Pythoum; others advised to passe over the Cambunian mountaines, like as the yeere before Hostilius the Consull conducted his armie; and there were who gave advise to goe neere to the moore and marish of Afcuris. Now there remained yet some part behind of the way, which lay indifferent still and common to all these places; and therefore their consultation of this point was put over unto the time when they should encampe neere to the parting and division of the said waies. So from thence he led the armie to Perrhæbia, and sat him downe between Azorus and Dolice, for to consult once againe for all, which way to take.

The same time Perseus knowing that the enimie approached, but yet ignorant which way hee ment to come, determined to beset all the passages with strong guards. VVhereupon he sent ten thousand yong & lustie men lightly armed, to the very pitch of the Cambunian hills (which the inhabitants themselves call Volutana) under the conduct of capitaine Asclepiodorus. But hee commaunded Hippias with a power of twelve thousand Macedonians to seize the streights of a certaine fort situate upon the marsh Afcuris, & is called Lapathus. Himselfe in person accompanied with the rest of the forces, lodged first neere to Dium: but afterwards seeming as if hee were unprovided of counsell and void of sense and understanding, hee with his light horsemen made rodes and courtes along the strond, one while toward Heraclea, and otherwhiles to Phila; and so backward againe the same way to Dium. In this meane time the Consull resolved fully to lead his armie by that passe, where wee said before that the armie of king Philip encamped sometimes, nere a place called Ootolophus. Howbeit he thought good to send out before foure thousand armed men, for to prevent the enemies and bee possessed first of the most commodious places of advantage: this regiment was commaunded by M. Claudius and Q. Marius, the Consuls sonne; and incontinently all the forces in generall followed after. But the way was so steepe and difficult, so rough, uneven and rugged, that in two daies space, they which were sent before, albeit they were not charged with the carriage of any thing, had much adoe to march fiftene myles: where they lodged, and the place which they made choise of was called the Towre Eudicru. From whence the morrow after they journied seven miles forward, and seized a hill not farre from the enemies campe: where they dispatched a courier backe to the Consull, to give intelligence, that they were come neere to the enemye, and setled in a place of safety, commodious also for all purposes; and withall to advise him for to make all possible speed after, for to overtake them and joine together. This messenger encountered the Consull at the Meere Afcurus, when he was greatly perplexed as well for the difficultie of the way which hee was to enter himselfe, as also in regard of the danger of them whom in so few number hee had sent before, even through the mids of the enemies corps de guards. Whereupon he tooke a better heart to himselfe; & having united all his forces, encamped upon the foresaid hill which his men already held, on that side which (considering the nature of the ground) was most commodious. And there they might discover within the view of eie, not onely the enemies campe distant from thence little above a mile, but also the whole countrie as farre as to Dium and Phila, yea and all the sea-coast, by reason that the high pitch and top of the mountaine yelded a prospect farre and neere round about. And this was it that set on fire the souldiours hearts, when they beheld the whole weight of the warre, the kings forces altogether, & the enemies countrie so neere unto them. In which spirit of cheerfulness when they were earnest with the Consull, and exhorted him to advance directly against the enemies campe, they had but one day granted them to rest after their wearisome journey. So upon the third day the Consull leaving part of his forces to guard the campe, led the rest against the enemye. Now had Hippias beene lately sent from the king to keepe and guard the passage, who since the time that first he espied the Romane campe upon the hill, had prepared the minds of his men to a battaile, and so encountered the armie of the Consull and met it halfe way. The Romanes advanced forth to fight, nimble appointed; and the enemies likewise were lightly armed, and by reason thereof most fit and provided for to give the charge and begin skirmish. So soone as they affronted and encountered one another, presently they fell to launcing of their darts on both sides. Many a wound was given and received of the one part as well as the other by their rash charging at randon, and few of both sides were slaine. Thus were their stomackes whetted & edged against the morrow; and then had they skirmished and maintained fight with greater forces and more deadly fewd, if the ground would have served and them to have displayed their battailions at large: but the top of the mountaine was straight, and arose to a sharp crest in forme of a coine or wedge; and hardly afforded rounge enough for three ranks of armed men affront; and therefore when some few were in fight, all the rest, and specially they that were heavily armed, stood as lookers on. As for the light armour of the one part, they would run forth at the broken craggies of the hill, and ever from the sides joine battaile with the like of the other party; yea and find means to charge their enemye, were the place open or uneven, it skilled not whether. But after that, more that day also were wounded than killed, the night at length parted the fray. The third day, the Romane Generall was to seek for a place where he might retire what to doe; for neither could he stay any longer upon that hill, for want of all things necessarye back from thence it was not possible, without dishonor & danger both. Moreover he considered, the enemye might prease upon him from the upper ground with advantage. Therefore hee therefore no other means but to amend that which was audaciously enterprised, with a more and hardy persistence in execution; a thing that otherwhiles proverly well in the end, proceeded from wile and deliberat counsell. And verily to this hard passe and difficult tearm, they were come, that if the Consull had bene to deale with an enemye like to any of the Macedonians
